

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LAWYERS REPORTS

ANNOTATED

NEW SERIES.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

A. G. FELL, Resp.,
v.
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY,
Appt.

(32 Utah, 101, 88 Pac. 1003.)

Pleading — amendment — shipment of stock — destination..

1. The allowance, upon due notice and argument, and a long time prior to the trial, of an amendment of a complaint in an action to recover damages for delay in transportation of live stock, changing the point of destination from the end of the defendant's line, as originally alleged, to a point beyond such line, is not prejudicial to the defendant, where the amendment is in accordance with the allegations of the answer as to the place of destination, and the court strictly confines the damages to the loss occasioned by the neglect of defendant on its own line.

Interest — unliquidated damages — delay in transportation of live stock.

2. Damages recovered in an action ex delicto against a carrier for injuries to, and delay in the transportation of, live stock, draw interest, at least from the time of delivery.

Note. — Right to interest on unliquidated damages.

- I. Work and labor, 1.
 - II. Bailment, 6.
 - III. Admiralty and collision, 7.
 - IV. Bonds and undertakings.

I. Work and labor.

In an action of quantum meruit for work

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Weber County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to live stock during transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. L. Williams, George H. Smith, and John G. Willis, for appellant:

Interest is not recoverable in actions for unliquidated damages.

Lester v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 27 Utah, 470, 101 Am. St. Rep. 988, 76 Pac. 341, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 761; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ayers, 56 Kan. 176, 42 Pac. 722; Nichols v. Union P. R. Co. 7 Utah, 510, 27 Pac. 693; Ferrea v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 Pac. 689, 1092; Smith v. Turner, 33 Or. 379, 54 Pac. 166; Wilson v. Sullivan, 17

Utah, 341, 53 Pac. 994; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 42 Pac. 811; Swinerton v. Argonaut Land & Development Co. 112 Cal. 375, 44 Pac. 719; Vietti v. Nesbitt, 22 Nev. 300, 41 Pac. 151.

Messrs. Heywood & McCormick for respondent.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for injury to live stock while in transit. The plaintiff (hereinafter called respondent) alleges that he delivered to and that the defendant (hereinafter designated appellant) received from him for transportation from Granger, Wyoming, to Chicago, Illinois, a certain number of sheep; that the appellant negligently delayed the same while in transit at Schuy-and material, it is held that interest should be allowed on account from demand, if one was made; otherwise, from the service of process; or, in the absence of proof of date of service, from the commencement of the suit. This is the latest rule, as developed since Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, 2 N. Y. 135, 51 Am. Dec. 275, and is applied where the damages are easily ascertained by computation. This was held in Dempsey v. Schawacker, 140 Mo. 680, 38 S. W. 954, 41 S. W. 100.

Interest should be allowed for each item of labor and material from the time of demand of payment. Sweeney v. New York, 173 N. Y. 414, 66 N. E. 101.

In Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, 181 N. Y. 11, 106 Am. St. Rep. 493, 73 N. E. 494, the case of Sweeney v. New York, supra, was distinguished, as the claim was not so peculiar as to take it out of the general rule, and the amount due the plaintiff was a mere matter of computation.

Plaintiff is entitled to interest from demand in an action on a quantum meruit. De Carricarti v. Blanco, 121 N. Y. 230, 24 N. E. 284.

And in assumpsit by a common carrier for freight, interest may be collected from the date of demand. Schureman v. Withers, Anthon, N. P. 166.

In an action for the use of a canal boat, where the cargo had not been discharged on delivery, it was held that the allowance of interest was not error. Sipperly v. Stewart, 50 Barb. 62. The court said: "The rule, as modified by recent decisions, allows interest upon an unliquidated demand, the amount of which could be ascertained by computation, together with a reference to well-established market values, because such values are so nearly certain that it would be possible for the debtor to obtain some proximate knowledge of how much he was to pay."

In Reid v. Rensselaer Glass Factory, 3 Cow. 393, which was an action of assumpsit to recover the balance of an unsettled account, it was held that an uncertain and unliquidated demand could not carry interest until demand.

An attorney is entitled to recover interest on an account for services, after his account was rendered. Mygatt v. Wilcox, 45 N. Y. 306, 6 Am. Rep. 90.

So, the attorney is entitled to interest from the time of demand, where there is no fixed agreement fixing price, and after performance demand is made of the defendant for what is deemed by the court and jury to be a reasonable compensation. Gray v. Van Amringe, 2 Watts & S. 128.

And in a similar action, where the demand was unliquidated, it was held that, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 3705, providing that interest is allowed on accounts after they become due and demand of payment is made, interest should be allowed on unliquidated claims from the date of demand. Trimble v. Kansas City, P. & G. R. Co. 180 Mo. 574, 79 S. W. 678, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 363.

But in Hadley v. Ayres, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 240, in an action by an attorney on an unliquidated account, it was held that interest should not have been allowed, except as to disbursements, and on those he was entitled to interest from the time they were made.

In an action for services rendered, interest should not be allowed upon the account until after demand of payment. Southgate v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 61 Mo. 89.

And in an action for work, labor, and material for furnishing sails, the plaintiff would, after the lapse of the usual time of credit, be entitled to such interest only by proof of an agreement to pay it, or by proof of a demand of payment, prior to the date of the writ. Amee v. Wilson, 22 Me. 116.

In an action of assumpsit for money paid and for professional services, where the defendant wrote that he would call and settle, it was held that interest should be allowed from that date, it being evidence of demand. Barnard v. Bartholomew, 22 Pick. 291. The court said: "Interest is to be allowed where there is an express promise to pay it, or where there is a usage proved from which the jury may infer a promise to pay; and also it may be given as damages for the detention of a debt after the ler, Nebraska, for a period of thirty-two hours, without providing any facilities to feed and water them; that said sheep were confined in the cars of appellant without food or water for a period of seventy-two hours, by reason of which a large number of lambs died; that the others shrank in weight; that all that did not die were by such negligent delay in transportation affected thereby; and that respondent was compelled to and did sell them for 50 cents on the hundredweight less than they would have sold for if they had been promptly and seasonably transported and delivered at the place of destination. In view of the errors assigned, the pleadings need not be further noticed, except in the following particular: In both the first and amended complaints, the respondent alleged the destination of the sheep to have been Omaha, Nebraska, but in the second amended complaint alleged the destination as Chicago, Illinois. This amendment was allowed by the court upon due notice and argument and a long time prior to the trial of the cause, but the same was allowed over appellant's objection and exception. The cause was, by the consent of the parties, tried to the court without a jury, and the court specifically found that the death of the lambs, the shrinkage in weight, and the loss in price, as alleged by respondent, were all due to the negligence of appellant in delaying the sheep at Schuyler, Nebraska, for thirty-two hours, and in not providing facilities for food and water for the sheep for a period of seventy-two hours, time when due by the terms of the agreement, or for neglect to pay a debt after a special demand."

In an action for work and labor, interest is due from the time of demand. Berner v. Bagnell, 20 Mo. App. 543.

In Wisconsin there seems to have been a conflict of authority and a difference in the application of the rule as to interest in actions for unliquidated demands. But all the cases were reviewed in Laycock v. Parker, 103 Wis. 161, 79 N. W. 327 (an action on a contract), and the New York rule was adopted, and it was held that if there was a reasonably certain standard of measurement by the correct application of which one could ascertain the amount he owed, he should pay interest, and that a demand was a proper time to start interest.

So in an action for services, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of demand. Farr v. Semple, 81 Wis. 230, 51 N. W. 319.

In other cases, interest was allowed from the commencement of the action.

In an action of assumpsit for work and labor performed, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the commencement of the suit. Goddard v. Foster, 17 Wall. 123, 21 L. ed. 589. This was an action by an agent, selling cargoes and refitting vessels, for his share of the profits and for his agreed compensation.

And in an action on a bond conditioned to pay for labor and material furnished in the erection of a lighthouse, it was claimed that a party was not entitled to interest on unliquidated claims until after demand. It was held that the service of the summons and complaint was sufficient demand to set the interest running. Dwyer v. United States, 35 C. C. A. 488, 93 Fed. 616.

In Mulligan v. Smith, 32 Colo. 404, 76 Pac. 1063, an action for services, it was held that the commencement of a suit was equivalent to a demand, and after the institution of suit, in the absence of any averments in the complaint as to the date when payment was demanded, the debt would draw interest at the legal rate.

the amount was unliquidated, plaintiff was allowed interest from the commencement of the action. Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 56; McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 316.

In an action on disputed accounts for attorneys' services, interest was limited to the date of the commencement of the action. Hand v. Church, 39 Hun, 303.

In Adams v. Ft. Plain Bank, 36 N. Y. 255, an action for professional services, it was held that interest should be allowed. The court said: "The principle which governs the allowance of interest was clearly enunciated in Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, supra, that whenever a debtor is in default for not paying money in pursuance of his contract, justice requires that he should indemnify the creditor for the wrong which has been done him, and just indemnity, though it may sometimes be more, never can be less, than the specified amount of money, with interest from the time of the default until the obligation is discharged. And if the creditor is obliged to resort to the courts for redress, he ought, in all such cases, to recover interest in addition to the debt, by way of damages."

In an action to set aside as fraudulent a preferential conveyance given partly in consideration of several years' labor by the grantor's son, and partly for future support, it was held that the grantee had a claim against the estate for the amount due for services, but that the demand being unliquidated, interest should not have been allowed prior to the conveyance. Robinson v. Stewart, 10 N. Y. 189.

In Yates v. Shepardson, 39 Wis. 173, in a suit for professional services that were disputed, it was held that interest ran from the commencement of the suit. There was no evidence of an earlier demand.

An uncertain claim for services rendered, that was denied and contested, is not entitled to interest until from and after the commencement of the suit. Tucker v. Grover, 60 Wis. 240, 19 N. W. 62.

In other actions for services it has been held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the time the balance was due.

Thus, in assumpsit on quantum meruit

and in confining them in cars for that length of time without food and water. The court also found the loss and damage to respondent for each item separately; that is, for loss by death, by shrinkage in weight, and for loss in price by reason of the condition of the sheep, caused by the negligent delay in transportation and in not providing facilities to feed and water them. On the whole amount of damages as found, the court allowed legal interest, as appears from the findings, from the date on which respondent made demand on appellant for damages for the injury and loss. It is not very clear, however, whether the court intended to allow interest from the date the sheep were delivered at Chicago, the place of destination, or from the date of demand by respondent. In our view, for the purposes of this decision, it makes no difference from what date the court computed interest, because the date from which it was computed, as appears from the record, was subsequent to the date of delivery of the sheep at their destination. The court entered judgment for the amount found as damages, with interest thereon, as aforesaid, against appellant, and hence this appeal.

There are but two assignments of error argued; indeed, in the state of the record, no other assignment could be reviewed by this court. The first error assigned and argued is the one that the court erred in permitting the second amendment of the complaint, changing the place of destination of the shipment from Omaha to Chicago. This sec-for services extending through years, interest is properly allowed by the referee by computing the balance due at the end of each year, and allowing interest on such balance. Tucker v. Preston, 60 Vt. 473, 11 Atl. 726.

And in assumpsit interest is proper upon a balance due for work and labor. Baker v. Central Vermont R. Co. 56 Vt. 302. The court said: "Where the claim in suit, in actions ex contractu, is unliquidated, interest is always given upon the sum found due, from the time the demand was payable. It is said that interest is allowed as damages for the detention of the debt; but the giving of such damages is not within the discretion of either court or jury; it is the right of the party, after establishing a contract demand, to have interest added from its maturity in all cases, including those where the contract is silent on the subject. Whenever a debtor neglects to pay, after it is his duty to pay, interest is recoverable; and the debtor is not relieved from its payment, upon what is really due, by showing that the creditor made too large a demand upon him."

In an action for work and labor for sawing logs, the defendants claimed damages for delay, and it was held that the damages might be measured by the rate of interest on the value of the logs for the period of delay, if the value of the logs had not changed. Grosvenor v. Ellis, 44 Mich. 452, 7 N. W. 59. The court said: "It is true that, as to this last item, the defendants were not entitled to interest as such, but the circumstances may have been such that the rate of interest constituted a very fair measure of the damages actually suffered. Suppose, for example, the defendants by the delay were deprived for a year of the opportunity of putting their lumber upon the market, as they intended and desired, and in the meantime the market price remained stationary; nothing could be nearer exact justice than to award damages equivalent to the lawful interest."

which the work is completed. Sullivan v. Nicoulin, 113 Iowa, 76, 84 N. W. 978.

And in an action for wages, it was held that although interest was not expressly claimed, the jury could allow interest from the time the wages became due under the contract, where the aggregate of the verdict was less than the amount sued for. Ansley v. Jordan, 61 Ga. 482.

In an action of assumpsit for services, interest could be allowed. Still v. Hall, 20 Wend. 51. The court said: "The referees were correct, therefore, in allowing it, unless the principal sum stood open for liquidation, by the testimony offered in abatement. If so, and damages had been proved and deducted, interest should not have made a part of the balance found. The principal would have stood in the light of an uncertain demand, to be settled by process of law. On such demands interest is not allowed."

In McCormack v. Lynch, 69 Mo. App. 524, which was action for work and labor, where the amount of damages was fixed, and the court properly directed interest to be added, the court said: "The general rule undoubtedly is that interest is not recoverable on unliquidated damages or for an uncertain demand. Dozier v. Jerman, 30 Mo. 216. But under the evidence we think it cannot be fairly said that the plaintiff's claim for damages (if he had any at all) was unliquidated or uncertain."

Marsh v. Fraser, 37 Wis. 152, was a suit on quantum meruit for labor and services in moving a building, with no time of payment fixed, and no evidence of demand. For these reasons interest from the time of performance was held erroneous.

In an action on an unliquidated account for work, labor, and services, where no demand was made before suit was brought, it was held in Doyle v. St. James Church, 7 Wend. 178, that interest should not be allowed.

Where the amount due cannot be readily ascertained, the rule is that interest will not be allowed.

This was held in an action for work and labor, where both parties had broken the ond amendment may have been caused by the statement contained in the appellant's answer to the first amended complaint, wherein it denied that the destination of the sheep was Omaha, and alleged that the destination was in fact Chicago, not Omaha. And it may have been due to the fact that the plaintiff alleged Omaha in his first complaint, because that was the end of appellant's line of road. The change made by the amendment was not a change or departure from the original cause of action. Casady v. Casady, 31 Utah, 394, 88 Pac. 32. The delict of the appellant—the cause of damages and the amount thereof—was alleged precisely the same in all the complaints. Neither could the appellant have been misled thereby, as appears from the answer itself. Moreover, the court confined the damages strictly to the injury and consequent loss occasioned by the neglect of appellant on its own line of road, and appellant was thus not prejudiced by the amendment. The contention of appellant, we think, is answered in this respect in the case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Truskett, 2 Ind. Terr. 633, 53 S. W. 444. This assignment, therefore, cannot be sustained.

The next and only other assignment of error relates to the allowance of interest by the court on the amount of damages found to have been sustained by the respondent. Appellant asserts that, this being an action for unliquidated damages sounding in tort, therefore interest cannot legally be allowed until the loss or damage contract, and the quantity of work performed and quantity of material furnished and prices could not be readily ascertained by defendant, and the claims were unliquidated. Delafeld v. Westfield, 41 App. Div. 24, 58 N. Y. Supp. 277, affirmed in 169 N. Y. 582, 62 N. E. 1095.

And in an action to enforce a mechanics' lien, and a counterclaim for damages, where the court was not able to ascertain the amount, and the claim for extra work was disputed. Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, 181 N. Y. 11, 106 Am. St. Rep. 493, 73 N. E. 494, following Delafeld v. Westfield, supra.

And in an action on an unliquidated claim against an estate for nursing, where there was no agreement as to any scale of prices. DeWitt v. DeWitt, 46 Hun, 258.

So, in an action on an unliquidated claim for work, labor, and services as an attorney. Gallup v. Perue, 10 Hun, 525. The court said: "The services were all performed under one retainer, but the demand for the services remained unliquidated, to be determined on proof of value, as no rate of compensation had been agreed upon between the parties. The statute fee bill, although evidence bearing on the question, does not determine the value and amount as between attorney and client."

And in an action where a claim for board and lodging was unliquidated and there was no way of determining the price or value. Holmes v. Rankin, 17 Barb. 454.

In an action of mandamus to compel a board of supervisors to allow a claim of an attorney for services rendered to excise commissioners, it was held that the relator was not entitled to interest, as the demand had never been adjusted, and there was no proof to establish a custom to charge interest, which was known to both parties. People ex rel. Johnson v. Delaware, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. 408.

On a claim against an estate for services, where no price was agreed on for wages, and the amount was unliquidated, no interest was recoverable until the amount of the claim was ascertained. Pursell v. Fry, 19 Hun, 595; Smith v. Velie, 60 N. Y. 100, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In an action of assumpsit for services where the account was disputed, interest was not allowed. Griggs v. Ganford, 50 Ill. App. 172.

In an action to recover the value of services, the value of which was not susceptible of ascertainment by computation, plaintiff was not entitled to interest prior to the verdict or judgment. Swinerton v. Argonaut Land & Development Co. 112 Cal. 375, 44 Pac. 719.

And where the amount of services and value could only be ascertained by evidence in court, and not by computation, the plaintiff was not entitled to interest prior to the verdict. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164, 18 Pac. 100; Swinerton v. Argonaut Land & Development Co. supra.

In an action for services rendered, where the amount was in dispute and unliquidated, and there was no express agreement to pay interest, it was not allowed. Hawley v. Dawson, 16 Or. 344, 18 Pac. 592.

And where an action was brought to recover for the value of material and labor furnished, and the sum owing was uncertain and unascertainable by computation at the time of the commencement of the action, and it depended not only upon what was found to be the reasonable value of the material and services, but also on the amount which ought to be deducted, and this was uncertain, interest was not allowed. Stephens v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 71 C. C. A. 374, 139 Fed. 248.

An unliquidated claim against the state for services as attorney does not bear interest. State ex rel. Sloan v. Warner, 55 Wis. 271, 9 N. W. 795, 13 N. W. 255. This was on the ground that the amount due for services would depend on proof of value, and this would be a question for a jury.

And where plaintiff in assumpsit demanded more than his services were worth, interest was allowed only from the time of the verdict. Shipman v. State, 44 Wis. 458. The court said: "The better rule of law is, that when the right of the party to recover his compensation under the contract is doubtful, and is contested on reasonable grounds, and the amount due him requires to be adjust-is ascertained at the trial. It is further contended that such is the law of this state, as appears from the decisions of this court. Before referring to our own decisions upon this question, we shall examine the question in the light of the authorities. While it is true that this is an action for a tort, and that the damages were unliquidated, the cause of action, nevertheless, arose out of a contract for carriage; that is, the reciprocal rights and duties arising out of the relation of carrier and shipper arose by virtue of a contract. Both parties insist on this in their pleadings, and such, in the nature of things, must be so. But, since appellant acted in the capacity of a common carrier, its duties and respondent's rights were governed by law, and, as there is no question presented for review in respect to the modification of the law by the contract, we must treat this case, for the purposes of this decision, upon the law applicable to a common carrier of live stock, regardless of any special contract. In view of the law, therefore, applicable to common carriers, where, through their negligence, a shipper suffers injury and damages to his property while in transit, or for negligent delay in transportation and delivering the same at the place of destination, what is the prevailing rule as to the amount of damages and the allowance of interest?

In the case of New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. at page 622, 37 L. ed. 306, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, the United States Supreme Court, in a case for injury to live

ed by proceedings in the suit, interest is only recoverable after the right of the party to recover, and the amount of the recovery, have been determined."

In assumpsit on a contract to haul ore to be reduced, where the balance was uncertain, interest could not be collected. Vietti v. Nesbitt, 22 Nev. 390, 41 Pac. 151. The court said: "Although interest is frequently allowed in actions involving torts to property, it is simply by way of damages, and in actions where the amount of damages is more or less in the discretion of the court or jury. In such cases, in the absence of special circumstances of fraud or oppression, the legal rate of interest from the time of the commission of the wrong is a safe and uniform measure of damages. Rensselaer Glass Factory v. Reid, 5 Cow. 609. But this is not that kind of a case, and interest was not included as a part of the plaintiff's damages, but as an incident to the amount due him under the contract, and allowed as a matter of law. As such, it does not come within the terms of our statute (Gen. Stat. § 4903, as amended, Stat. 1887, p. 82), and consequently was improper."

In other cases interest was denied.

On a quantum meruit for a machine constructed by plaintiff, interest as such could not be given. Dotterer v. Bennett, 5 Rich. L. 298. The court said: "The jury could have measured the damages by considering interest, and have given a verdict in the aggregate."

And where the cause of action was an unliquidated account, it was held that unless interest or damages were claimed, no judgment should be rendered for either. Adams Exp. Co. v. Milton, 11 Bush, 49. This was an action for work and labor.

In an action on an account for work and labor, it was held that interest could not be recovered on an open, running account for work and labor, goods sold, and the like, unless there was some contract to pay interest, or usage from which a contract might be inferred, or where the defendant was a wrongdoer in acquiring or detaining money. Goff v. Rehoboth, 2 Cush. 475.

interest was not allowed. Murray v. Ware, 1 Bibb, 325, 4 Am. Dec. 637.

II. Bailment.

A bailee will be required to pay interest where he refuses to deliver property on demand. But a stakeholder is not liable for interest under the Colorado statute, if there has not been unreasonable delay, and interest is not allowed where the amount is disputed, and not easily ascertained.

So, where a bank agreed to withhold money payable to a contractor, and to pay the same to a materialman, but withheld it, and failed to pay the money into court, the bank was held liable for interest. Ronsael v. Mathews, 62 App. Div. 1, 70 N. Y. Supp. 886, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 634, 63 N. E. 1122.

In an action against a factor for goods consigned, the plaintiff was permitted to recover the proceeds and interest allowed at the place of delivery. Cartwright v. Greene, 47 Barb. 9.

In an action against a warehouseman for failure to deliver upon demand goods deposited, the owner was given interest from the time of demand and refusal to deliver. Schwerin v. McKie, 51 N. Y. 180, 10 Am. Rep. 581; Garrard v. Dawson, 49 Ga. 434.

In an action against bailees for loss of coupon bonds, payable in gold, the measure of damages was the value of the bonds at the time demand was made for them, and the value of the gold interest thereon, from the day when it was payable, with interest on the several instalments. Maury v. Coyle, 34 Md. 235.

And in an action against the holder of collateral, where the proceeds of the security equaled or exceeded the amount of the debt, it was held, in regard to damages and interest, that where money was payable on demand, and there was no contract or usage requiring demand, and the defendant was not a wrongdoer in acquiring or detaining money, interest was to be computed from the service of the writ; and as the service of the writ was the only demand made, the jury were rightly instructed to compute in-stock while in transit, states the general rule as to the measure of damages in the following language: "It is well settled as a general rule that the measure of damages in the case of a common carrier is the value of the goods intrusted to it for transportation, with interest from the time when they ought to have been delivered,"—citing, among other authorities, Hutchinson on Carriers, 2d ed. § 771, and 1 Sutherland on Damages, 629. And the court then proceeds further: "But when the matter appears to have been regulated by statute in the state, and the statute has been interpreted by its highest court, the regulation of the statute will be followed in the courts of the United States." This was done in that case, and interest was not allowed only because the supreme court of Missouri, under the statute of that state, held that interest is not permitted in case of unliquidated damages, except in special cases. The rule is also stated by the same court, in the case of Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566, where, in the syllabus, it is said: "The measure of damages in an action against a common carrier for loss of goods in transit is their value at the point of destination, with legal interest."

In the case of Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 96, 18 L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44, the court of appeals of New York, in discussing the question now under consideration, at page 104 of 135 N. Y., says: "It is difficult to perceive any sound terest from that time. Hunt v. Nevers, 15 Pick. 500, 26 Am. Dec. 616.

But in an action against a stakeholder for refusing to pay over money held under a bet, it was held that, in the absence of an agreement, no interest could be recovered, except in the cases provided for by statute, which authorizes interest where money is withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay. It was held that mere delay on the part of the defendant to pay the money on demand was not sufficient to authorize interest under this clause. Corson v. Neatheny, 9 Colo. 212, 11 Pac. 82.

In an action against a cold storage plant for injury to fruit, the amount of the claim must be ascertainable by mere computation in order to recover interest. Shafer Fruit & Cold Storage Co. v. E. M. Upton Cold Storage Co. 133 App. Div. 796, 118 N. Y. Supp. 8. The court said: "We appreciate that there has been a departure from the former rule that interest is not allowable on an unliquidated demand."

In an action against a consignee on account of a consignment, interest will not be allowed on an unliquidated balance that is disputed. M'Connico v. Curzen, 2 Call (Va.) 358, 1 Am. Dec. 540.

III. Admiralty and collision.

The general rule in admiralty and collision cases is that interest will be allowed on the damages from the date of collision. In some cases this is said to be within the discretion of the court or jury. In cases depending on a stipulation bond there seems to be a difference in the cases, owing to the terms of the stipulation.

In a libel for a collision between steamboats, where damages for detention were allowed, interest was allowed thereon from the time of filing the libel. The Natchez, 24 C. C. A. 49, 41 U. S. App. 708, 78 Fed. 183. The court said: "It has been held by this court in New Orleans & C. R. Co. v. Schneider, 8 C. C. A. 571, 13 U. S. App. 655, 60 Fed. 210, that a verdict assessing unliquidated damages and allowing interest from judicial demand is sufficiently specific, where it appears clear such interest is allowed as part of the damages." Interest on the damages for two days' detention was in the nature of, and was intended as, damages.

And where goods were lost or destroyed on the high sea by reason of the fault of those in charge of the vessel, the damages were the value of the goods at the place of shipment, with charges for lading, insurance, and transportation, and interest. The Scotland (National Steam Nav. Co. v. Dyer) 105 U. S. 24, 26 L. ed. 1001.

In 118 U. S. 507, 30 L. ed. 153, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1174, on a subsequent trial, the court said: "The allowance of interest on damages is not an absolute right. Whether it ought or ought not to be allowed depends upon the circumstances of each case, and rests very much in the discretion of the tribunal which has to pass upon the subject, whether it be a court or jury."

And in an action for a cargo lost by a collision, the libellant was allowed the value at the time and place of shipment, with interest from the time of collision. The Mary J. Vaughan, 2 Ben. 47, Fed. Cas. No. 9,217.

And in an action for damages by collision, where the libellant, the owner of one vessel, obtained damages, he was entitled to interest from the date of collision. The Morning Star, 4 Biss. 62, Fed. Cas. No. 9,817.

In admiralty, on a libel for collision, interest was allowed on the demurrage. Paul v. The M. Kalbfleisch, 59 Fed. 198.

In a libel in admiralty for a collision, it was held that, in computing the damages, the commissioner would take, as those suffered by the libellant, the value of the vessel and the net pending freight, with interest, both to be computed by the rule given in Marsden on Collisions, 3d ed. p. 111. The Rabboni, 53 Fed. 952.

In an action for damages for sinking a canal boat by collision, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the use, and interest on the costs of repairs. Whitehall Transp. Co. v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 51 N. Y. 369.

So, in an action for damages for collision by a steamer, interest was allowed on the value distinction between a case where the defendant converts or carries away the plaintiff's horse and a case where, through negligence on his part, the horse is injured so as to be valueless. There is no reason apparent for a different rule of damages in the one case than in the other." Quite true that, notwithstanding the court here clearly points out that there can be no distinction in reason, the courts of New York, in deference to early decisions, still cling to the old theory that in certain cases it is for the jury to say whether interest shall be allowed or not. The question, however, is not relegated to the jury in cases like the one at bar, even in New York, as is manifest from the case of Dana v. Fied- ler, 12 N. Y. 40-50, 62 Am. Dec. 130. The following cases are all cases of injury to or destruction of personal property or live stock while in transit, and in all of them the measure of damages is stated to be the amount of loss, with legal interest from the time of delivery or loss: Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 608, 18 S. W. 716; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Jackson, 62 Tex. 209; Southern P. R. Co. v. Anderson, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 63 S. W. 1023; Mis-souri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Truskett, supra; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Phelps, 46 Ark. 485; Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land Transp. & Mfg. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 157, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661; Erie R. Co. v. Lockwood, 28 Ohio St. 358; Ill- of the property destroyed. Parrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 46 N. Y. 361. The court said: "In cases of trover, replevin, and trespass interest on the value of property unlawfully taken or converted is allowed by way of damages, for the purpose of complete indemnity of the party injured; and it is difficult to see why, on the same principle, interest on the value of property lost or destroyed by the wrongful or negligent act of another may not be included in the damages."

And in an action for damages resulting from collision of vessels, the cost of repairs, and rental value, and interest on the same, were allowed as damages. Mailler v. Express Propeller Line, 61 N. Y. 312.

Where a horse was injured in a collision of canal boats, plaintiff was allowed interest on the value of his horse. Edwards v. Beebe, 48 Barb. 106. The court said: "It is questionable whether the referee was technically right in saying that the law gives interest in such cases, as he seems to say in his report. But it is usual, and may be permitted, to give interest by way of damages in such a case, although I think it rests in the discretion of the jury or referee."

In libel in rem for damages in collision, interest was allowed in Balano v. The Illinois, 84 Fed. 697. This was not on the ground of strict interest (which would be due only for the withholding of a debt), but because the compensation for the permanent injury to the vessel was due as of the time when it was inflicted; and the addition of what is called interest was justly added for withholding it.

It was also allowed in The Bulgaria, 83 Fed. 312.

In an action in admiralty for a collision, it was held that the claimant was entitled to the amount claimed for demurrage, with interest. New Haven S. B. Co. v. The Mayor, 36 Fed. 716.

And in an action for a collision and damages caused to a boat, the damages allowed were such sum as the plaintiff paid for raising and repairing his boat, with interest thereon to the time of the verdict. Atchison v. The Dr. Franklin, 14 Mo. 63. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where both vessels were in fault, and the loss of one, with interest from the date of collision to the date of decree, exceeded the loss of the other, with like interest, by a sum one half of which was greater than the amount of the bond given to answer the decree, with interest from the date of the decree, it was held proper to award to the first as damages the amount of the bond, with interest. The Manitoba (Beatty v. Hanna) 122 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 1095, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1158. The rule applied was that the damages done to both vessels should be added together in one sum and equally divided, and a decree be pronounced in favor of the owner of the vessel which suffered most, against those of the vessel which suffered least, for one half of the difference between the amounts of their respective losses.

In The Wanata, 95 U. S. 600, 24 L. ed. 461, a collision case, on appeal to the circuit court, a decree was rendered on the stipulation bond for value, which was $16,000, and costs, with interest to the date of the decree in the district court, amounting to $323, and costs in the circuit court, including interest to date on damages awarded in the district court, amounting to $1,085,—in all, $17,407. This was held proper, as the amount of the stipulation for value was decreed to be paid libellants for losses, and the stipulation for costs was decreed to be paid libellants in part discharge of costs, and the balance of the costs and the accrued interest from the decree of the district court to the date of the decree of the circuit court was to be paid by the sureties in the appeal bond.

This was on the ground that costs and interest were to be given in such a case, not as indemnity for the loss set forth in the libel, but for the reason that the loss ascertained in the decree of the district court was not paid at the proper time (following The Northumbria, L. R. 3 Adm. & Eccl. 6; Ives v. Merchants' Bank, 12 How. 159, 13 L. ed. 936; The Diana, 3 Wheat. 58, 4 L. ed. 333; Sneed v. Wister, 8 Wheat. 690, 5 L. ed. 717; 5 Stat. at L. 518).

But in The Ann Caroline, 2 Wall. 538, 17 L. ed. 833, where a stipulation was made to obtain the release of a vessel attached unnois C. R. Co. v. Haynes, 64 Miss. 604, 1 So. 765.

If we assume the case at bar to be one commonly called a case of pure tort for injury to or destruction of personal property through ordinary negligence, still the respondent was entitled to interest according to the great weight of authority. In 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1500, the following is stated to be the law upon the subject of allowing interest for torts to property: "While it has been laid down in many cases that interest will not be allowed on damages recovered for torts to property unless defendant has derived some benefit from his tort, or has been guilty of gross negligence, the general rule, supported by the great weight of authority, is that, in cases of torts to property, interest on the damages may be allowed as a part of the damages and as an approximately uniform measure of compensation." This text is amply sustained by the following authorities: Woodland v. Union P. R. Co. 27 Utah, 543, 26 Pac. 298; Rhemke v. Clinton, 2 Utah, 230; Varco v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 18, 13 N. W. 921; Sabine & E. T. R. Co. v. Jonchimi, 58 Tex. 456; Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, 13 Am. St. Rep. 482, 40 N. W. 948; Union P. R. Co. v. Ray, 46 Neb. 750, 65 N. W. 773; Kendrick v. Towle, 60 Mich.

der a libel for collision, it was held that the libellant was not entitled to interest as against the stipulators for value.

In The Belle, 5 Ben. 57, Fed. Cas. No. 1,270, it was held that in the case of The Ann Caroline, supra, the court failed to notice that the stipulation was also under rule 71.

In an action for damages for a collision, interest was allowed only from the date of decree, in Kerr v. The José E. More, 37 Fed. 123.

Where a libel was filed and a stipulation given for the discharge of a vessel, fixing the value at $1,750, and the stipulation was entered into pursuant to the rule and practice of the court, and a decree was entered against the vessel for $3,707, it was held that the libellant was entitled to recover interest for the $1,750 from the date of the stipulation, under district court rule 71. The Belle, 5 Ben. 57, Fed. Cas. No. 1,270.

In admiralty, where a bond was taken for the appraised value of the vessel, under admiralty rule 54, it was held that the court could require that the bond should provide for interest. Re Harris, 6 C. C. A. 320, 14 U. S. App. 506, 57 Fed. 243.

In Re Harris, supra, it was said: "Appellants contend that the district court erred in requiring a stipulation for interest from the date of the bond upon the appraised value of ship and freight, and insist that, in proceedings under the act of 1851, interest upon such value can be exacted only from the date of the final decree. Several cases are cited in support of this contention (The Ann Caroline; The Wanata; The Manitoba; and Kerr v. The José E. More,—supra); but they are not controlling, because in no one of them did the bond provide for interest, and the obligors in a bond conditioned only to pay the stipulation value upon decree could not be liable for interest until the decree fixed their liability."

And in admiralty, where the owners were entitled to a discharge on turning over the vessel, or paying her value into court, it was held that they should provide for the payment of interest on her value until such time as the money is paid, if they prefer to give bond, instead of paying it at present. The Battler, 58 Fed. 704.

In a libel on a bottomry bond it was held that the libellants were entitled to ordinary interest on the amount loaned, at least, from the commencement of the suit. The Grapeshot, 2 Woods, 42, Fed. Cas. No. 5,703. The court said: "But according to the American authorities, interest will be allowed after a demand of payment, even of an unsettled claim, for goods sold and delivered or services rendered, from the time of the demand; and the presentment of an account or commencement of a suit is sufficient demand on which to found and from which to date a claim of interest."

And in a suit in personam in admiralty for a box of gold sovereigns that was abandoned with the vessel to the custody of wreckers, damages were allowed on the value at Key West, where part of the cargo was saved, with interest on the value from the time when proceedings for salvage were instituted at Key West. King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, 349, Fed. Cas. No. 7,804.

Where a vessel was seized as trading contrary to the nonintercourse act of Feb. 27, 1800, it was held that the claimant was entitled to the return of the vessel and damages, and that the commissioner should be instructed to take the actual prime cost of the cargo and vessel, with interest thereon, including insurance. Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, 64, 2 L. ed. 208.

In Pacific Ins. Co. v. Conard, Baldw. 138, Fed. Cas. No. 10,647, it was said that in marine trespass the Supreme Court laid down the following rule of damages in Murray v. The Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, 124, 2 L. ed. 228: the prime cost of the cargo, interest, insurance, and expenses; in The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. 335, 4 L. ed. 253: the prime cost of the cargo, all charges, insurance, and interest; in The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. 560, 4 L. ed. 459: the prime cost or value of the property at the time of loss, or the diminution of the value, with interest; in The Lively, 1 Gall. 315, Fed. Cas. No. 8,403: the prime cost and interest; in The Apollon, 9 Wheat. 376, 6 L. ed. 111: where the vessel and cargo were lost, their actual value, with interest from the trespass.

And where a vessel was wrongfully seized, it was held that the value of the property

363, 1 Am. St. Rep. 526, 27 N. W. 567; Burdick v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 384, 54 N. W. 439; Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 666, 42 N. W. 512; Dean v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 305; Georgia P. R. Co. v. Fullerton, 79 Ala. 298; Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 141 Mass. 126, 4 N. E. 620; Regan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 60 Conn. 124, 25 Am. St. Rep. 306, 22 Atl. 503; Schmidt v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 371.

While the foregoing by no means constitute all the authorities that could be cited upon the proposition, they are quite sufficient to show that the rule has become general, and that the allowance of interest in cases of torts to property is in harmony with the trend of modern authority. It is quite true that there are cases against this rule, but they are not, as we conceive, based on either good reason or good logic. The rule adhered to in the Kansas and other like cases, as instances where interest is allowed if it appears that the person committing the wrong has to some extent been benefited from it, is, to our minds, manifestly unjust. In such cases interest is not allowed as compensation at all, but upon the sole ground that the person in the wrong must yield up the benefits derived by him to the one to whom they belong by reason of ownership. It is a matter of simple restoration of what has been withheld without adding anything for the use. It is only a mild way of offering a premium to withhold pay in such cases. Is there any reason why a person lost, and, in case of injury, the diminution in value by reason of the injury, with interest thereon, was the true measure for estimating damages. The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. 546, 4 L. ed. 450.

In a suit by an owner of captured property, lost through negligence of the captors, for compensation in damages, it was held that the damages were the value of the vessel and the prime cost of the cargo, with all charges; and the premium of insurance, where it was paid, with interest, was allowed, and out of this to be deducted the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel and cargo, unless the libellants shall choose to abandon those proceeds to the defendant. The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. 327, 4 L. ed. 252.

In Holmes v. Barclay, 4 La. Ann. 63, which was an action for damages caused by a steamboat colliding with a warehouse and a steam mill, plaintiff was allowed to recover the sum of $1,600, with interest from the 28th of March, 1845. There was nothing to show why the court fixed the date in 1845.

In some cases it was held that interest is discretionary with the court or jury.

In an action for a collision, it was held that interest on the damages allowed was proper. It was claimed that interest was discretionary with the jury. The America, 11 Blatchf. 485, Fed. Cas. No. 285. The court said: "The proposition is not unqualifiedly true, without exception. . . . But, if the allowance of interest rests in discretion, still, the indemnity of the party for injury from a collision occurring through the fault of another vessel should be the object of the court in the allowance of damages. In this view, such allowance was, I think, proper. It is, in such case, not allowed as punishment. It is not like the allowance of punitive damages in actions of slander, assault and battery, and like cases. It gives indemnity only."

Where the justices were equally divided, it was held that interest would not be allowed, because that would be a new decree in admiralty on error. Hemmenway v. Fisher, 20 How. 258, 15 L. ed. 799. It was further (L.R.A. (N.S.)

ther held that admiralty cases were not embraced in the 62d rule. The court said: "No rule, therefore, fixing any certain rate of interest upon decrees in admiralty, whenever the decree is affirmed, could be adopted with justice to the parties. And a discretionary power is reserved to add to the damages awarded by the court below further damages by way of interest, in cases where, in the opinion of this court, the appellee, upon the proofs, is justly entitled to such additional damages. But this allowance of interest is not an incident to the affirmance affixed to it by law or by a rule of court. If given by this court, it must be in the exercise of its discretionary power, and, pro tanto, is a new judgment."

In Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. 101, 14 L. ed. 68, which was an action of trespass for injury from a collision between boats, it was held that the proper measure of damages was a sum sufficient to raise the sunken boat, to repair her, and compensate the owner for the loss of her use; that the jury were not bound to give the interest claimed, but should give such damages as were just and equitable. The dissenting opinion held that the rule should be full damages for the injury at the time and place when it occurred, with legal interest on the amount.

Whether interest should be allowed by the court of first instance or by the appellate court in admiralty, on the amount of damages awarded in a collision case, was held to be a matter in the discretion of the court; and the court, on appeal, hearing the case de novo, excluded the item of interest, both vessels being in fault. The North Star, 10 C. C. A. 262, 22 U. S. App. 242, 62 Fed. 71.

In an action for damages for collision by steamboats, interest was denied. Ormsby v. Johnson, 1 B. Mon. 80.

But in Schulte v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 128 Ky. 627, 108 S. W. 941, Ormsby v. Johnson, supra, was not followed, the court saying: "The better rule is the one that allows the jury, in their discretion, to award interest in cases of this character."

In a libel for collision, it was held that sustaining injury and damage to his property from the negligent act of another should not receive just what he has lost as nearly as this may be accomplished in a court of justice? If a person's property is destroyed or damaged, why is he not entitled to be compensated to the full extent of its value in money, so that he may replace the same with other property of a like nature? If, on the day of its injury or destruction, he restores or replaces it with his own money, why is he not entitled to interest on that money to the date of repayment? If he had loaned the money to someone, he certainly would be entitled to interest, and, if he borrowed it from someone, he would likely have to pay interest for its use. By being awarded legal interest, therefore, he is simply placed in statu quo, and nothing short of this is full compensation, and that is just what the law aims to accomplish. Is it an answer to say that the damages are unliquidated, and therefore interest is not to be allowed? This, to our minds, is no reason at all in case of injury to or destruction of property. In all such cases the party sustaining the loss is limited in his recovery to the market or actual value of the property at the time of the injury or destruction. Moreover, he must establish the amount of the loss by some fixed rule or standard, and the evidence must be confined thereto, and either the court or jury must find the value in accordance with the evidence. In the class of cases, therefore, where the damage is complete, and the amount of the loss is interest on bills incurred for salvage and repairs was a matter of discretion, as the vessel was made more valuable after repairs than she was before collision. There was some doubt whether the entire bill ought to be charged against the respondent, and it was held that interest should be refused. The Alaska, 44 Fed. 498. See further, Actions against a common carrier, V., infra.

IV. Bonds and undertakings.

a. Official bonds.

This note is not intended to include actions on bonds of guardians, administrators, or executors.

The weight of authority seems to be that interest will be allowed although the amount recovered may exceed the penalty of the bond. There are quite a good many cases and some conflict in discussing the question whether or not a recovery can exceed the penalty of the bond, where there was no issue made as to the interest. These cases where interest was not involved are not included in this note. There are some exceptional cases in Missouri and Virginia that refuse all interest where the official did not profit by the wrong.

In an action on a penal bond given by a cashier of a bank, it was held although the bond did not carry interest as in the contract, interest on the amount of the penal sum could be added by way of damages for the detention. Bank of Brighton v. Smith, 12 Allen, 243, 90 Am. Dec. 144. In this case the judgment was thereby made to exceed the penalty.

And in an action of debt on a penal bond for the payment of custom duties, it was held that the court should go beyond the penalty and allow interest from the time it became due by the breach, and the judgment was rendered in the amount of the penalty, with interest from the time it became payable. United States v. Arnold, 1 Gall. 348, Fed. Cas. No. 14,460.

In an action on a penal bond given by a bank cashier, where he had been guilty of misconduct, and there had been no previous demand of the penalty or an acknowledgment that the whole was due, it was held that interest could be allowed from the commencement of the suit, but no further. M'Gill v. Bank of United States, 12 Wheat. 511, 6 L. ed. 711, affirming 1 Paine, 661, Fed. Cas. No. 920. This was on the ground that it was somewhat analogous to an obligation to pay a certain sum of money on demand; in which case interest accrued only from the commencement of the suit, when no actual demand is shown.

And sureties on a paymaster's bond were held liable over and above the penalty of the bond, in the nature of interest, only for so much as accrued from their nonpayment after notice of the principal's default. United States v. Hills, 4 Cliff. 618, Fed. Cas. No. 15,369. In this case the sureties were held liable from the date of the writ.

In United States v. Curtis, 100 U. S. 119, 25 L. ed. 571, which was an action on a paymaster's bond, it was held that the sureties were liable for interest from notice of defalcation, which, in this case, was held to be from the time of suit.

In an action on a county treasurer's bond for money converted, it was held that interest could be computed on such funds from the time they should have been accounted for. Thomassen v. Hall County, 63 Neb. 777, 57 L.R.A. 303, 89 N. W. 389. The court said: "Under the provisions of § 4, chapter 44, Compiled Statutes 1901, it would seem that interest should be computed from January 4, 1898, when the money became due."

In Chenango v. Birdsall, 4 Wend. 453, the sureties on a county treasurer's bond were held liable for interest, as legitimate damages arising from the breach on failure to pay over the money.

The same was held in Monroe County v. Clark, 92 N. Y. 391. In this case the sureties were held exonerated from the bounty moneys unaccounted for, by reason of the terms of the bond, but were liable for the balance.

Under Virginia revenue act 1782, Stat. at L. 112, providing that in actions against a public collector for failure to pay over taxes, judgments were to be entered for the prinfixed as of a particular time, there is—there can be—no reason why interest should be withheld merely because the damages are unliquidated. There are certain cases of unliquidated damages where interest cannot be allowed. In all personal injury cases, cases of death by wrongful act, libel, slander, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, assault and battery, and all cases where the damages are incomplete and are peculiarly within the province of the jury to assess at the time of the trial, no interest is permissible. But this is so because the damages are continuing and may even reach beyond the time of trial.

There are also other cases where interest is not allowed, such as where exemplary damages are permitted, where the statute fixes a penalty or determines the damages to be allowed. Of the latter class of cases, Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Jones, 29 Utah, 147, 80 Pac. 732, is, in part, an illustration. Some courts also seem to make a distinction between gross or wilful negligence and ordinary negligence. In the former, interest is given; in the latter it is withheld. This is arbitrary at best. The loss to the injured person is precisely the same in either case, and he should receive compensation,—no more, no less. There is another class of cases where the matter is relegated to the jury or the court trying the case to allow interest or not, as in their judgment may seem proper, as a part of the damages to be allowed. This rule does not seem to be based upon any sound reason. Moreover, it must be held erroneous to allow interest also, beginning prior to the judgment. Gaskins v. Com. 1 Call (Va.) 194.

In an action on the bond of a judge of probate for conversion of money belonging to a minor, sureties were held liable for the money converted, with interest thereon. Bradley v. Harden, 73 Ala. 70.

And in an action for conversion against a constable on a bond, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the goods seized at the time of conversion, with interest from that time to the judgment. Carlson v. Lannan, 4 Nev. 156.

But in an action for damages on the official bond of a sheriff for failure to execute a writ, it was held that in such cases, based upon the negligence of the defendant, who was not benefited by reason of the wrong, interest was not allowable. State ex rel. Planet Property & Financial Co. v. Harrington, 44 Mo. App. 297. The court said: "The rule which we extract from the adjudications of this state in reference to the recovery of interest as damages in actions of tort is that, where an action ex delicto is based upon the simple negligence of the defendant, to whom no pecuniary benefit has or could have accrued by reason of the injury or wrong, interest is not allowable."

And in an action of debt on a sheriff's bond for false return of "no property," it was held that the damages were the amount due on the execution at the return day, but no interest should be allowed. Gibson v. Governor, 11 Leigh, 600.

b. Replevin bonds.

The general rule is that in action on replevin bonds, interest will be allowed from the time of breach. There is some conflict of authority as to whether the damages, including interest, may exceed the penalty, Massachusetts and Maine holding the affirmative, on the ground that it is compensation for nonpayment after due; Michigan and Vermont hold contrary.

In a suit on a replevin bond, where the plaintiff had failed to return the property, and the suit was dismissed, it was held that he would be liable for the value of the property not returned, with interest. Pace v. Neal, 92 Ill. App. 410.

And where the plaintiff in replevin, on a judgment of return, failed to return some of the goods, and injured the others, it was held that the measure of damages on his bond was the value of the goods not returned, with interest from the time of replevin, and the deterioration in value of the others, with interest from the date of their return. Yelton v. Slinkard, 85 Ind. 190.

And in an action on a replevin bond for failure to return property and for conversion, interest on the value of the property from the date of judgment of return was allowed as damages. Walls v. Johnson, 16 Ind. 374. This was under Ind. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 122, authorizing the giving of damages for the detention of property.

And in an action of replevin, the verdict was for defendant, and judgment was rendered against plaintiff and his surety in the bond for the amount thus returned, with interest from the commencement of the action. It was held there was no error in allowing interest on the value of the property from the time it was wrongfully taken by the writ of replevin. Hurd v. Gallaher, 14 Iowa, 394.

In debt on a bond to prosecute a suit in replevin, it was held that the measure of plaintiff's damages was the value of the goods replevied, with the damages and costs recovered in the replevin, and interest from the date of judgment in replevin to the time of trial. Kenney v. Tucker, 8 Mass. 145.

In an action of debt on a replevin bond, where the defendant confessed to forfeiture, the court said: "That where a replevin suit is tried, the jury are to assess damages for the taking and detention, and such assessment is conclusive of the amount of damages to the time of the verdict, on a subsequent hearing in chancery, upon a forfeiture of the replevin bond. And that where the suit in which the goods were attached has come to judgment during the pendency of the replevin suit, for so long a time as satisfaction of the execution was delayed by lead to uncertainty, and may tend to favoritism in its application. In one case the jury may allow 20 per cent, in another only 2, and in another none at all, although the cases may be essentially the same. If the law is to be treated as a science, it should be as nearly exact as it can be made, and its operation should be uniform. In those cases the courts hold that, if the amount allowed by the jury in the form of interest makes the damages excessive, then the courts will require a remittitur of the excess or grant a new trial. The whole matter, then, resolves itself into a question of excessive damages. If the amount allowed by the jury is excessive—that is, not supported by the evidence when considered as a whole—in cases where the amount of damage is to be ascertained as of a particular time and in accordance with fixed rules of evidence and known standards of value, or if the damages allowed are excessive, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, the trial courts should, when a motion for a new trial is made upon that ground, require a remittitur of the excess, or grant a new trial. The power and discretion to do this is expressly vested in the trial courts of this state, and should be exercised whenever it is manifest that justice and right require it; and, unless this appears, the courts should not interfere with the verdict of the jury. When excessive damages are allowed, the case should be treated and corrected as such, and not by this court or any court assuming the power to arbitrarily the interposition and pendency of the replevin suit, in analogy to the statute, 6 per cent on the penalty of the bond, being 12 per cent on the value of the goods, shall be allowed. For all the rest of the time 6 per cent on the value of the goods shall be assessed as damages for the detention, in analogy to the rules of law in relation to damages for detention of money." Huggeford v. Ford, 11 Pick. 223.

So, in Caldwell v. West, 21 N. J. L. 411, the damages were held to be the value of the goods, with interest from the judgment of return. The court said: "The charge was right; the judgment below was merely retorno habendo, and the damages only nominal (Gordon v. Williamson, 20 N. J. L. 79); but from the time of the rendition thereof, the right of recovery was in the defendant, either against the sheriff, for taking insufficient security, or in the name of the sheriff, on the replevin bond; and the value of the goods at the time of the recovery, together with interest thereon from that time, is the proper and reasonable measure of damages."

In Peacock v. Haney, 37 N. J. L. 179, the measure of damages was held to be, as a general rule, the value of the goods, and interest thereon from the judgment of the return. The damages must be assessed by a writ of inquiry.

Ky. act 1748 expressly allows interest, and it should be included in a bond for replevying a distress. McCormick v. Young, 3 J. J. Marsh. 181.

So, in an action on a replevin bond given to secure rent, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of the judgment against the principal. Stevens v. Simmons, 1 McCord, L. 28.

In Brainard v. Jones, 18 N. Y. 35, it was held that the recovery could exceed the penalty so as to include interest. This was on the ground that when the time had come for the surety to discharge his liability, and he neglected or refused to do so, he should compensate the creditor for the delay which he had interposed. The legal measure of this compensation would be interest on the sum which he ought to have paid, from the time when the payment was due from him. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So far as necessary to secure the damages sustained by the obligee, the recovery may go beyond the sum of the penalty by allowing interest on such sum from the date of the breach. Wyman v. Robinson, 73 Me. 384, 40 Am. Rep. 360. This was on the ground that it was not any part of the penalty, but as damages for the nonpayment or the detention of the penalty after it became payable and due. The obligee was to have the penalty at a particular and definite time. Immediately upon a breach of the bond the penalty was due him.

A similar ruling was made in Leighton v. Brown, 98 Mass. 515. The court said: "Judgment is to be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the penalty of the bond. Gen. Stats. chap. 133, §§ 9, 10. But interest on the penal sum therein named from the date of the breach may be added as damages for the detention, and will form a part of the judgment for the penalty to be rendered both against principal and sureties."

But in Fraser v. Little, 13 Mich. 195, 87 Am. Dec. 741, where the judgment against sureties on a replevin bond was the amount of the bond, it was held that no judgment could be recovered beyond the penalty. Christiancy, J., dissenting, said: "Most of the cases which have denied the right to recover beyond the penalty are cases which did not involve this question of interest. I think the weight of American authority is in favor of the allowance. But, however this may be, the rule which allows such interest beyond the penalty, after breach, is the only one to be deduced from all the authorities, English and American, which rest upon any sound and intelligible principle."

And in Miltimore v. Bottom, 66 Vt. 168, 28 Atl. 872, a surety was held not liable for interest on the damages in an action on a replevin bond, where the damages amounted to the penalty.

And in an action of debt on a replevin bond, it was held that interest was not recoverable, as the only condition of the bond was to return the goods. Hart v. Tobias, 2 Bay, 408. This bond was given to secure a rent debt where the goods were seized under a distress.

withhold interest in all cases of unliquidated damages. General justice is never promoted by an effort to reach it by ignoring sound principles of law in particular cases. Whenever possible, it ought not be left to the mere caprice of either court or jury to either grant or withhold that which is due. A fixed rule, when based on sound principles, is, in most instances, a safer guide than the judgment of a few individuals, however honest or pure their motives.

Counsel for appellant, however, rely on the case of Lester v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 27 Utah, 470, 101 Am. St. Rep. 988, 70 Pac. 341, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 761, where it is broadly held by this court that interest is not allowable in cases of tort for unliquidated damages. That case, however, is, as we have attempted to show, not only against reason, but against the great weight of authority. Moreover, it is against the rule laid down by this court in the cases of Rhemke v. Clinton and Woodland v. Union P. R. Co. supra. The latter case should have been reported in 7 Utah, but is found in 27 Utah, 543, 26 Pac. 298. The rule, therefore, that we have announced herein, has practically been the rule of this state since the decision in 2 Utah, supra, and that case has been cited by both text writers and courts as placing Utah in the category of states allowing interest, in cases of torts to property, from the time of injury or destruction. In the Lester Case, supra, no authority is cited, except the case of Nichols v. Union P. R. Co. 7 Utah, 510, 27 Pac. 693.

c. Injunction bonds.

The general rule is that after the dissolution of an injunction, legal interest on the debt or judgment enjoined will be held to be the measure of damages. In Massachusetts and New York recoveries were allowed although principal and interest exceeded the penalty. The same was held in Mississippi in an equity case. But in a law case in the latter state, and in Tennessee, the contrary was held. In some cases where the damages could not be computed interest was not allowed.

The confirmation of a report of a referee fixing damages on an injunction bond was held the time from which to compute interest, as that was the time the obligor's liability was fixed. Poillon v. Volkenning, 11 Hun, 385. In this case the judgment was for the amount of the bond, with interest.

An injunction bond provided for the payment of $245 interest then due on a second mortgage, and for keeping down interest on a prior mortgage of $9,000. On dissolution of the injunction, the property sold for enough to pay the first, but not the second, mortgage. It was held in an action on the bond that a recovery could be had for $245 and interest, and interest on the first mortgage to the dissolution of the injunction. Foster v. Goodrich, 127 Mass. 176.

And where the judgment enjoined and interest exceeded the penalty of the bond, interest was held proper not to exceed the principal and interest on the judgment. Marshall v. Minter, 43 Miss. 666. The court said that in an action at law the recovery would be limited to the amount of the penalty.

The difference between the value of property when its sale was enjoined, and the value when sold, with interest not to exceed the penalty, was held to be the measure of damages in Rubon v. Stephan, 25 Miss. 253.

In an action on an injunction bond, legal interest only is proper. Lally v. Wise, 28 Cal. 539; Aillet v. Henry, 2 La. Ann. 145; Woods v. Wylie, 8 La. Ann. 18. In the latter L.R.A. (N.S.)

ter case it was held that interest on interest was not proper.

The damages on dissolution of an injunction on a judgment are the principal, interest, and costs due at the time of the injunction. Washington v. Parks, 6 Leigh, 581.

Interest is proper, but only on the amount due at the time of the injunction. Cannon v. Labarre, 13 La. 399. The La. Code Pr. March 25, 1831, provides that on the dissolution of an injunction, the plaintiff and his surety shall be condemned to pay interest at 10 per cent on the judgment, and the order of seizure could only have been obtained in this case upon that part of the debt then due.

And a surety on an injunction bond was held required to pay interest accruing on the judgment enjoined in Weatherby v. Shackelford, 37 Miss. 559.

And interest on the debt when an action at law was enjoined is proper. Horton v. Cope, 6 Lea, 155. And the same was held where payment of a debt was enjoined. Heyman v. Landers, 12 Cal. 107. In this case the court said: "The legal interest in such cases is the only measure which can be followed with certainty."

In an action on an injunction bond for damages for restraining the sale of property under a mortgage, interest upon the whole sum on which the collection was suspended may be a part of the damages consequent upon the injunction. Aldrich v. Reynolds, 1 Barb. Ch. 613.

And in an action on an injunction bond given to restrain payment of a sum of money, interest is recoverable as a matter of right up to the time it was paid upon the dissolution of the injunction. Wallis v. Dilley, 7 Md. 237. In this case the debtor offered to invest the money to reduce the interest.

And where a judgment for purchase money is enjoined, interest on the purchase money should be allowed. Hill v. Thomas, 10 S. C. 230.

On a judgment being enjoined, interest is proper, but only to the time of the dis-

The other two cases are not mentioned. An examination of the Nichols Case discloses that it was correctly decided, and is in accordance with the view herein expressed, since it falls within that class of cases where the damages were continuing, and therefore entirely within the province of the jury to fix and assess as of the time of trial. The case, therefore, was not an authority upon the question decided in the Lester Case. While we have not been able to find any cases, except from Missouri (undoubtedly there are such), that withhold interest in a case like the one at bar, we do not desire for that reason to make a distinction in respect to the Lester Case, where there is no difference in principle. Counsel for appellant therefore had a right to rely on the Lester

Case, but, as that case is wrong in principle, in reason, and against the great weight of authority, as well as against the former decisions of this court upon the subject, it should be, and accordingly is, overruled upon the subject of allowing interest in cases of unliquidated damages.

Counsel for appellant also cite some other cases. The California cases, as well as the Nevada case, are all based upon statutes which those courts construe as forbidding interest in the class of cases passed upon. Our statute (Rev. Stat. 1898, § 1241) is general, allowing interest in all cases at the legal rate, in the absence of an agreement. Moreover, with perhaps one or two exceptions, all the cases cited by counsel are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. In most solution of the injunction. Amis v. Bank of Kentucky, 8 La. Ann. 441.

In Gist v. McGuire, 4 Harr. & J. 10, a recovery of interest was held proper where a judgment was enjoined, and after dissolution of the injunction the judgment was paid without interest, on account of mistake in computation.

Where payment of dividends on stock was enjoined, on dissolution of the injunction, it was held that the stockholders could recover interest accruing pending the injunction. Heck v. Bulkley (Tenn.) 1 S. W. 612.

The measure of damages which plaintiffs in judgment are entitled to receive, for loss of the benefit of their levies through wrongful injunction, is the interest on the fund that the execution creditors would have received, if their execution had not been arrested, and property taken from the marshal. Dodge v. Cohen, 14 App. D. C. 582.

But where a judgment was enjoined, and then satisfied by collecting on execution after dissolution of the injunction, it was held that interest could not thereafter be collected for the time enjoined. Grundy v. Young, 2 Cranch, C. C. 114, Fed. Cas. No. 5,851.

Under Mo. Sess. Acts 1849, p. 85, § 12, providing that, on the dissolution of an injunction, damages shall be assessed, but if money shall have been enjoined, the damages shall not exceed 10 per cent, exclusive of legal interest and costs, it was held that the damages in such cases were not limited to 10 per cent, but might extend to the full amount of the debt. Kennedy v. Hammond, 16 Mo. 341. But where a sale of trust property was enjoined, it was necessary to ascertain the damages, not by the rule of per cent, but by the injury the creditor had sustained. St. Louis v. Alexander, 23 Mo. 483.

In Rhea v. McCorkle, 11 Heisk. 415, it was held that where the damages amounted to the face of the bond, interest could not be added. The covenant was only for the penalty.

In some cases, under special circumstances, interest was not allowed.

Interest as damages was disallowed when the payment of money was enjoined, but the debtor had the use of it, and did not pay it 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

into court. Bullock v. Ferguson, 30 Ala. 227. In this case no supersedeas bond was given, and interest was sought for the time between the dissolution of the injunction and the affirmance of the decree.

Where an order of seizure was enjoined, it was held that interest should not be allowed. Poydras v. Patin, 5 La. 324. The court said: "The damages which had accrued down to the time when the slaves were sold constitute an unliquidated claim, and no obligation to pay conventional interest arises out of the injunction bond." The court held that calculating interest on the debt, and crediting principal and interest with the amount realized on the sale, would leave a balance that would constitute the damages.

And where damages on an injunction bond could not be estimated or ascertained by means of the contract, and could only be made certain by proof on the trial, it was held that interest on the damages should not be allowed. Hooper v. Patterson (Cal.) 32 Pac. 514.

An injunction bond was given by the owner of a tax deed to enjoin a foreclosure of a mortgage. In an action on the injunction bond it was held that the plaintiff's claim of value of the use of the land for the time he was kept out of possession, or interest on the sum for which he would have to bid it in at the sale, should not be allowed. In this case the judgment on the injunction was that it be dissolved, and that defendant convey the land to the plaintiff. Bullard v. Harkness, 83 Iowa, 373, 49 N. W. 855. The plaintiff claimed that the land was worth $1,600, and he would have bid it in at that sum and obtained a sheriff's deed if injunction had not been granted; but it was held it was impossible to know what the result of the sale would have been.

And interest as against sureties was held not proper where it was not shown that the defendant in an action at law which he had enjoined was insolvent. Derry Bank v. Heath, 45 N. H. 524.

And where payment of an execution was enjoined at the instance of a third party, it was held in an action at law on the bond of them the matter of the amount to be allowed as damages was not controlled by either a fixed time or by known standards of value, and are thus decided in accordance with the principles adopted by us in this case.

The true test to be applied as to whether interest should be allowed before judgment in a given case or not is, therefore, not whether the damages are unliquidated or otherwise, but whether the injury and consequent damages are complete and must be ascertained as of a particular time and in accordance with fixed rules of evidence and known standards of value, which the court or jury must follow in fixing the amount, rather than be guided by their best judgment in assessing the amount to be allowed for past as well as for future injury, or for elements that cannot be measured by any fixed standards of value. The same rule, under the same conditions, would of necessity apply to actions for breach of contract. This is illustrated by some of the California cases, as well as by the Nevada case cited by counsel for appellant. As the case at bar falls clearly within the rule where the amount is computed as of a fixed time, and in accordance with fixed rules of evidence as to value, the court did not err in computing, on the amount of damages found, interest at the legal rate.

The judgment therefore is affirmed, with costs.

McCarthy, Ch. J., and Straup, J., concur.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

that interest should not be allowed on the fund in the sheriff's hands. Gadsden v. Bank of Georgetown, 5 Rich. L. 336. This was on the ground that full relief could have been awarded in the equity action.

d. Other bonds.

The general rule seems to be that in actions on indemnifying bonds, appeal bonds, and the like, interest is to be allowed. Some cases on this subject also allow interest even if the damages are thereby increased beyond the penalty.

On an indemnity bond to secure the payment of money in New York, by debtors who were trustees in Connecticut, to attach the money in their hands, it was held that interest was properly charged from the time of notice of default. This was held, although the principal, with interest, was in excess of the penalty. Lyon v. Clark, 8 N. Y. 148. The apparent conflict in the cases was explained in this case to arise from confounding actions on bonds for the performance of covenants with actions for the recovery of money only, saying: "In the former case the recovery is, in general, if not always, limited by the penalty, and in the latter it is not."

In an action on an indemnity bond given to a sheriff, interest may be added to the full amount of the penalty only from the date of the breach alleged. Omaha Carpet Co. v. Clapp, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 406, 89 N. W. 246. The court said: "In this connection it seems clear that the right to demand the penalty of the bond accrued, so far as the petition in this action discloses, only on the payment of the money; and it would therefore seem that it was error for the court to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the amount of that penalty, with interest from the giving of the bond."

And in an action of debt on a bond for a penalty against sureties, interest beyond the penalty may be recovered in the form of damages. Harris v. Clap, 1 Mass. 308, 2 Am. Dec. 27. The court said: "But in going beyond the penalty of the bond, the court do not go out of the contract. It is no more than the common case of a bond conditioned for the payment of money lying until the sum mentioned in the condition, with the interest of it, exceeds the penalty,—in which cases the court will give the excess as damages for the detention of the debt; in no case, however, going so far beyond the penalty as to exceed the legal interest on the penalty."

In an action on a penal bond on a sub-let contract to carry mail, interest as damages was allowed beyond the penalty for delay in payment. Burchfield v. Haffey, 34 Kan. 42, 7 Pac. 548.

In an action on a penal bond given to protect the defendant in a suit on a note, where he had been served with attachment in another state, plaintiff recovered the amount of the bond, and interest thereon, as damages beyond the penalty. Lyons v. Clark, supra.

In Clark v. Bush, 3 Cow. 151, which was an action of debt on a bond securing the payment of money, the court said: "In debt on bond nothing more than the penalty can be recovered; at any rate, nothing beyond that and interest, after a forfeiture, even against the principal obligor." This case is used here although for a liquidated sum, because it is said to conflict with cases allowing interest in excess of the penalty.

In an action on a bond conditioned for the maintenance of a child, interest will not be allowed where it would compel the payment of an amount beyond the penalty of the bond, especially against the surety. Fairlie v. Lawson, 5 Cow. 424.

On an appeal from a decree in admiralty, the surety gave a penal bond to pay all cost and damages which might be adjudged in the supreme court, where the case was heard on agreed facts. In an action against the surety on the appeal bond, it was held proper to render judgment for the penalty of the bond (being less than the judgment under the mandate), and to allow interest from the date of suit, although the amount to be paid would exceed the penalty of the bond. Ives v. Merchants' Bank, 12 How.

159, 13 L. ed. 948. In this case the surety was bound in the penal bond, and this penalty the court exceeded by allowing interest on it from the time of demand by suit. It was claimed that this was error,—the action was debt and damages for detention. It was held that the judiciary act of 1789, § 26, giving the court power to assess damages according to equity on default, confession, or demurrer, did not apply to cases heard on submission, distinguishing Farrar v. United States, 5 Pet. 385, 8 L. ed. 104, which held in an action of debt against sureties the practice was to render judgment in debt for the penalty, to be discharged by the amount actually due, and this amount could not exceed the penalty. It was held that where unascertained damages were claimed and contested, this was the proper rule; but here the surety was bound to pay damages that might be adjudged against his principal in the supreme court, that were settled at $6,078, and this judgment bore 6 per cent from its date, and the surety was bound to pay it to the extent of $2,500. The rule was applied of requiring interest from the time the demand of the payment was made by suit.

In an action on a bond guaranteeing a contract to furnish granite, where there was a failure to furnish it, and plaintiffs had to procure the same elsewhere, it was held that where the amount and value could be ascertained by computation, the plaintiffs were entitled to interest, although the damages were unliquidated. Degnon-McLean Constr. Co. v. City Trust, S. D. & S. Co. 99 App. Div. 195, 90 N. Y. Supp. 1029, affirmed in 184 N. Y. 544, 76 N. E. 1093. This was on the ground that the general rule prohibiting interest on damages unliquidated would not deprive a party of interest if there was, at the time the demand was made for payment, means accessible to the party sought to be charged of ascertaining, by computation or otherwise, the amount to which the other party was entitled.

In an action to recover possession of personal property, where a bond was given and possession retained, and there was depreciation in value, it was held that value at the time of taking and interest from the time of taking to the verdict should be allowed. Young v. Willet, 8 Bosw. 486.

In an action on a delivery bond for goods seized in execution, it was held that the damages were the amount due on the execution, with interest and 10 per cent damages. Mitchell v. Denbo, 3 Blackf. 259.

In an action on an indemnifying bond given by execution plaintiffs to a sheriff to induce him to seize mortgaged chattels, the mortgagee was given a judgment drawing the same interest as the note secured by mortgage. Rand v. Barrett, 60 Iowa, 731, 24 N. W. 530. The court said: "The holding is put upon the ground that, as the condition of the indemnifying bond is that defendants will indemnify the claimants of the property for the damages which they will sustain in consequence of the seizure and sale of the property on their claim, the measure of their liability is the value of the interest of the claimant in the property at the time the damages are paid; which, as the value of the property exceeds the amount of the debts secured by plaintiffs' mortgages, will be the amount of said debts at the time of payment."

And in an action on an indemnifying bond for wrongful taking of goods, the value at the time of taking, with interest up to the time of trial, was held to be the measure of damages. State use of Hayden v. Smith, 31 Mo. 566.

Where a vessel was attached for causing a collision, and a bond was given to discharge the vessel, it was held that the amount of the plaintiff's lien upon the vessel was due and payable when the bond was executed, and he was entitled to interest from that date. Fitch v. Livingston, 4 Sandf. 492. The court said: "In actions of assumpsit for not delivering goods on a bill of lading or charter party, interest is allowable if there were any wrongful or improper conduct; and it is allowed on an unliquidated debt, payable at a fixed time, as upon rent payable in services and grain."

But where a judgment for money did not bear interest, it was held that a judgment on a supersedeas bond did not bear interest. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sharp, 91 Ky. 411, 16 S. W. 86.

In an action on a penal bond given for the purpose of dissolving an attachment, it was held that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover interest during the pendency of the suit, in which the defendant was summoned as their trustee, as interest was not due by the terms of the contract, so as to constitute a part of the debt. It was further held that they could only recover interest for unjustly detaining the debt. Huntress v. Burbank, 111 Mass. 213. The court said: "Nothing appears in the case to take it out of the general rule that a debtor is not chargeable with interest as damages for delay in the payment of a debt, when such delay is caused by his being summoned as the trustee of the creditor."

V. Actions against a common carrier.

a. Generally.

In actions against carriers for damages from loss of goods shipped, or for injury to the same, or for delay in delivering, the rule, according to the weight of authority, is to allow interest from time of loss, estimating the value at the time and place of delivery. In some few cases interest was allowed in the discretion of the jury. In others, interest was allowed in the nature of damages, and not as interest eo nomine. In Illinois there seems to be a conflict in the cases, arising from the nature of the pleadings and form of action. In Texas the weight of authority is in favor of interest, the rule being worked out in the later cases. In Tennessee interest was held improper. In Missouri the rule is to allow interest in actions against carriers, although the Supreme Court of the United States in New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 37 L. ed. 292, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444, said that the rule in that state was the contrary.

b. Loss of goods.

In an action against a common carrier for loss of goods transported by it, the measure of damages is the value at the point of destination, with interest; and the failure to except to an illegal charge as to interest was held to be a waiver. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506.

And in an action for compensation for goods lost at sea while on defendant's vessel, the carrier should pay the net value at place of delivery, with interest from the time the goods should have arrived. Bazin v. Steamship Co. 3 Wall. Jr. 229, Fed. Cas. No. 1,152.

And in an action against a common carrier for loss of goods, it was held that the measure of damages was the net value at point of destination, deducting freight, and the jury were authorized to add interest. Woodward v. Illinois C. R. Co. 1 Biss. 403, Fed. Cas. No. 18,006.

Interest may be allowed by the jury as part of the damages. Kyle v. Laurens R. Co. 10 Rich. L. 382, 70 Am. Dec. 231. This was on the ground that the plaintiff's loss was as of so much cash.

And in an action against a common carrier for loss of baggage, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the time of conversion. McCormick v. Pennsylvania C. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 303. The court said: "In the action of trover, interest is as necessary a part of a complete indemnity as the value itself; and, in fixing the damages, is not any more in the discretion of the jury than the value."

Or from the time of loss to the date of the verdict. Fraloff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Blatchf. 16, Fed. Cas. No. 5,025.

In an action against a railroad for loss of baggage, it was said that formerly interest could not be recovered on unliquidated damages, but interest was allowed in this case, as it originated on a contract between bailor and bailee, and the amount of the value of the property lost by plaintiff became due from the day of the loss, and was from that time an indebtedness, and the later rule is to allow interest. Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 22, 1 Am. Rep. 212. The court said: "And it appears to us that, under the rule as now understood, and the provision of the statute, Revision, § 1787, interest is recoverable in this case at the rate fixed by the instructions."

See Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 724, subd. V. h, Texas cases, infra.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gabbert, 34 Kan. 132, 8 Pac. 218 (subd. XIV.) the cases of Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, and Dean v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 305, were distinguished, as this was an L.R.A. (N.S.)

action under a statute, and not at common law.

In Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 422, the case of Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, was distinguished, the court saying: "Without doubting the rule announced in that case, we are not prepared to apply it to this. The facts upon which recovery of interest was there allowed are very different from those which are presented in the case at bar. But while we decline to apply the rule of the case cited, and allow interest eo nomine, we are of the opinion that interest may be considered as an element of damage under the rule which permits its allowance in order to arrive at the sum which will be a just and lawful compensation for the injury sustained. It is true that, practically, the result is the same as though interest were allowed eo nomine."

In an action against a carrier for failing to deliver, it was held that the value of the goods, with interest from the day they should have been delivered, was the measure of damages. Sherman v. Wells, 28 Barb. 403; Robinson v. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. 45 Iowa, 470.

And in an action for nondelivery of goods pursuant to a contract of affreightment, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the goods at the point of destination. Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. 24, 8 Am. Dec. 205. In this case the goods were shipped from Great Britain to the United States, and the charterer of the ship procured the cargo to be captured as a prize by a British cruiser. The court said: "Whether interest ought to be allowed or not depends, principally, upon the light in which the defendant's conduct, or that of his agents, is viewed. The jury might have given interest, by way of damages; and the verdict being subject to the opinion of the court, we are substituted in the place of the jury. If there was any fraud or gross misconduct attending the transaction, interest ought to be allowed. But we are inclined to think the conduct of the defendant's agents ought not to be stamped with so odious a character. They appear to have acted under an impression that the goods, if sent on to New Orleans, would inevitably have been seized and forfeited, and entirely lost to the owners, and that what they did would promote their interest. So that, upon the whole, we think interest ought not to be allowed."

And where a libel was brought for the nondelivery of a cargo, the measure of damages was held to be the value at the port of destination, with interest from the time the goods should have been delivered. The Gold Hunter, 1 Blatchf. & H. 300, Fed. Cas. No. 5,513.

And in an action against a common carrier for failing to deliver gold coin, it was held that the measure of damages was the value in legal tender notes at the time and place of delivery, with interest from the date of demand. Cushing v. Wells, F. & Co. 98 Mass. 550.

In an action against a carrier for not delivering goods, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the goods at the place of delivery and at the time when they should have been delivered, with interest from that time. Spring v. Haskell, 4 Allen, 112.

Erie R. Co. v. Lockwood, 28 Ohio St. 358, said the general rule, where goods are lost by a carrier while in his hands, is to allow the value of the goods at the destination, with interest.

In Clarke-Lawrence Co. v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 63 W. Va. 423, 61 S. E. 364, which was an action against a common carrier for failing to deliver, damages were assessed at $144, and judgment rendered accordingly, including interest from the time the goods should have been delivered.

In Clines v. Frisbee, 5 Rob. (La.) 192, it was held that interest was due from judicial demand, where the sum claimed arose out of a contract, although the amount was not liquidated.

The shipper is entitled to interest on the value of the goods from the time of loss. Blumenthal v. Brainerd, 38 Vt. 402, 91 Am. Dec. 349; Harris v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 61 N. Y. 656; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mudford, 44 Ark. 439.

Under S. C. act 1903, p. 81, providing that a common carrier shall be liable for the amount of loss or damage, with interest from the date of filing the claim, it was held that it was error to refuse evidence for the defendant, showing the value of the property, and that it was not bound by plaintiff's invoice. Brown v. Northwestern R. Co. 75 S. C. 20, 54 S. E. 829.

In an action of assumpsit on a bill of lading for goods lost, it was held that the question of interest depended on circumstances. Watkinson v. Laughton, 8 Johns. 213. The court said: "The jury may give interest, by way of damages, in cases in which the conduct of the master was improper. But here, no bad conduct is to be imputed to him, and interest is not, in every case, and of course, recoverable, because the amount of the loss is unliquidated, and sound in damages, to be assessed by the jury."

In an action against a carrier for non-delivery of property, it was held discretionary with the jury whether they might allow interest. Richmond v. Bronson, 5 Denio, 55.

In Richmond v. Bronson, supra, the case of Lush v. Druse, 4 Wend. 313, was distinguished, the court saying: "Neither of those reasons applies to the present case. In cases like this, where there is only the general undertaking as carriers, where the loss of the goods may have been matter of accident, without any wilfulness or intentional misconduct on the part of the carrier, and where there may be circumstances of mitigation, it is quite proper that the jury should have it in their discretion to do justice according to the circumstances by allowing or withholding interest." 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In an action against an insurance company, the assignee of goods shipped by a common carrier was held entitled to the value of the cotton destroyed by fire through negligence at the time of the loss, with interest from the day on which the cotton should have been delivered. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 3 McCrary, 233, 9 Fed. 811.

In an action against a railroad company for cotton that was burned in transportation, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the cotton at the time and place of its destruction, or at any place from the point of shipment to the place for delivery, plus interest. Rome R. Co. v. Sloan, 39 Ga. 636.

In Whitney v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Wis. 327, interest was held recoverable in an action against a common carrier for damages from fire.

But in an action against a carrier for goods destroyed by fire, where the carrier was without fault, and received no advantage from the possession of the goods, it was held that interest should not be allowed. Lakeman v. Grinnell, 5 Bosw. 625. In this case the plaintiffs had demanded by their action more than the court adjudged them to be entitled to, and the defendants had refused to pay it, and succeeded in establishing a different valuation.

c. Damage to goods and stock.

Interest is held proper in actions against carriers for damage to goods or stock in transportation.

So, where there was a libel in admiralty for injuries to goods in course of carriage, it was held the damage was the difference between the price for which the article was sold and the market value at the place of its arrival, had it been in good condition, with interest from the time of arrival. Western Mfg. Co. v. The Guiding Star, 37 Fed. 641.

The measure of damages for nondelivery of goods is their value at the point of destination, with interest from the time delivery should have been made. Thompson v. The Nith, 36 Fed. 86. This was an action of libel against a vessel where goods were injured by misconduct of the master.

In an action against a carrier for failing to unload, feed, and water stock, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages, being the difference in value as they would have been if transported with ordinary care, and their value when they arrived, estimated at the place specified in the contract, with interest from the time compensation for the loss was demanded. Southern P. Co. v. Arnett, 61 C. C. A. 131, 126 Fed. 75. This was on the ground that this was an action for the breach of a contract to transport live stock over the railroad of the defendant with reasonable care. Nothing less than the actual amount of the loss, and interest thereon from the time it was demanded, would fully compensate the shipper for the breach of the agreement, and he was entitled to full compensation. The general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to interest upon the damages which he sustains from a breach of a contract, and this case falls fairly within that rule.

A machine shipped was so damaged that the consignee refused to receive it. It was held that the measure of damages was the value of the machine and freight paid, with interest from the time the property reached its destination. Thomas, B. & W. Mfg. Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 62 Wis. 642, 51 Am. Rep. 725, 22 N. W. 827.

In Rogers v. West, 9 Ind. 400, in an action against a carrier for injury done to goods through his default, where interest was demanded, the court said: "The interest—our statute gives it in certain cases, and authorizes it to be given in perhaps any case where it shall appear that money has been vexatiously withheld. In this latter class of cases, it is properly a jury question, and would require a clear abuse of discretion on their part to justify the interference of the court. 1 Rev. Stat. p. 343. In this case, the suit was kept pending about twenty months."

In an action against a carrier for killing live stock shipped on the road, it was held that where there was a basis of calculation as to the value, interest was not recoverable eo nomine; but it was held that the jury could consider the length of time damages were withheld, the character of the tort, the conduct of the defendant, and all the circumstances of the transaction, and increase the amount of damages by adding to the value of the property destroyed a sum equal to the interest on such value; the entire sum found returned as damages, and not exceeding the amount sued for. Central R. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170, 52 S. E. 679, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 128. It was said: "Where the damages found are discretionary or punitive, this rule does not apply."

In an action against a carrier for the value of horses killed in transportation, it was held that the damages should have included the interest on the value of the property, as the damages sustained to the time of trial. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Dougherty, 7 App. D. C. 378.

In a suit for damages where a cargo of tea was injured by cockroaches defacing the label, it was held that interest should be allowed. Westray v. The Miletus, Fed. Cas. No. 17,461.

In an action against a carrier for damages to goods, where a verdict was attacked only on the ground that it was contrary to law and evidence, it was held that it did not present the objection that it embraced interest as well as principal. Southern R. Co. v. Horner, 115 Ga. 381, 41 S. E. 649.

In an action by a consignor of goods against a carrier for damages for injury done to them through negligence, it was held that the court could not add interest from the sum awarded as damages from the date of the petition. Morgan v. Bell, 4 Mart. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(La.) 616. It may be that this ruling was because the jury may have estimated interest in making up their verdict, and it would then be interest on interest. The reason is not given and the case does not hold that interest is not recoverable, but that the court could not add interest from the date of the petition.

In an action for injury to cattle shipped on a railroad, it was held that it was discretionary with the jury whether interest should be allowed or not. Black v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 45 Barb. 40.

d. Delay in delivering.

Interest is recoverable in actions against carriers for delay in transportation.

So, in an action for delay in transportation of merchandise, it was held that the measure of the damages was the difference between the value of the property at the time and place it should have been delivered, and its value when it was delivered, with interest, after deducting the charges and freight. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Phelps, 46 Ark. 485.

In an action for damages for breach of an implied contract of a carrier to transport cattle over its road with reasonable despatch, it was held that the actual loss should bear interest from the date when the claim for damages was presented. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Truskett, 44 C. C. A. 179, 104 Fed. 728, affirmed in 186 U. S. 480, 46 L. ed. 1259, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 943.

In this case it was said: "In actions of pure tort, which do not sound in contract, as where the property of a third party is destroyed or injured through the negligence of a carrier, the usual practice is, as this court said in Eddy v. Lafayette, 1 C. C. A. 441, 4 U. S. App. 252, 49 Fed. 807, to leave the allowance of interest on the damages which may be assessed to the sound discretion of the jury. But, as the case at bar is founded upon a breach of contract, it may well be distinguished from the case last cited."

And the measure of damages in an action against a carrier for failure promptly to deliver was held to be the difference between the market value of the goods at the time they should have been delivered and the value when delivered, with interest from that date. Newell v. Smith, 49 Vt. 255; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Johnson, 85 Ga. 497, 11 S. E. 809.

In an action against a railroad for failure to transport fruit in time for a sailing vessel, it was held the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the fruit at the port of shipment at the time it ought to have been delivered, and its value at the same place at the time of actual delivery, with costs of refrigerating space reserved for its export, with interest. Frey v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 114 App. Div. 747, 100 N. Y. Supp. 225.

And in an action against a railroad for delay in transporting machinery, where workmen were forced to remain idle, an instruction that interest was discretionary with the jury was affirmed. Rocky Mount Mills v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 119 N. C. 693, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, 25 S. E. 854.

In an action by a grain elevator company against a railroad for not keeping its contract in handling its grain, shipped through the elevator, it was held that interest would not be allowed eo nomine, but could be considered as an element of damage under the rule which permitted its allowance in order to arrive at the sum which would be a just compensation. Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 422.

And in an action against a carrier for delay in transportation, it was held that interest on the value of the goods during the delay could be recovered as a measure of damage. Murrell v. Dixey, 14 La. Ann. 296.

In an action against a railroad company for failure to deliver cattle in reasonable time after shipment, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date of breach of the contract, if the suit be considered as one for breach of contract, or from the date of the injury, if the action be viewed as one in tort. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Haynes, 64 Miss. 604, 1 So. 765.

And in an action against a carrier for failure to deliver cotton in a reasonable time, where the carrier had no notice of special loss from delay, and there was no evidence of the difference in value of the goods, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest only on the amount invested during the time of delay. Lee v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 136 N. C. 533, 48 S. E. 809.

In an action by a charterer by a libel against the owner of a vessel for damages in not loading a cargo, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of demand, where the delay in prosecuting the case was occasioned by the defendant. Oakes v. Richardson, 2 Low. Dec. 173, Fed. Cas. No. 10,390.

c. Illinois cases.

In Illinois there is some conflict in the cases. This appears to be largely due to the nature of the damage and the form of pleading. So that if an action for conversion, or trover, or trespass could be maintained, interest would be allowed.

In an action of trover against a carrier for failing to deliver a carriage shipped by the railroad, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest on the value of the property from the time of demand and refusal. Northern Transp. Co. v. Sellick, 52 Ill. 249.

Where a carrier delivered live stock to a wrong consignee, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover the value, in an action of assumpsit, and interest thereon. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ames, 40 Ill. 249. The court said: "Even in actions of trespass for seizing personal property, there is no objection to allowing interest on the value of the goods from the time they were taken from the plaintiff's possession."

And the interest was held proper in an action on the case for loss from sample trunks shipped as baggage. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hochstim, 67 Ill. App. 515.

This case does not cite the case of Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Davis, 54 Ill. App. 130, which was an action against a common carrier for loss of goods. There it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the amount of damages found.

In an action of assumpsit for damages for unreasonable delay in transporting corn and oats, it was held that interest should not be given. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cobb, 72 Ill. 148. The court said: "Where property has been wrongfully taken, or converted into money, and an action of trespass or trover may be maintained, interest may properly be recovered. And this is based upon the statute, which authorizes interest when there has been an unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment."

In that case the court said: "At the common law, interest was not allowed in any case. Its recovery depends entirely upon our statute, and unless authorized by the statute, it cannot be recovered. Pekin v. Reynolds, 31 Ill. 530, 83 Am. Dec. 244. While our statute has received a liberal construction, yet we are aware of no case similar to the one under consideration in which interest has been allowed. In Bradley v. Geiselman, 22 Ill. 494, the recovery of interest was sustained. The action was, however, trespass, where property had been wrongfully taken and sold, and converted into money. In the case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ames, 40 Ill. 249, interest had been recovered and the judgment was sustained. The facts in that case, however, would have authorized an action of trover, for a wrongful conversion of the property. The same may also be said of the case of Northern Transp. Co. v. Sellick, 52 Ill. 249, where a recovery of interest was sustained. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Shultz, 55 Ill. 421, the recovery of interest was sustained on the authority of Bradley v. Geiselman, supra, the action having been trespass to personal property."

In Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 5 L.R.A. 236, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185, 21 Pac. 925, the cases of Bradley v. Geiselman, supra, and Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cobb, 72 Ill. 148, were distinguished, on the ground that these cases were based upon the statute which authorized interest where there was unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment. The Illinois statute had, however, been adopted in Colorado, and the general rule is to adopt the same construction. The court said: "But our statute does not seem to have received the same construction here as in the state of Illinois. While in that state it has been put plainly and squarely as interest under the statute, in our state damage for the detention of the money equal to the legal interest upon the value of the chattels converted from the time of the conversion has been allowed, not as interest, but as damage."

f. Missouri cases.

In New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 37 L. ed. 292, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444, an action against a common carrier for injuries to cattle shipped from Massachusetts to Missouri, it was held that under the law in Missouri interest should not have been allowed by the jury on the damages from the time suit was brought. In this case interest was not claimed in the petition. The court tries to reconcile the conflicting cases on interest, in cases of damages from negligence, in Missouri, and says that Gray v. Missouri River Packet Co. 64 Mo. 47, holding that interest in an action against a carrier for damages from negligence is proper, is not sustained by the weight of authority in that state. That the general rule would be to allow interest from the time delivery should be made; but, the interpretation of a state statute would be followed. In this case many cattle were killed or injured by a collision. The court, in comparing the Missouri cases, cites the cases contra to 64 Mo. 47, supra, but those cases were actions for damages from torts, and not actions against common carriers, as such. The cases against common carriers for loss of goods or damage to freight seem all to hold in Missouri that interest should be allowed.

So, in an action against a carrier for failing to deliver goods shipped, it was held under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 4430, authorizing a jury to allow or disallow interest, that the jury were properly told that they might allow interest. Hall v. Wabash R. Co. 80 Mo. App. 463.

So, in an action for freight money, where the defendant alleged damages for failure to deliver within proper time, it was held that if the lead which was shipped was selling at the time it was delivered as high as it had sold when it was to be delivered, the damages would be the interest from that time, as the want of this money for several months might be a serious matter with the merchants. Smith v. Whitman, 13 Mo. 352.

And in an action for failure properly to take care of and deliver live stock shipped on a railroad, it was held that interest could be allowed on the damages from the institution of the suit to the time of the verdict. Dunn v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 268.

And in an action against a common carrier for negligence in transporting stock, causing death, where the negligence was gross, and the parties engaged in it were liable for prosecution for cruelty to animals, it was held that interest was properly allowed. Gray v. Missouri River Packet Co. supra.

In an action against a carrier for breach of contract of safe shipment, it was held that interest from the date of shipment could be allowed as part of the damages. Goodman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 71 Mo. App. 460. The court said: "Defendant has cited us to State ex rel. Roberts v. Hope. 121 Mo. 34, 25 S. W. 893, in support of his contention that the jury should not have 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been directed to allow interest. We think that case is not in point. That case gives an authoritative and undoubtedly correct interpretation to the statute. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4430. But that case was where goods had been seized and converted; and though the supreme court had not, for many years (possibly not since its enactment), been giving effect to the statute, yet it must now be heeded in all cases embraced within its terms. But, as before stated, we think this case is not within its meaning. This case is really for damages for breach of contract of safe shipment. It falls closer to such, in character of cases, as Padley v. Catterlin, 64 Mo. App. 629; and it is at any rate governed by the Dunn and Gray Cases, 68 Mo. 278, and 64 Mo. 50."

In an action against a carrier for goods lost in shipment, it was held that interest should have been allowed from the time the property should have been delivered. Lachner Bros. v. Adams Exp. Co. 72 Mo. App. 13.

g. Tennessee cases.

In an action against a common carrier for negligence and delay in delivery of goods, it was held that interest was not recoverable, as such a case was not included in the Tennessee statute allowing interest. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Southern Seating & Cabinet Co. 104 Tenn. 568, 50 L.R.A. 729, 78 Am. St. Rep. 933, 58 S. W. 303. This ruling was under Shannon's Tennessee Code, § 3494, providing for interest on bills single, bonds, notes, bills of exchange, and liquidated and settled accounts signed by the debtor.

h. Texas cases.

In Texas the weight of authority and the later cases hold that interest on damages caused to stock or freight is proper, although some of the early cases held contra. There is some conflict of authority as to whether it is necessary to claim interest in the pleadings. In some of the cases allowing interest the rule is stated that it is not allowed eo nomine, but as damages for delay in nonpayment; and that the plaintiff should ask for enough damages to cover the item of interest.

In a suit against a carrier of cattle for negligence in carriage, it was held that interest might be given by the jury, where it was asked for in the pleadings. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Batte (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 345.

And although the pleadings did not ask interest in a suit against a common carrier, it was held in Pt. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Greathouse, 82 Tex. 104, 17 S. W. 834, that the jury could add interest to the damages. In this case the damages claimed were $1,200, and the jury found $900; as the evidence did not show damages to the extent of the verdict, the court sustained the verdict by presuming that the jury added interest. See Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Jackson, 62 Tex. 212.

And in International & G. N. R. Co. v.

Lewis (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 323, interest on damages allowed for injury caused to live stock in transportation was held proper, although not prayed for in the petition.

In an action for damages to property by a common carrier during transportation, the court said: "There was no error in allowing interest at the legal rate on the amount of damages sustained by appellee. It seems to be now well settled that such interest is allowed as a matter of law, even though it was not asked for in the pleadings. Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Great-house and Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Jackson, supra; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ball, 80 Tex. 602, 16 S. W. 441; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 698, 18 S. W. 716." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Smythe (Tex. Civ. App.) 119 S. W. 892.

And where cattle were damaged in transportation, interest was allowed from date of injury in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Johnson (Tex.) 19 S. W. 867.

So, where a carrier lost goods in transportation, it was held liable for interest on the value. Rio Grand R. Co. v. Petitpain (Tex. Civ. App.) 23 S. W. 531.

And the failure of a common carrier to furnish cars to ship live stock was held to entitle plaintiff to damages and to interest thereon. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCarty, supra.

And the failure of a common carrier promptly to deliver cotton shipped was held to entitle the owner to interest from the time it should have been delivered. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Jackson, 62 Tex. 200.

In an action against a common carrier for loss of goods, it was held that interest might be allowed as a part of the measure of damages. Rio Grande R. Co. v. Cross, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 454, 23 S. W. 529, 1004.

In an action against a common carrier for damages caused to live stock by reason of delay in shipping and transporting, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest from the time the damages accrued. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Dimmit County Pasture Co. 5 Tex. Civ. App. 180, 23 S. W. 754.

And where a carrier was guilty of gross neglect of duty in exposing cotton to the rain and weather, it was held that interest on the damages was proper. Wolfe v. Iacy, 30 Tex. 349. The court said that when a carrier is guilty of fraud, delinquency, or injustice to the owner, interest by way of punitive damages may be allowed.

Interest was held proper in an action against a carrier for goods lost. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ball, supra.

And interest, so called, was held proper in a recovery as part of the damages in an action against a common carrier for injuries to cattle shipped. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smisen, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 549, 73 S. W. 42; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Murtishaw, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 447, 78 S. W. 953.

And a judgment in an action against a common carrier for injuries to stock in transportation was held to bear the rate of interest in force when the judgment was rendered. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gray (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 921.

But where the judgment exceeded the amount claimed in an action against a common carrier for injuries by rain to grain shipped on the cars, it was held that as the excess was interest, the judgment could be modified by striking out the excess. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dawson Bros. (Tex. Civ. App.) 84 S. W. 298.

Where the jury presumably allowed interest in a verdict for damages against a common carrier, it was held erroneous for the court to add interest from the time the damages accrued, where no interest was claimed in the pleadings. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Scott (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 1065.

In order to recover interest on a claim against a carrier for injuries to stock shipped, it was held necessary that interest should be claimed in the pleadings. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Addison, 96 Tex. 61, 70 S. W. 200.

In an action for breach of contract to furnish cars and transport cattle, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the amount recovered from the date of the injuries to the cattle. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 47. The court said: "Upon a reconsideration and a further construction of the case of San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Addison, supra, this court has reached the conclusion that the trial court erred in rendering judgment for 6 per cent interest on the amount recovered from the date of the injuries to the cattle." This ruling may have been because the complaint did not specifically claim interest, or it may have been because the court added interest to a judgment for damages, when possibly interest was considered by the jury.

In an action against a carrier for lost goods, it was held that interest was not recoverable ordinarily as a part of the damages. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Martin, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 295.

And in an action against a common carrier for nondelivery, it was held that the American cases generally that refer to interest bring it under the class where there is fraud, delinquency, or injustice of the debtor, and interest should not be allowed in this case. Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626.

And where property was lost or destroyed while in charge of a common carrier, it was held that interest was not ordinarily recoverable as part of the damages. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Davis, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 156.

And a common carrier was held not liable for interest in failing to deliver goods. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Wright, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 292.

In an action against a carrier for lost baggage, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 724.

See Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 22, 1 Am. Rep. 212, subd. V. b, Loss of goods, supra.

t. Ejection of passenger.

In Nichols v. Union P. R. Co. 7 Utah, 510, 27 Pac. 693, interest was held not allowable in an action for damages for ejecting a passenger from a railroad train. This ruling is in accord with the principle that interest will not be allowed in cases where exemplary damages can be imposed.

VI. Contracts.

The weight of authority is that interest should be allowed for breach of contracts if the amount due can be reasonably ascertained. In Wisconsin the rule seems now to be settled in favor of the rule, although some earlier cases were in conflict. In Georgia it is allowed as damages, and not eo nomine.

In an action for profits for selling proprietary medicine contrary to contract, it was held that interest should be allowed, in Fowle v. Park, 48 Fed. 789. The court said: "The liability, although ex delicto, arises upon contract, and interest should be included. The record shows a deliberate and inexcusable violation by the defendants of their contract, and the court is not disposed to release them from any part of the liability which they have incurred."

In a libel to recover for an engine supplied to the boat, the claimant was allowed interest from the filing of the report of the referee, although both parties dissented from the report. The Isaac Newton, Abb. Adm. 588, Fed. Cas. No. 7,090.

In an action for breach of a contract to receive and pay for a large quantity of gravel, interest was allowed from the date of the termination of the contract, as the legal incident of the right to damages. International Contracting Co. v. McNichol, 105 Fed. 553. The court said: "The right to compensation for the breach of a contract accrues when it is broken, and, if not then made, the delay must be paid for in interest. This is the ordinary rule, and the adjudications which seem to indicate that interest runs only from the time of demand rest, I think, upon the assumption that, in the cases in which they were made, the demand and refusal of payment fixed the time of default."

And in an action against a seller for breach of contract to deliver cotton at a specified time and place, it was held the amount of recovery should be the value of the article at the time of the breach, with interest for delay, unless it be shown that the article was to be delivered for some specific object, known to both parties at the time, and that thus a loss within the contemplation of both parties had been sustained. Rose v. Bozeman, 41 Ala. 678. In this case the purchase price was paid in advance.

the damages caused by his deviation from the contract, with interest from the time the money should have been paid to the date of judgment. Healy v. Fallon, 69 Conn. 228, 37 Atl. 495. The court said: "It is said, however, that the amount due was unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, and that interest is never allowed upon unliquidated amounts. It may be conceded that the amount due the plaintiff was, in a certain sense, unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, inasmuch as the amount due him under the contract, which was a liquidated amount, was to be lessened by the as yet unascertained damages caused by his deviations from the contract; but it is not true that damages measured by the rate of interest are never allowed for the nonpayment of money, where the claim is an unliquidated one. In an action for the value of personal property destroyed by the negligent act of the defendant, where the claim was in a sense an unliquidated one, damages were allowed in the shape of interest upon the value of the property as found upon the trial."

In an action for damages for breach of a contract, where plaintiffs could have completed the contract two years from the time that they were prevented from completing the same, by the defendant, the jury were instructed to allow interest from whatever date the evidence shows the contract would have been completed. The action was brought before the expiration of two years, and a verdict for interest from the date proven was held not erroneous. Sullivan v. McMillan, 37 Fla. 134, 53 Am. St. Rep. 239, 19 So. 340. In this case it was held that interest could be allowed on unliquidated damages from the time that the exact pecuniary amount was ascertainable by simple computation, or by reference to recognized standards, such as market price and the time.

Interest was allowed for breach of contract to procure a loan to pay off a mortgage. Padley v. Catterlin, 64 Mo. App. 629. The court said: "The general rule is that in actions grounded on negligence, interest is not allowed. The rule, however, is that interest may be claimed of right, under various circumstances of contract and tort, on the value of property or things in action, on the value of services, on money paid, had, and received, as well as on divers other forms of loss to plaintiff, or gain to defendant, and capable of pecuniary estimate; and it is immaterial that there is no agreement for interest or forbearance. The interest in such cases may be recovered under the general allegation of damages, without being specially claimed. The law measures the interest as damages, when not specified in the contract. Such interest is recoverable as a matter of law, independent of the discretion of the jury."

And in an action by a tenant against a landlord for damages in preventing the removal of a building, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the building on the day when the breach occurred, with interest. Neiswanger v. Squier, 73 Mo. 192.

Interest was allowed in case of a wrongful discharge and breach of contract of hire. in Laming v. Peters Shoe Co. 71 Mo. App. 646. The court said: "The general rule is that interest is not recoverable on unliquidated damages or for an uncertain demand. The present case does not fall within the rule. Prima facie, the plaintiff's measure of damage was the amount of his salary for the remainder of the year. The court found that he was employed for a year, and that he was wrongfully discharged before its expiration; that he was unable to procure employment elsewhere; and as there is no dispute as to the date of the discharge and the amount of the plaintiff's salary, it cannot be said that his damage was unliquidated or uncertain."

Where interest is given as damages for breach of contract, the rate allowed by the laws of the state where the contract was to be performed should control. Sutro Tunnel Co. v. Segregated Belcher Min. Co. 19 Nev. 121, 7 Pac. 271.

For breach of a contract to furnish dredge boats to enable plaintiff to fulfil his contract with the government, the plaintiff was allowed interest, in Watkins v. Junker, 90 Tex. 584, 40 S. W. 11.

In this case the court reviews the authorities on this question, and holds that courts have recognized the right to recover compensation for the detention of that which was due, and by analogy have adopted interest; and that interest may be allowed upon unliquidated damages arising out of a breach of contract or tort, but not for damages arising from assault and battery, libel and slander, seduction, false imprisonment, nor for personal injuries and the like.

And under Ky. act March 20, 1871, authorizing an action against the commonweal for a breach of contract, if any, and for the recovery of damages, it was held that interest by way of damages for delay in execution of the contract, resulting from the refusal of the state to receive books contracted for, should have been allowed. Com. v. Collins, 12 Bush, 386.

And in an action by a whisky broker for commission on a sale of whisky, where the petition claimed interest, it was held proper to allow interest from the filing of the suit. Brown v. Lapp, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1134, 77 S. W. 194.

For breach of an agreement to keep plaintiff's shop employed in producing work on material furnished by defendant, damages could be assessed as of the date of the writ. Speirs v. Union Drop Forge Co. 180 Mass. 87, 61 N. E. 825. It was claimed that interest should have been allowed only from the date of the assessor's report of damages.

In an action on a contract for work done and material furnished, it was held that, upon the balance of an unliquidated and contested account, interest could be recovered 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

only from the date of the writ. Palmer v. Stockwell, 9 Gray, 237.

Where a receiver of a bank surrendered the same to trustees on a contract by which they were to advance a certain per cent and were to be paid their expenses, and to account for the proceeds, it was held that they were entitled to interest on the disbursements. Woerz v. Schumacher, 37 App. Div. 374, 56 N. Y. Supp. 8, affirmed in 161 N. Y. 530, 56 N. E. 72.

And where the child of a testator was cared for by relatives at his request, on the promise that he would provide for her by will, it was held that the child could maintain an action against the estate, and could recover the amount expended by relatives, together with interest from the death of the testator. Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 20.

Interest was allowed in an action for work and material in the construction of a railroad, where the debtor was in default for not having an estimate made by the engineer. McMahon v. New York & E. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 403. The court said: "Interest, therefore, if allowed upon this principle, should be computed only from the time of the refusal by the defendants, when called upon, either to cause a final estimate to be made, or to correct that already made."

In an action for work and labor for drilling an oil well, where the defendant was to contribute his share of the expenses, and the defendant received from the sale of the oil and land more than $7,000, and the action was pending for about a quarter of a century, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date of the commencement of the suit. Kervin v. Utter, 120 App. Div. 610, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1061.

And in an action for services for several years, plaintiff was allowed interest only from the time of the commencement of the action, in Cully v. Iaham, 125 App. Div. 97, 109 N. Y. Supp. 92.

Interest should be allowed against a mutual benefit association from the time of failure to levy an assessment for the payment of the loss, as provided in the policy. Christie v. Iowa L. Ins. Co. 111 Iowa, 177, 82 N. W. 499. The court said: "Instead of denying interest on all claims for unliquidated damages, this court has uniformly held that 'it may be considered as an element of damage, under the rule which permits its allowance in order to arrive at the sum which will be a just and lawful compensation for the injury sustained.' Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 502. Thus, to the value of property lost or destroyed, interest from the time this happened is added, as part of the compensation. Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 669, 42 N. W. 512; Burdick v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 388, 54 N. W. 439; Arthur v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 648, 17 N. W. 24; Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 27, 1

Am. Rep. 212. This is on the ground that value can be ascertained, and when this has been done, the owner is as plainly entitled to interest as he would be if a like sum had been payable in money."

In an action on an insurance policy for a loss of cargo, upon the question whether interest was allowable on the account, the court said: "The general rule is that interest is not to be recovered on unliquidated damages, or for an uncertain demand. Jurors have, in many cases, a discretion to allow interest, by way of damages, according to the circumstances of the case; and this is a case in which that discretion may be exercised." Anonymous, 1 Johns. 315.

In Tifton, T. & G. R. Co. v. Butler, 4 Ga. App. 191, 60 S. E. 1087, an action for unliquidated damages for breach of a contract, it was held that interest was not recoverable as such, but that the jury might increase the amount of damages by allowance of interest; but they should not add interest eo nomine, but should find a gross sum.

A navigation company agreed to purchase 2,000 coupon trolley tickets daily, and deposited $5,000 as a guaranty; subsequently there was a breach by the trolley company, and the navigation company sued for the deposit; as there was no proof of demand, interest was excluded, except from the date of the commencement of the action. Kirkland v. Niagara Gorge R. Co. 109 App. Div. 201, 95 N. Y. Supp. 657.

In an action for breach of contract to deliver a cargo of tea at certain prices and of a certain quality, and the tea was inferior, it was held that, as to interest, this was a question generally in the discretion of the jury; but that it was not agreeable to legal principles to allow interest on unliquidated contested claims sounding in damages. Gilpins v. Consequa, Pet. C. C. 85, Fed. Cas. No. 5,452; Willings v. Consequa, Pet. C. C. 172, Fed. Cas. No. 17,706.

In Wisconsin a late and well-considered case (Laycock v. Parker, 103 Wis. 161, 70 N. W. 327) reviews the cases in that state, both in actions for services and actions on contracts; and in an action on a contract for building, under the supervision of an architect, it was held that if there is a reasonably certain standard of measurement, by the correct application of which one can ascertain the amount he owes, he will be liable for interest from the time of demand.

In Gallun v. Scymour, 76 Wis. 251, 45 N. W. 115, which was an action for damages for breach of contract to deliver bark, where the market value was disputed, it was held that interest on the damages from the commencement of the suit was proper.

And where the damages were unliquidated, and the cause of action arose on a contract for the recovery of money only, and the petition was verified, it was held that the clerk could enter judgment for the amount and interest if there was a default. Whereatt v. Ellis, 68 Wis. 61, 31 N. W. 762.

to repair a sawmill, it was held that the jury, in their discretion, might add interest to the damages. Hinckley v. Beckwith, 13 Wis. 31.

In Hewitt v. John Week Lumber Co. 77 Wis. 548, 46 N. W. 822, damages allowed upon a counterclaim for breach of contract were held to bear interest from the time the answer was served. The court said that "if he had instituted a suit on his counterclaim earlier, he would have been entitled to interest from an earlier date."

In an action on a claim against the state, it was held that until the report awarding damages had been made, the damages for breach of contract were unliquidated and uncertain, and would not bear interest. Martin v. State, 51 Wis. 407, 8 N. W. 248. This case was distinguished in Laycock v. Parker, supra, as exceptional and differing from the Wisconsin cases, in that it was an action for general damages, such as loss of profits.

In the following cases, where it was held that interest should not be allowed, it seems that the damages were uncertain, and not easily ascertained. Where damages are to be made up from unascertained profits, they are so doubtful in amount as to prevent the application of the general rule giving interest.

In an action to recover on a contract to pay $500 a day for each day of thirty saved in completing a building, and for damages for not having a foundation ready on time, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover interest where the claims were unliquidated, contested, and uncertain. Mansfield v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 114 N. Y. 331, 4 L.R.A. 566, 21 N. E. 735, 1037. The court said that in actions for breach of contract "whether interest is recoverable does not rest in the discretion of the jury, but it is a question of law for the court; while in actions sounding in tort, when the recovery of interest is permissible, it is, with some exceptions, a question for the jury."

In Mansfield v. New York C. & H. R. Co. supra, the case of McMahon v. New York & E. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 463, was distinguished, as there interest was allowable on the ground that the defendant was in default for not having taken steps to ascertain the amount of the debts. In McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 316, and Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 56, which were actions for services, interest was allowed from the commencement of the actions, on the ground that when the debtor was in default for not paying pursuant to his contract, the creditor was entitled to interest, as the amount could be computed approximately; but that in cases where this could not be done, interest would not be allowed.

Interest was not allowed from the commencement of an action for breach of contract against the state, in McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 542, 13 N. Y. S. R. 674, 15 N. E. 417. The court said: "The claim is in every sense unliquidated. There was no possible way for the state to adjust the same and ascertain the amount which it was liable to pay, and hence, within the decision of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, s. c. subsequent appeal 78 N. Y. 393, 34 Am. Rep. 544, it was not liable for interest. The law in reference to the allowance of interest is not in a very satisfactory condition, but it is believed that no decision in this court has yet gone the length of allowing interest in such a case. It is scarcely claimed in this case that there could be any allowance of interest for the period of time prior to the filing of the petition, which may be regarded as equivalent to the commencement of an action; and in the case cited it was held that where the claim was such that it could not draw interest before the commencement of an action, that event would not set the interest running."

In an action for damages for breach of contract to do marble work, it was held that interest could not be recovered where the damages were unliquidated. Stannard v. Robert H. Reid & Co. 118 App. Div. 304, 103 N. Y. Supp. 521. The court said: "It is true that there was a market price for the various items of material, but it cannot be said that there was a market price for the entire contract work, which involved the furnishing of material and the performance of labor. The plaintiff did not know even approximately what it would cost him to have the work done. He was obliged to receive bids, which differed in amount, and he selected the lowest, and did not even then assume to fix his damages on that basis or notify the defendant. Nor did he recover the amount of damages which he alleged in the complaint."

In an action to enforce a mechanics' lien, it was held that the unliquidated amount for extra work would not carry interest, in John Weber & Co. v. Hearn, 49 App. Div. 213, 63 N. Y. Supp. 41. The Court said: "We think the authorities sustain the principle that interest upon an unliquidated claim, even though on contract, should not be awarded unless, with reasonable certainty, the amount was or could be fixed. In other words, the theory upon which interest can be allowed as damages is that a person owes a debt, the amount of which is fixed, or which, by reference to market values or to other sources of information, is susceptible of being definitely determined."

And where the lessor agreed to pay the market value of the improvements on the expiration of the lease, and refused to appoint appraisers, it was held that the lessee was not entitled to interest on the award of the appraisers appointed by him. Holliday v. Marshall, 7 Johns. 211. The court said: "The value of the improvements or amount of damages was uncertain and unliquidated. Although the covenant provided for an appraisement of the improvements, in case the land was not sold to the plaintiff, yet the defendant was not a party to the appraisement. He refused to unite in it, and there is nothing in the covenant making an ex parte appraisement binding 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) on the defendant. The value of the improvements was open to inquiry at the trial; the plaintiff's claim is therefore to be considered as resting in unliquidated damages, upon which interest is not recoverable."

And where plaintiff conveyed lands to a railroad on consideration that they would lay a track to his property, and bring cattle to his place, which they failed to do, it was held that he could recover the value of the land conveyed, but, as the damages were unliquidated, he could not recover interest. Day v. New York C. R. Co. 22 Hun, 412.

In an action by a contractor, where the municipal board had a right to cancel the contract and pay for work done, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to interest, as the amount due was not a matter of computation. Coates v. Nyack, 127 App. Div. 153, 111 N. Y. Supp. 476.

And in an action by a lessee because a mill was not rebuilt by the lessor after a fire, according to agreement, it was held that, as plaintiff's claim was unliquidated, it was not proper to allow interest on the damages. Chamberlain v. Dunlop, 28 N. Y. S. R. 375, 8 N. Y. Supp. 125.

In an action for damages for breach of contract to build a body on an automobile chassis, where the work was insufficient and imperfect, it was held that, as the damages were unliquidated, no interest was recoverable. Anthony v. Moore & M. Co. 135 App. Div. 203, 120 N. Y. Supp. 402.

And in an action on a contract under which cattle were received, kept, and sold, it was held that the claim was an uncertain and unliquidated demand, and the amount due could not be ascertained from the face of the contract, and that interest by that name could not be allowed. Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 239.

In an action for a breach of contract where there was not a market price to estimate the damages without a verdict from the jury, it was held that interest would not be allowed. Brownell Improv. Co. v. Critchfield, 96 Ill. App. 84, affirmed in 197 Ill. 61, 64 N. E. 332. This was a subcontract for paving.

And in an action for broker's commission on a contract to lease land at a certain rate, with the privilege of purchase, it was held by the trial court that this was an agreement to convey an undivided one-third interest in some land, so indefinite in description as to render the contract incapable of specific performance, and the value of the property in money was not known, and interest should not be allowed on the damages. This was affirmed. Harvey v. Hamilton, 155 Ill. 377, 40 N. E. 592.

In an action for damages for breach of an executory contract to furnish a vessel for a cargo of wheat, it was held no interest could be allowed. Kelderhouse v. Save-land, 1 Ill. App. 65. The right to recover on money counts was held to be the test, in applying the rule to unliquidated damages.

In Buckmaster v. Grundy, 8 Ill. 626, it was held that where damages were assessed for breach of a contract, interest would not be allowed.

In Wilson v. Means, 25 Kan. 83, which was an action for money advanced for a joint purchase of hogs and for one half of the profits, it was held that for the jury to omit the rate of interest in a verdict assessing damages rendered any attempted calculation of interest uncertain, and left the court with no other alternative than to reject interest in the rendition of the judgment.

In an action by a builder to recover for breach of contract, where the defendant changed his plans and let his contract to other parties, it was held that the builder was not entitled to interest upon his profits until they were determined by the verdict. Swanson v. Andrus, 83 Minn. 503, 80 N. W. 405. The court said: "Whatever is, or may have been, the rule in other jurisdictions as to allowing interest by way of damages, this court has so allowed it as a matter of law, even in cases where the demand was unliquidated, provided its pecuniary amount did not depend upon any contingencies, and was ascertainable by computation, or by reference to generally recognized standards, such as market value. . . . On the other hand, interest has not been allowed where the damages claimed were not only unliquidated, but could not be ascertained by reference to any generally recognized standard, or were, or any part of them, prospective or contingent, or the amount thereof depended in whole or in part upon the discretion of the jury. Actions for personal injuries, seduction, libel, slander, and false imprisonment fall within this classification."

Where the balance due on a contract was uncertain, interest was not allowed. Vietti v. Nesbitt, 22 Nev. 300, 41 Pac. 151.

In the following cases, interest was held not recoverable under the circumstances of the case:

For cutting down work on a construction contract, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest where the alterations in the contract were authorized. Clark v. New York, 1 Keyes, 9.

And under an agreement to pay an attorney a certain per cent of an award, it was held that the attorney was not entitled to a share of interest, as the interest upon the amount was not a part of the award, but merely compensation for the use of the property. Re Bassford, 36 Misc. 732, 74 N. Y. Supp. 397.

In Allison v. Juniata County, 50 Pa. 351; and Dyer v. Covington Twp. 19 Pa. 200, interest was held not allowable on county warrants, as an action would not lie on such paper, but on the original claim.

Where a lessor was to pay, on termination of the lease, two thirds of the appraised value of a building, it was held that, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 1917, the sum bore interest only from the day of its judicial ascertainment. Easterbrook v. Farquhar 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

son, 110 Cal. 311, 42 Pac. 811. The court said that Sec. 3287, giving interest to every person who is entitled to recover damages capable of being made certain by calculation, where the right of recovery was vested in him on a particular day, did not apply.

In an action on a note payable in sugar in Guadeloupe, no interest was allowed as damages, because at that place such notes did not carry interest, but from judgment or registration. Courtois v. Carpentier, 1 Wash. C. C. 376, Fed. Cas. No. 3,286.

VII. Trover and conversion.

a. Generally.

The general rule in actions of trover is that the measure of damages will be the value of the property at the time and place of conversion, with interest from that time. In Kentucky and North Carolina, interest was held to be within the discretion of the jury. In Montana, interest was denied.

Federal cases.

The general rule stated above was applied in an action by the United States for wrongfully cutting and removing timber from reservations. United States v. Pine River Logging Co. 32 C. C. A. 406, 61 U. S. App. 69, 89 Fed. 907.

And where a cargo of flour capsized, and the carrier sold the cargo at auction without informing the owner, it was held a conversion, and the owners were held entitled to recover the value at the port of delivery, with interest. The Joshua Barker, Abb. Adm. 215, Fed. Cas. No. 7,547.

And in an action of trover for a flatboat and a cargo of wheat, it was held that the jury, in the exercise of their discretion, could include interest on the value of the property from the time of conversion, as a part of the damages. Matthews v. Menedger, 2 McLean, 145, Fed. Cas. No. 9,289.

And in an action for conversion of a whale in the Okhotsk sea, where the only market was in New Bedford, it was held that the damages would be the value at New Bedford of the oil and bone which might have been made, less the expense, with interest on the sum thus arrived at. Bourne v. Ashley, 1 Low. Dec. 27, Fed. Cas. No. 1,699.

And in an action for wrongful conversion of a lot of shoes, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to the value at the time of demand, deducting storage charges, with interest from the time of demand. Edmunds v. Nolan, 86 Fed. 564.

Where the defendant converted ore and received royalties thereon from his lessee, and knew the amount, as shown by his books, it was held that he was liable for interest. New Dunderberg Min. Co. v. Old, 38 C. C. A. 89, 97 Fed. 150. The court said: "It is a general and just rule that, where interest is reserved in a contract, or is implied from the nature of the promise, it is recoverable of right; and that, when property or money has been wrongfully appropriated or converted by a defendant, interest should be given as damages to compensate the complainant for the loss of the use of the proceeds of his property or of his funds. In cases of the latter class its allowance is sometimes a matter of discretion; but generally, whenever one has wrongfully detained or misappropriated the money of another, he ought to pay and must pay interest at the legal rate from the date of the misappropriation, or from the beginning of the detention."

In a suit in equity against the director of a bank for fraudulently diverting its funds, it was held that no statute was necessary to give a court of equity power to allow interest, and that when money has been misappropriated or converted, interest should be given as damages to compensate the plaintiff for the loss of the use of his funds. Cooper v. Hill, 36 C. C. A. 402, 94 Fed. 582. The court said: "When interest is reserved in a contract, or is implied from the nature of the promise, it becomes a part of the debt, and is recoverable as of right. When money has been misappropriated or converted to his own use by a defendant, interest is given as damages to compensate the complainant for the loss of the use of his funds."

Alabama.

In Milner & K. Co. v. DeLoach Mill Mfg. Co. 139 Ala. 645, 101 Am. St. Rep. 63, 36 So. 765; Ewing v. Blount, 20 Ala. 694, interest was allowed from the date of the conversion until the trial.

And in an action for conversion of logs or trees, the rule was held to be to allow the value immediately after severance, with interest. White v. Yawkey, 108 Ala. 270, 32 L.R.A. 199, 54 Am. St. Rep. 159, 19 So. 360.

And in an action for conversion of wood wrongfully cut by the tenant from leased premises, the measure of the damages was held to be the value of the wood from the time of the conversion of the trees into cord wood, with interest to the time of trial. Brooks v. Rogers, 101 Ala. 111, 13 So. 386.

In an action for conversion, it was held that the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest thereon to the judgment, was the measure of the damages generally. Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 682, 44 Am. Dec. 498. The court said: "There are cases where the jury would be justified in finding the value at a subsequent period, instead of the value at the time of conversion, with interest."

In an action for conversion of slaves, it was held that the measure of damages, where the thing converted had a fixed value, was that value at the time of conversion; and the jury might give interest upon it. Jenkins v. McConico, 26 Ala. 213.

In an action for conversion of a slave, where the defendant had hired him from a widow and returned him before administration, and the widow was entitled to the custody until administration, it was held 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the injury done by the temporary conversion of the slave, with interest upon such sum up to trial; but that the defendant was not liable for the value of the slave, where he died after his return, before administration. Williams v. Crum, 27 Ala. 468.

And where in trover the plaintiff recovered the value of a woman slave, and then brought a subsequent action to recover in trover her issue, not included in the first action, it was said: "In either of these cases, the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest, or, at most, the enhanced value at a subsequent period, is all that the law deems necessary to adequate redress." White v. Martin, 1 Port. (Ala.) 215, 26 Am. Dec. 365.

Arkansas.

In an action for corn converted, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to recover the value, with interest from the date the corn was taken. Fordyce v. Dempsey, 72 Ark. 471, 82 S. W. 493; Ryburn v. Pryor, 14 Ark. 505.

California.

In an action for conversion of personal property, it was held that, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3336, providing that the measure of damages was, first, the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest from that time; or, where the action has been prosecuted with diligence, the highest market value at any time between the conversion and the verdict, with interest, at the option of the injured party; and where the plaintiff did not exercise his option, the court could award damages under either rule. Barrante v. Garratt, 50 Cal. 112.

In an action for conversion of warrants, it was held that when the property converted had a fixed value, the measure of damages was that value, with legal interest from the time of conversion; that when the value was fluctuating, the plaintiff might recover the highest value at the time of conversion, or at any time afterwards. Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562; Hammer v. Hathaway, 33 Cal. 117.

Colorado.

In an action for conversion, it was held that damages were properly allowed for the detention of property, which was equivalent to legal interest on its value from the date of conversion. Updegraff v. Lessem, 15 Colo. App. 297, 62 Pac. 342. The court said: "The rule in this state is that damages are allowable for the detention equal to the legal interest on the value of the chattels converted from the time of the conversion to the time of judgment."

And in an action for mining ore and converting the same to the use of the defendant, it was held that the court should instruct the jury to add interest to the amount found as the value of the ore, as further damages, a sum equal to the legal interest on the same from the time of the conversion. Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 5 L.R.A. 236, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185, 21 Pac. 925.

In Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. v. Yount, 7 Colo. App. 189, 42 Pac. 1023, it was said: "In the case of the wrongful taking or detention of personal property, it has been held that interest on its value is a proper measure of the damages for the detention, where they cannot readily be fixed otherwise. But the recovery was allowed as damages, and not as interest, and the legal rate of interest was used as their measure, because the character of the property was such that there was no other practicable method of ascertaining their amount. Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 169; Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514; Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 5 L.R.A. 236, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185, 21 Pac. 925."

In an action for conversion of a stock of merchandise, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of the taking, with legal interest thereon from the date of taking to the date of rendering the verdict. Sutton v. Dana, 15 Colo. 98, 25 Pac. 90.

In an action by a mortgagee for conversion of property, it was held: "It is now the established rule in Colorado that while, as interest, damages may not be recovered for the detention of the money, or the money value of property taken and converted, yet damages equal to the legal interest upon the value of the chattels converted may be allowed, and included in the verdict which the jury may render. Omaha & G. Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Tabor, supra. Under the law as established in that case, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and have included in the verdict of the jury, a sum of money as damages for the detention of the property, which would have been the exact equivalent of the interest which the jury computed and included in the verdict, and which the court told them the plaintiffs had a right to recover. In form the charge was undoubtedly erroneous, though in substance it was a correct expression of the law. But, as committed in this case, it is not an error for which the cause will be reversed and sent back for a new trial." Perkins v. Marrs, 15 Colo. 202, 25 Pac. 168.

The measure of damages in trover was held to be the value of the property converted, at the time of its conversion, with legal interest upon the amount from such time. Sylvester v. Craig, 18 Colo. 44, 31 Pac. 387.

Connecticut.

In this state the general rule was held applicable. Lewis v. Morse, 20 Conn. 211. In this case the time of conversion was not shown, and therefore the plaintiff was required to take only the value of the property.

In White v. Webb, 15 Conn. 302, the following rules were laid down: "In actions of trover and trespass, for property taken and converted by the defendant, where there is no malicious motive on the part of the defendant, but he takes the property under a claim of right, and the real dispute is as to the title, the rule of damages is the value of the property at the time of the conversion or taking, and interest on that sum to the time of judgment. If, however, the suit is brought by a bailee or special-property man, against the general owner, then, the plaintiff can recover the value of his special property only; but if the writ is against a stranger, then he recovers the value of the property and interest, according to the general rule; and holds the balance beyond his own interest, in trust for the general owner."

And the general rule was applied in Oviatt v. Pond, 29 Conn. 479; Clark v. Whitaker, 19 Conn. 319, 48 Am. Dec. 160; Curtis v. Ward, 20 Conn. 204; Cook v. Loomis, 26 Conn. 483. The same was held in Hurd v. Hubbell, 26 Conn. 389, the court saying: "We have always understood that the rule of damages in this kind of action is the value of the property at the time of conversion, and interest. It has been so from the first, in our courts, and in the English courts, with a slight qualification in the case of sales of chattels where the price is paid in advance, and in that of contracts for the delivery of stock."

And the general rule was applied in Morrey v. Hoyt, 62 Conn. 542, 19 Am. Rep. 611, 26 Atl. 127. The court said: "It is to be observed with regard to this class of property that the plaintiffs were not seeking to recover its value, but simply the damage they had suffered by reason of the taking and detention; and that the property was of that class, so far as we can see, that has no value for use. It was useful only for sale or for consumption."

Delaware.

The general rule was followed in Vaughan v. Webster, 5 Harr. (Del.) 256.

Florida.

The general rule was followed in Moody v. Caulk, 14 Fla. 50.

In an action of conversion for a quantity of logs, where trees had been cut on plaintiff's ground, it was held that the conversion was complete only when the logs were removed; and plaintiff was entitled to recover the value at the time and place of removal, with interest. Skinner v. Pinney, 19 Fla. 42, 45 Am. Rep. 1.

Georgia.

Under Ga. Code, § 3506, requiring the plaintiff in an action of trover to elect whether he will accept a verdict for the property, or its value, or whether he will demand a verdict for the damages alone, or for the property alone, and its hire, if any, where the plaintiff elected to take a verdict for damages alone, it was held that interest should not be allowed. Barnett v. Thompson, 37 Ga. 335. The court said: "The Code does not declare that the plaintiff shall recover interest on the proven value of the property as part of his damages; that may have been intentionally omitted, in view of the fact that the plaintiff was not confined to the proven value of the property at the time of the conversion, but was allowed to prove its highest value between the conversion and the trial. In other cases where the damages are to be increased by the addition of interest, it is so expressly declared."

And under Ga. Code, § 5335, providing for a choice of verdict in actions of trover, it was held that the prevailing party had the election of recovering the highest value of the property, between the conversion and the trial, without hire or interest, or of recovering the value at the time of the conversion, with interest or such hire as he might prove. Bank of Blakely v. Cobb, 5 Ga. App. 289, 63 S. E. 24.

In an action against a railroad for refusing to deliver goods, it was held that under Ga. Code, § 3390, providing that verdicts may be the same as in actions of trover, a verdict could be rendered for the value of the property, with interest thereon, in the nature of profits, where the plaintiff chose that form of recovery, instead of proceeding for the highest proved value. Macon & W. R. Co. v. Meador, 67 Ga. 672. The court said: "Under it interest is recoverable on the value proved, as profits, if a recovery is not sought to be had at the highest value proved at any time between the conversion and trial. Schley v. Lyon, 6 Ga. 535; Tuller v. Carter, 59 Ga. 395; Collier v. Lyons, 18 Ga. 648. Here the interest is recovered instead of profits, and under the rule applicable to this form of pleading, we hold that if the recovery of the principal does not exceed the alleged value of the property sued for, interest thereon may be recovered as profits without reference to the value of profits alleged in the writ."

And in an action for conversion of slaves, sold by the defendant, it was held that the measure of damages was the purchase money received by the defendant, with interest, if the sale was for a fair amount. Dorsett v. Frith, 25 Ga. 537.

And where a tenant in common in a gold mine used more than his share, and there was no proof of profits, it was held that he was bound to account for the surplus, with interest. Huff v. McDonald, 22 Ga. 131, 68 Am. Dec. 487.

Under Ga. Code, § 3563, similar to § 3506, supra, it was held that where the plaintiff was contented to recover the value of the property at the time of its conversion, and proved its value at that date only, he would be entitled to interest at the time of trial; but if he proved its highest value between the time of conversion and the trial, the measure of damages would be such value, without interest. Tuller v. Carter, supra. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And where a buyer of cotton took the wrong cotton, and the owner sued in assumpsit, it was held that the measure of the recovery was the value of the cotton, with interest. Newton Mfg. Co. v. White, 53 Ga. 395.

In Schley v. Lyon, 6 Ga. 530, it was said: "The general rule in actions of trover is that the measure of damages will be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest thereon from that time."

In an action of trover, a verdict finding for the plaintiff the property in controversy, with certain amounts for hire and interest, was held contrary to law in regard to interest. Newman v. Cross, 108 Ga. 776, 33 S. E. 641.

In an action for the conversion of a mule and for the recovery of hire, a verdict finding a specific sum, with interest thereon from a date preceding the time of conversion, was held erroneous, because interest, as such, was not recoverable, and if it were, the time of accrual did not begin before the conversion. Martin v. Oslin, 94 Ga. 658, 19 S. E. 988.

In an action of trover, the only evidence was the value of the property at the date of the conversion. It was held that the jury might be instructed that they should find for the plaintiff the amount proved, with interest from that date to the date of the trial. Midville, S. & R. B. R. Co. v. Bruhl, 117 Ga. 329, 43 S. E. 717.

In an action of trover it was held that if the plaintiff elected to take the highest value of the property between the conversion and the trial, and made proof of the value after the conversion and up to the time of trial, he was not then entitled to hire or to interest. Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 81, 6 S. E. 815.

Illinois.

The general rule was applied in Sturges v. Keith, 57 Ill. 451, 11 Am. Rep. 28, and in Cassidy v. Elk Grove Land & Cattle Co. 58 Ill. App. 39; Morley v. Roach, 116 Ill. App. 534; Smyth v. Stoddard, 105 Ill. App. 510, modified on another point in 203 Ill. 424, 96 Am. St. Rep. 314, 67 N. E. 980; and in Chapman v. Burt, 77 Ill. 337, which was an action against an attorney for converting money belonging to his client, where there was unreasonable delay in paying it over; and in Janeway v. Burton, 201 Ill. 78, 66 N. E. 337, which was an action of trespass for conversion of property taken under writ of replevin; also in Robinson v. Alexander, 141 Ill. App. 192, which was an action of trover for conversion of furniture.

Indiana.

In an action for conversion of a consignment of goods, it was held the jury had a right to add interest from the date of conversion. Kavanaugh v. Taylor, 2 Ind. App. 502, 28 N. E. 553.

Iowa.

In an action for conversion of a note, it was held that the measure of damages was the value, with interest from its date. Ilubard v. State L. Ins. Co. 129 Iowa, 13, 105 N. W. 332. The court said: "It is further urged that the judgment is excessive, in so far as it includes interest on the note from date to the rendition of judgment, it not appearing that the note provided for the payment of interest; but the court was justified in adding interest on the amount of plaintiff's damages from the time of conversion, regardless of whether the note provided for interest."

And where an attorney used money of his client as his own, it was held he was liable for interest on such use. Mansfield v. Wilkerson, 26 Iowa, 482.

And where there was no claim for special damages, it was held that in an action to recover for the conversion of sheep, the measure of damages was the value at the time of the conversion, with interest. Cutter v. Fanning, 2 Iowa, 580.

In an action against an agent for money secured by misrepresenting that he had paid a greater price for cattle than he actually did, where the court awarded 10 per cent interest on the excess of the amount received over the amount paid out, as damages, it was held erroneous, as the rate of interest was 6 per cent. Vennum v. Gregory, 21 Iowa, 326. The court said: "And although interest was allowed in this case as damages, it was not competent for the court to allow more than legal rate, 6 per cent."

Kansas.

In an action for conversion of a stock of merchandise, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest. Simpson v. Alexander, 35 Kan. 225, 11 Pac. 171.

But in an action to recover cattle taken and converted, where the petition gave the number of cattle and average value, and the damages computed thereby; but the plaintiff made no claim for interest, and only a portion of the cattle taken and converted were of the value charged, it was held that a verdict larger than such value was erroneous, although the amount was reached by computing interest. Shepard v. Pratt, 10 Kan. 209.

Kentucky.

In trover, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest to the time of trial; but this was in the discretion of the jury. Sanders v. Vance, 7 T. B. Mon. 209, 18 Am. Dec. 167.

So in Newcomb-Buchanan Co. v. Baskett, 14 Bush, 658.

Louisiana.

In an action for conversion, it was held the measure of damages was the value of 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the property converted, with interest. Chamberlain v. Worrell, 38 La. Ann. 347.

In an action against an attorney for money, where the means of liquidating the balance was in the hands of defendant, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of judicial demand, under La. Civ. Code, art. 2084, providing that an attorney is answerable for interest on any sum remaining in his hands from the day he becomes a defaulter, for delay in paying it over. Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann. 400.

In an action against an administrator to compel an accounting, it was held that those who converted property of others to their own use were in bad faith; but when the sale had been fair, and the full market value obtained, the price, with interest from the date of the sale, was the measure of damages, and this rule was not affected by the subsequent rise or fall of the thing sold. Dadillo v. Tio, 7 La. Ann. 487.

In an action for conversion of bonds, it was held that in Louisiana the damages could be assessed by the court in the first instance, or, as in this case, by the appellate court; and under the practice here, that all interest recoverable, due from the day of final judgment, formed part of the damages. New Orleans Draining Co. v. De Lizardi, 2 La. Ann. 281. In this case it was held that defendants must account, as of this day, for the par value of the bonds, and for the sums charged in their accounts for dividends or interest, and for commission allowed them on the sale of those bonds.

Maine.

In trover, the measure of damages is the value of the property converted, with interest from that time. Robinson v. Barrows, 48 Me. 186, Hayden v. Bartlett, 35 Me. 203.

Maryland.

In trover, the measure of damages is the value of the chattels at the time of conversion, with legal interest thereon up to the date of the verdict. Swartz v. Gottlieb-Bauern-Schmidt-Straus Brewing Co. 109 Md. 393, 71 Atl. 854; Heinekamp v. Beaty, 74 Md. 388, 21 Atl. 1098, 22 Atl. 67; Hopper v. Haines, 71 Md. 64, 18 Atl. 20, 20 Atl. 159; Thomas v. Sternheimer, 29 Md. 268.

Massachusetts.

The general rule was applied in Kennedy v. Whitwell, 4 Pick. 466. This was for gin sold by defendant to plaintiff, where the price was paid, but the goods were not delivered.

So, where a city appropriated gravel to its own use, without right. Hunt v. Boston, 183 Mass. 303, 67 N. E. 244.

And where the vendor on conditional sale brought an action against a third party for conversion, after payment of a certain sum in instalments, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property, with interest from the time of conversion.

Angier v. Taunton Paper Mfg. Co. 1 Gray, 621, 61 Am. Dec. 436.

And in an action for conversion, where property was held under a contract of conditional sale, it was held that the plaintiff could recover the value at the time of conversion, with interest from that date to the date of verdict. Lorain Steel Co. v. Norfolk & B. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 500, 73 N. E. 646.

In trover by a mortgagee, where property was sold to strangers, the damages were the value of the property and interest from the time of sale by the defendant. Barry v. Bennett, 7 Met. 354.

For conversion of a bond bearing 4 per cent interest, it was held that an ordinary rate of interest should be allowed, after the plaintiff acquired a claim for money against the defendant. Scollans v. E. H. Rollins & Sons, 179 Mass. 346, 88 Am. St. Rep. 386, 60 N. E. 983.

And where an officer took a note from a person arrested, and retained it until the maker of the note had become insolvent, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the note at the time of conversion, with interest thereafter. King v. Ham, 6 Allen, 298.

And in an action against promoters of a corporation for the value of certain stock which the defendants did not tender, it was held that defendants should be charged with interest from the time the value of the stock was fixed, on the same principle as damages for wrongful conversion of personal property. East Tennessee Land Co. v. Leeson, 183 Mass. 37, 66 N. E. 427.

In Greenfield Bank v. Leavitt, 17 Pick. 1, 28 Am. Dec. 268, it was held that in trover the measure of damages was generally the value of the property converted, with interest from that time; and if the property was restored, this should be credited; but if the restoration was obtained by an offer of reward, this amount, with interest, was to be deducted from the value of the property restored.

In Cutting v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 13 Allen, 381, which was an action against a common carrier, it was said: "The general rule is well settled in this commonwealth that, in an action of trover, the measure of damages is the market value of the goods at the time of the conversion, and interest thereon, even if the defendant has since sold the goods at a higher price."

Michigan.

In Winchester v. Craig, 33 Mich. 205, it was said: "The general rule undoubtedly is, in ordinary cases, that the full value of the property at the time and place of its conversion, together with interest thereon, is the correct measure of damages in actions of trover; yet, as was said in Northrup v. McGill, 27 Mich. 238, 'this rule yields, when the facts require it, to the principle on which the rule itself rests; namely, that the recovery in trover ought to be commensurate, and only commensurate, with the injury, whether that injury be greater or less in extent than the full value of the property and interest.'"

The general rule was applied in an action for cutting down timber, and converting it into logs. Ripley v. Davis, 15 Mich. 75, 90 Am. Dec. 262.

And in an action of trover for wheat, it was held the damages were the price it was worth at the time it was demanded by the plaintiff's guardian, and interest on that sum to the date of judgment. Rough v. Womer, 76 Mich. 375, 43 N. W. 573.

In an action for conversion of horses and other livery property, the cash value of the property, with interest from the time of conversion, was allowed, where no special circumstances required a different rule. Allen v. Kinyon, 41 Mich. 281, 1 N. W. 863.

Where parents mortgaged the daughter's piano, and it was taken from them by the mortgagee, and the daughter replevied it, and judgment was rendered in favor of the father and mother, and also in favor of the daughter; but the piano remained in possession of mortgagee, and the daughter sued the officer for the value and the damages, it was held that she could recover only the value, with interest. Blaisdell v. Scally, 84 Mich. 149, 47 N. W. 585.

Minnesota.

The general rule was applied in Derby v. Gallup, 5 Minn. 119, Gil. 85; Zimmerman v. Lamb, 7 Minn. 421, Gil. 336; Jones v. Rahilly, 16 Minn. 322, Gil. 283.

And where logs were wrongfully cut and sold to another party, who sold them at a certain place, and the logs were greatly enhanced in value, it was held that the measure of damages for conversion was the value of the logs at the place and time of conversion by the defendant, with interest from that date. Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co. 21 Minn. 491.

Missouri.

In an action for conversion, it was held, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2863, providing that the jury, on the trial of an inquisition of damages, may, if they think fit, give damages in the nature of interest over and above the value of goods at the time of conversion, that interest was discretionary with the jury. Vermillion v. LeClare, 89 Mo. App. 55; Bigler v. Leonori, 103 Mo. App. 131, 77 S. W. 324; Meyer v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 95 Mo. App. 721, 69 S. W. 639 (this was under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2869; it was further held that a claim for interest must be made in the petition); Thomas Mfg. Co. v. Huff, 62 Mo. App. 124; Kamerick v. Castleman, 29 Mo. App. 658; Watson v. Harmon, 85 Mo. 443; Davis v. Fairclough, 63 Mo. 61; Charles v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 58 Mo. 458.

In Wheeler v. McDonald, 77 Mo. App. 213, it was held that, under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 4430, providing that a jury may give damages in the nature of interest over and above the value of the goods at the time of the conversion, a direction to the jury to give interest would have been improper; and where the case was submitted to the court without the jury, a finding of law that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date of the conversion was held to be erroneous, as under this statute the question of interest was discretionary.

And interest was held discretionary under this statute, in State ex rel. Roberts v. Hope, 121 Mo. 34, 25 S. W. 893. The court said: "Aside from statutory enactment authorizing it, there are many authorities which hold that upon a recovery by plaintiff in actions for the conversion of chattels, interest on their value should be allowed from the time they are taken." Baker v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. 52 Mo. App. 602; Carson v. Smith, 133 Mo. 606, 34 S. W. 855. In the latter case the court said, as a general rule, interest is allowed on the full value of the property at the date of conversion; but in this state it is controlled by statute, which leaves it discretionary with the jury.

In Hawkins v. Kansas City Hydraulic Press Brick Co. 63 Mo. App. 64, it was held that it was discretionary with the jury to allow interest at the time of conversion, and a mandatory instruction was held improper.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4430, authorizing interest in an action for conversion, it was held that the petition should ask for interest, and interest, if allowed, should be calculated from the date of conversion or wrongful delivery of lumber, and not from the date it was received by a carrier at the shipping point. Horner v. Missouri P. R. Co. 70 Mo. App. 285.

In Schultz v. Christman, 9 Mo. App. 588, it was held that where a jury was authorized, in a case of unliquidated damages, to allow interest in an action for wrongful conversion and conspiracy, interest should be estimated by the jury, and found as a part of the damages assessed.

In an action for wrongful taking and carrying away merchandise, it was held that the damages were the value of the goods taken, with interest from the time they were taken, and also exemplary damages. Freidenheit v. Edmundson, 36 Mo. 226, 88 Am. Dec. 141.

In Spencer v. Vance, 57 Mo. 427, the rule of damages for the wrongful taking of goods was held to be the market value at the time, and not the price paid for them, or at which they were sold; and in trover the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest up to the time of trial.

In an action for conversion of a slave, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest on the assessed value, and not to damages equivalent to his hire, as the action affirmed the act of the defendant in converting. Polk v. Allen, 19 Mo. 467.

In Randall v. Greenwood, 3 Mont. 506, an 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

action to recover the value of goods converted, it was held that interest would not be allowed. The court said: "The claim and demands upon which interest is allowed depend entirely upon the statute. This claim or demand of respondent against appellants is not of the kind upon which interest can be allowed until after judgment. See Code Stats. 497, § 2."

Nebraska.

In Bennett v. McDonald, 59 Neb. 234, 80 N. W. 820, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest.

Nevada.

In O'Meara v. North American Min. Co. 2 Nev. 112, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest from that time to the time of trial.

In Boylan v. Huguet, 8 Nev. 345, in an action for conversion of mining stock, it was said: "It seems to us clear that any rule of damages by which the wrongdoer is made to pay more than the value of the property when it is first converted, whether in the shape of interest or money realized by a sale or otherwise, is founded upon the same principle as that which allows the highest fair market price at any date between the time when the owner is dispossessed and the trial."

New Hampshire.

The general rule was held applicable in Chauncy v. Yeaton, 1 N. H. 151.

And in an action for trespass and conversion of bark, it was held the measure of damages was the highest market value at the place of conversion, with interest from the time of taking. Adams v. Blodgett, 47 N. H. 219, 90 Am. Dec. 569.

New York.

In Prince v. Conner, 69 N. Y. 608, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the goods at the time of taking, with interest.

In Devlin v. Pike, 5 Daly, 85, the rule was stated: "That in actions for the breach of an agreement to return or replace property, or to deliver it, where the price has been paid, or for the converting of it, in cases where there is no ground for exemplary damages, the measure of damages is a question of law, the plaintiff's recovery being limited to what will compensate him for the loss sustained; that in all cases he is entitled to recover the value of the property at the time of the breach, or of the conversion, with interest up to the day of the trial, as his additional damages."

The general rule was held to apply in Flagler v. Hearst, 91 App. Div. 12, 86 N. Y. Supp. 308; Einstein v. Dunn, 61 App. Div. 195, 70 N. Y. Supp. 520, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 648, 63 N. E. 1116; Willard v. Bridge, 4 Barb. 361; Cutler v. James Gould Co. 7 N. Y. S. R. 106; Ormsby v. Vermont Copper Min. Co. 56 N. Y. 623; Tyng v. Commercial Warehouse Co. 58 N. Y. 308; Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 40; Prince v. Conner, supra; Alexander v. Osborn, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 298; Roberts v. Berdell, 61 Barb. 37, affirmed in 52 N. Y. 644; Bissell v. Hopkins, 4 Cow. 53; Dillenback v. Jerome, 7 Cow. 294; New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. v. Flynn, 65 Barb. 365; Wilson v. Conine, 2 Johns. 280; Whele v. Butler, 3 Jones & S. 1, 43 How. Pr. 5; Stevens v. Low, 2 Hill, 132; Hyde v. Stone, 7 Wend. 354, 22 Am. Dec. 582; Booth v. Powers, 56 N. Y. 22; People v. Gasherie, 9 Johns. 71, 6 Am. Dec. 263.

And where saw logs were converted into boards, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the boards, and interest on the value thus ascertained. Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505, 24 Am. Dec. 66.

And in an action for conversion of stock, it was held that, on the refusal to pay its value on demand, the plaintiff was entitled to recover its value, with interest. Anderson v. Nicholas, 28 N. Y. 600.

And in an action of trover to recover the value of a barge, it was held that interest on the value at the time of the injury was properly directed to be allowed. Andrews v. Durant, 18 N. Y. 496. The court said: "It is as necessary a part of complete indemnity as the value itself. There is no sense in the idea that interest is any more in the discretion of the jury than the value."

And in an action by a mortgagee against a chattel mortgagor for wrongfully taking possession of hotel silverware, and for an injunction, where the purchase-money notes drew interest, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest as damages to the time of actual return of the property. Earle v. Gorham Mfg. Co. 2 App. Div. 460, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1037.

And where a yacht was converted, and, after the action for conversion, was returned, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest on the value from the time of conversion to the time of trial, subject to set-off of the value at the time of return, with interest to the time of trial. Flagler v. Hearst, 91 App. Div. 12, 86 N. Y. Supp. 308.

And where the plaintiff was put to extra expense, it was held that he could recover the value of the property and reasonable allowance for expense caused, in addition to the value of the property, with interest. McDonald v. North, 47 Barb. 530. The extra trouble was hunting for lost hogs.

In an action against a purchaser from a junk dealer of stolen goods, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest on recovery from the time the goods were disposed of by the defendant. Pease v. Smith, 5 Lans. 519.

And in an action against an executor for converting money, it was held that interest should be allowed, on the ground that the rule would apply as in trover, and that a person who converted money to his own use should pay interest. People v. Gasherie, supra.

L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44, the court said: "The principle that the right to interest in such cases was in the discretion of the jury was, however, gradually abandoned, and now the rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to interest on the value of property converted or lost to the owner by a trespass as matter of law. The reason given for the rule is that interest is as necessary a part of a complete indemnity to the owner of the property as the value itself; and in fixing the damages, is not any more in the discretion of the jury than the value."

North Carolina.

In an action by the owner of property sold on conditional sale against a chattel mortgagee for conversion, it was held that if the date of the conversion had been found by the verdict, the jury, in their discretion, could have allowed interest, under the N. C. Code, § 530, providing that a judgment not on contract shall bear interest until paid. Lance v. Butler, 135 N. C. 419, 47 N. E. 488.

Oklahoma.

In an action for conversion of personal property, it was held that, under Oklahoma Statutes, 1893, § 2640, providing that detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest from that time, interest was a matter of right. Drumm-Flato Commission Co. v. Edmison, 17 Okla. 344, 87 Pac. 311.

Oregon.

For conversion of a hop house, where the article was returned and accepted by plaintiff, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest to the time of trial, less its value when returned, with interest from that date. Eldridge v. Hoefer, 45 Or. 239, 77 Pac. 874.

For conversion of stock, it was held that interest was not recoverable as such, on an unliquidated claim, until the amount was ascertained; but that, in an action of trover, it was allowed on the value of the article converted, not as interest, but as an item of damages; and the owner could recover it as a part of the damages suffered by him. Durham v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 45 Or. 385, 77 Pac. 902.

Pennsylvania.

The general rule was held applicable in Agnew v. Johnson, 22 Pa. 471, 62 Am. Dec. 303.

In a special case the jury might give more than mere interest as damages. Backenstoss v. Stahler, 33 Pa. 251, 75 Am. Dec. 592.

And in Hill v. Canfield, 56 Pa. 454, it was said: "It has not been an unusual thing in practice, to allow damages beyond the actual value of the goods converted, and interest; although the general rule undoubtedly is the value of the goods and interest."

Rhode Island.

In an action of trover against two, where one had made partial satisfaction, it was held that the measure of damages against the other was the value of the goods, with interest from the time of conversion, subject to the credit received. Heyer Bros. v. Carr, 6 R. I. 45.

South Carolina.

The general rule was held applicable in Banks v. Hatton, 1 Nott. & M'C. 221.

In an action for the conversion of a slave, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the slave at the time of conversion, with interest from then until the trial, or hire until his death. Burney v. Pledger, 3 Rich. L. 191, following Kid v. Mitchell, 1 Nott & M'C. 334, 9 Am. Dec. 702; Hatton v. Banks, 1 Nott & M'C. 223, note.

Where the thing converted was reduced to money by the defendant, the smallest measure of damages is always the amount received from the conversion, with interest from the time of conversion. Ewart v. Kerr, 2 McMull. L. 141.

But in Daub v. Martin, 2 Bay, 193, it was held that, in an action of debt on a judgment in trover, it was not the usage and practice to allow interest on damages.

Texas.

In some cases the general rule was held applicable. Muse v. Burns, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 99; Smith v. Bates (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 1044; Harris v. Finberg, 46 Tex. 48; Anderson v. Larremore, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 532; Daugherty v. Lady (Tex. Civ. App.) 73 S. W. 837; Hatcher v. Pelham, 31 Tex. 201; Carter v. Roland, 53 Tex. 540; Grimes v. Watkins, 59 Tex. 133; First Nat. Bank v. Cleveland, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 478, 82 S. W. 337; Texarkana Water Co. v. Kizer (Tex. Civ. App.) 83 S. W. 913.

In order to recover interest in an action for conversion, it should be demanded in the complaint. Texarkana Water Co. v. Kizer, supra.

In Pridgin v. Strickland, 8 Tex. 427, 58 Am. Dec. 124, it was said: "And there can be no doubt that it may safely be assumed that the old rule in the action of trover, that the value of the thing at the time of conversion, and interest thereon up to the judgment, if not entirely abolished, has been subjected to so many exceptions as to leave it not worth preservation, and the amount of the damage will vary according to the particular property to which it may be applied."

In an action against an agent for not paying money collected by him, it was held that interest eo nomine was not to be recovered, but as damages. The court should have left the question of interest to the discretion of the jury. But it was held that, under 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

der the evidence, the verdict would not have been different. Close v. Fields, 13 Tex. 623.

The measure of damages in an action for the conversion of money was held to be the legal interest from the time of conversion. Commercial & Agri. Bank v. Jones, 18 Tex. 811. It was said that the rule was different in conversion of other personal property; there the question of interest would be in the discretion of the jury; "but in a suit for the conversion of money, if damages are allowed at all, it must be in the form of interest."

In Moore v. King, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 397, 23 S. W. 484, it was held that interest was not always adequate compensation for the damages sustained.

Vermont.

The general rule was held applicable in Crumb v. Oakes, 38 Vt. 566; Thrall v. Lathrop, 30 Vt. 307, 73 Am. Dec. 306; Grant v. King, 14 Vt. 367.

And where defendant applied plaintiff's personal property and the income from land to his own use, instead of to the discharge of a recognizance, it was held to be a fraudulent misappropriation of the funds, and he was held liable for interest on the value from the time that plaintiff had paid the amount due on the recognizance. Crane v. Thayer, 18 Vt. 162, 46 Am. Dec. 142.

West Virginia.

The general rule was applied in Cecil v. Clark, 49 W. Va. 459, 39 S. E. 202.

Wisconsin.

In some cases the general rule was held to apply. Arpin v. Burch, 68 Wis. 619, 32 N. W. 681; Tenney v. State Bank, 20 Wis. 153.

But where the real damage for wrongful detention of personal property was the value of the use, it was held that this rule would be applied instead of interest. Williams v. Phelps, 16 Wis. 81.

In Ingram v. Rankin, 47 Wis. 406, 32 Am. Rep. 762, 2 N. W. 755, it was said: "The rule fixing the measure of damages in actions for breaches of contract for the delivery of chattels, and in all actions for the wrongful and unlawful taking of chattels, whether such as would formerly have been denominated trespass de bonis or trover, at the value of the chattels at the time when delivery ought to have been made, or at the taking or conversion, with interest, is certainly founded upon principle. It harmonizes with the rule which restricts the plaintiff to compensation for his loss, and is as just and equitable as any other general rule which the courts have been able to prescribe, and has greatly the advantage of certainty over all others."

b. Wrongful levy.

In actions for damages for wrongful levy on plaintiff's property, and for converting the same, the general rule is the same as in actions of trover and conversion; that is, the plaintiff is entitled to the value of the property at the time of taking, with interest from that time. In Montana interest was denied.

Federal cases.

The general rule was held to apply in favor of the holder of goods by virtue of a respondentia bond, with an assignment of a bill of lading. Pacific Ins. Co. v. Conard, Baldw. 138, Fed. Cas. No. 10,647.

Arkansas.

Where goods were wrongfully seized and sold under an attachment, the measure of damages was held to be the value at the time of seizure, with interest from that date. Perkins v. Ewan, 66 Ark. 175, 49 S. W. 569; Blass v. Lee, 55 Ark. 329, 18 S. W. 186.

And in an action of trespass against a sheriff for levying execution on plaintiff's property, it was held that it was discretionary with the jury to allow interest; and an instruction directing them to allow interest was held erroneous. Crow v. State, 23 Ark. 684.

California.

The general rule was followed in Cassin v. Marshall, 18 Cal. 689; Phelps v. Owens, 11 Cal. 22; Schmidt v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 371.

In an action to recover damages for conversion of personal property levied on under an attachment, the finding, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant a certain sum of $700, with interest, was held sufficient, although the court did not expressly say that the plaintiff was thereby damaged in the sum of $700; but from the facts found it necessarily followed that the damage accrued to plaintiff. McCray v. Burr, 125 Cal. 636, 58 Pac. 203.

And in an action for taking and detaining certain personal property, it was held that the measure of damages for horses sold by the defendant was their value, and interest thereon from the time of taking until the trial, and also for any injury done to the horses. Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553.

Colorado.

The general rule was followed in Woodworth v. Gorsline, 30 Colo. 186, 58 L.R.A. 417, 69 Pac. 705; Hannan v. Connett, 10 Colo. App. 171, 50 Pac. 214.

Iowa.

In some cases the general rule was followed, as in Russell v. Huiskamp, 77 Iowa, 272, 42 N. W. 525.

And in an action for wrongful seizure of mortgaged goods, it was held that the measure of damages was the market value of the property that was levied upon, with interest from the date of levy up to the time of the verdict, not exceeding the amount secured by mortgage. Crawford v. Nolan, 72 Iowa, 673, 34 N. W. 754.

But in an action for wrongfully suing out an attachment on lumber, it was held that interest should not be allowed in the absence of any evidence showing loss from the failure to have the lumber. Fullerton Lumber Co. v. Spencer, 81 Iowa, 549, 46 N. W. 1058. The court said: "The general rule is, where personal property is wrongfully taken and detained for a time from the owner, the value of its use during such time. If it has no such value, the damage must be said to be nominal; and a rule of general damages that would give interest on the value in such a case is erroneous."

In Hattenback v. Hoskins, 12 Iowa, 109, in an action for damages for wrongful levy of an attachment, the verdict of the jury was for the sum named, and interest thereon to the date of the attachment. The judgment of the court was for the sum named by the jury, without allowing any interest. The question was not discussed on appeal.

Kansas.

In an action for damages for wrongful seizure and conversion of goods, it was held that the measure of damages was the market value of the property when taken, with interest; and that when the property was returned, the measure would be the difference between the market value when taken and the market value when returned, with interest. Prinz v. Moses (Kan.) 66 Pac. 1000.

Louisiana.

In an action against a sheriff for refusing to release plaintiff's perishable property that had been attached, where the attachment was discharged, it was held that interest was not authorized by law. Green v. Garcia, 3 La. Ann. 702.

Massachusetts.

In an action of trover against a sheriff for a wrongful taking and a conversion, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the goods at the time of conversion, and interest thereon from that time. Johnson v. Sumner, 1 Met. 172.

Michigan.

The general rule was followed in Johnson v. Gillen, 140 Mich. 152, 103 N. W. 547.

But in an action for working tools taken on execution, it was held that if the jury gave damages for loss of profits, they could not allow interest also. McGuire v. Galligan, 53 Mich. 453, 19 N. W. 142. The court said: "Upon this it may be remarked, in the first place, that it is not very clear how interest and profits both can be allowed. Interest is allowed as a legal compensation for lost use. If it is competent to show greater profits than the interest would cover, both cannot be proper at the same time."

In 57 Mich. 39, 23 N. W. 479, which was a subsequent trial, it was held that the measure of damages, allowing all rights of exemption, could not exceed the sum of $250, with interest from the return of the property replevied, and could not reach that, unless the property levied on was worth that.

Minnesota.

The general rule was followed in Murphy v. Sherman, 25 Minn. 196.

Missouri.

The general rule was followed in Walker v. Borland, 21 Mo. 289; State ex rel. Rogers v. Gage Bros. 52 Mo. App. 464. In the latter case the court said: "This, in theory of law, places the injured party in the same situation he was before the trespass was committed."

Montana.

In an action for damages for seizing personal property, it was held that interest could not be allowed. Palmer v. Murray, 8 Mont. 312, 21 Pac. 126. The court said: "Our attention is called to the case of Bohm v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 333, decided by Chief Justice Warren in 1871, where he follows the usual rule of damages with interest from date of conversion; but it cannot be a case in point because the question of interest eo nomine under the statute was not raised or considered by the court, and hence it is not in conflict with either of the cases above referred to, but rather supports the rule announced. I take it to be the rule, in the absence of any agreement, that interest eo nomine will not be allowed except when the statute permits."

Nevada.

In an action against a sheriff for attachment on hay in a field, where he had baled and sold it, it was held that the conversion took place at the time of sale, and the measure of damages was the value at that time, with interest. Newman v. Kane, 9 Nev. 234.

New Hampshire.

In an action of trover for railway ties, where the plaintiff had a contract to cut ties from defendant's land, and to pay defendant all that he should receive for them over 10 cents each when he should sell them, and they were levied on, on a judgment against the owner of the land, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to the amount, as damages, of 10 cents for each tie, with interest. Harvey v. Morse, 69 N. H. 475, 45 Atl. 239.

New York.

In an action of trespass for damages for taking goods under an attachment, it was held that in actions ex delicto it was discretionary with the jury to allow interest or not; and it was error to charge that the plaintiff was entitled to interest as a matter 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of right. Wehle v. Haviland, 42 How. Pr. 399.

Pennsylvania.

In an action of trespass for levying execution on plaintiff's property he bought in, it was held the measure of damages was the amount bid at the sale, with interest thereon. McInroy v. Dyer, 47 Pa. 118.

Texas.

The general rule was held to apply in B. C. Evans Co. v. Reeves, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 254, 26 S. W. 219; Heidenheimer v. Johnson, 76 Tex. 200, 13 S. W. 46; Wallace v. Finberg, 46 Tex. 35; Schoolher v. Hutchins, 66 Tex. 324, 1 S. W. 266.

And where malice and oppression were not shown, in an action for wrongfully attaching plaintiff's property, it was held that the ordinary damages were the value of the property and interest. Craddock v. Goodwin, 54 Tex. 578.

And a verdict for unlawfully seizing plaintiff's property under an attachment was held not invalid, although it exceeded the value of the property, where the excess could be accounted for by allowing interest. Willis v. McNatt, 75 Tex. 69, 12 S. W. 478.

In Baker v. Smelser, 88 Tex. 26, 33 L.R.A. 163, 29 S. W. 377, which was an action for conversion for levying on plaintiff's goods, the question involved was the jurisdiction of the supreme court, which did not have jurisdiction in appeals where the matter in controversy did not exceed $1,000, exclusive of interest. It was held that this court had jurisdiction in this case. The value of the goods was $1,000, and judgment was for $1,166; the court said: "Recurring, then, to the provision in the Constitution now under consideration, we are of the opinion that it was intended to apply to cases in which interest is expressly given by statute, and not those in which the rate of interest is merely taken as a standard by which to measure in part the damages to be recovered. This case comes under the latter class; and since we infer, from the agreed statement and the judgment of the trial court, that more than $1,000 must have been claimed in the petition, we conclude that jurisdiction over it has been given by the statute. Laws 1892, p. 26, § 5."

Utah.

Where a sheriff wrongfully attached plaintiff's goods, and returned the same in a damaged condition, it was held that where a verdict for the damage was given, interest should not be allowed, as there was no conversion. Wilson v. Sullivan, 17 Utah, 341, 53 Pac. 904.

VIII. Trespass.

a. Personal property.

In an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of injury, with interest. Hopple v. Higbee, 23 N. J. L. 342; Plumb v. Ives, 39 Conn. 120; Wehle v. Haviland, 69 N. Y. 448. This is the general rule. The cases follow the rule in trover and conversion.

And where there are no special or exemplary damages. Felton v. Fuller, 35 N. H. 226; Bradley v. Geiselman, 22 Ill. 494.

In trespass for taking three cows, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of injury, with interest thereon. Brannin v. Johnson, 19 Me. 361. The court said: "The judge instructed the jury that they should give the plaintiff the value of the cows at the time they were taken. To this value, interest might be added, as a part of the indemnity to which the plaintiff was justly entitled. If the damage for detention could be so understood, the instruction might be justified. But as the term 'interest' was not used, and probably not intended, as the limit of damages for detention, the jury were at liberty to go into an estimate of the probable or speculative loss the plaintiff might have sustained, upon this ground. In our judgment the instruction was too vague and loose, and had a tendency to mislead the jury."

In an action of trespass for cutting timber and converting the same, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of ties at the time and place they were converted, with interest from date of conversion. Central Coal & Coke Co. v. John Henry Shoe Co. 69 Ark. 302, 63 S. W. 49.

In an action for trespass in cutting staves and cord wood on plaintiff's land, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled under any circumstances to a judgment and interest on the value from the 22d of December, where the staves were not taken until the 24th of December. Winchester v. Bryant, 65 Ark. 116, 44 S. W. 1124.

And in an action of trespass to recover the value of whisky, it was held that interest was properly allowed. Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446, 5 Am. Dec. 348. The court said: "The interest which was allowed by way of damages was just. The plaintiff ought not to be deprived of his property for years, without compensation for the loss of the use of it, and the jury had a discretion to allow interest in this case, as damages. It has been allowed in actions of trover, and the same rule applies in trespass when brought for the recovery of property."

And in an action of trespass for destroying property, it was held that the jury, in their discretion, might give interest on the value of the property converted or taken away or destroyed, from the time of the injury. Ripley v. Miller, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 479, 62 Am. Dec. 177.

And in an action of trespass for carrying away a slave, it was held the measure of damages was not only the hire of the slave from the time of his absence, with interest, but such expenses as were incurred in reclaiming him. Brown v. Southwestern R. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co. 36 Ga. 377. This was under Ga. act Feb. 21, 1850, providing that if any negro slave shall escape on any railroad car, the owner may recover the value and expenses incurred from the railroad company.

And in Shepherd v. McQuilkin, 2 W. Va. 90, it was held that the jury were properly instructed that the damages were the value of the property taken, with interest on such value from the time of taking, under Virginia Code 1860, p. 732, § 14, providing that the jury may allow interest on the sum found by the verdict.

Va. Code 1849, chap. 177, § 14, p. 673, provides that in an action on contract, the jury may allow interest; and for any cause arising thereafter, whether from contract or tort, the jury may allow interest on the sum found by the verdict, and if a verdict does not allow interest, the sum found shall bear interest from its date. This was held to apply to a verdict on a tort for taking personal property. Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Gratt. 454.

In an action against a master for injuries to plaintiff's cattle by reason of the master's negro and dog,—the negro and dog of defendant, one heifer of the plaintiff then and there did bite, beat, wound, and kill,—it was held that interest on uncertain damages could not be recovered. Speer v. Vanorden, 3 N. J. L. 652.

b. Realty.

The general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to interest from the time of injury. In Pennsylvania this is not allowed as interest, but is discretionary with the jury, and if allowed is part of the damages; or, in other words, the jury may consider the lapse of time in paying damages in estimating the amount. In this state, the cases allowing interest on damages caused by mobs were overruled.

So, where the owner of land taken by a railroad company without condemnation brought an action of trespass, he was held entitled to interest from the time the land was taken. Bellingham Bay & B. C. R. Co. v. Strand, 14 Wash. 144, 44 Pac. 140, 46 Pac. 238. In this case a corporation had taken possession of land and had the use, and had not paid the damages.

In Clark v. Wabash R. Co. 132 Iowa, 11, 109 N. W. 309, where the purchaser of land brought suit against a railroad for trespass, and the railroad had been occupying the land before the purchase, and the purchaser recovered interest with his damages, the court on appeal was divided and the case was therefore affirmed. The court said: "The judgment will be affirmed on condition that interest on the damages assessed prior to October 29, 1900, be remitted within thirty days from the filing of this opinion, otherwise reversed." October 29 was the day that plaintiff acquired title.

In an action for injury to property by the construction of a railroad, it was held that while such a claim was not one which, under the statute, bore interest, if compensation was delayed for a long time, the injured party could not be made whole unless the damages awarded included compensation in the nature of damages. Lawrence R. Co. v. Cobb, 35 Ohio St. 94.

In an action by remaindermen for damages to their land taken by a railroad, it was held that the value of the contingent remainder should be ascertained as of the time when the construction of the railroad began, with interest from such date. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 69 S. C. 481, 48 S. E. 476.

Where a successor company retained possession of a right of way for which compensation had not been made, in an injunction suit by the owner, it was held that the defendant was liable only for interest from the time of its occupancy. Adams v. St. Johnsbury & L. C. & L. Valley R. Co. 57 Vt. 240.

Where the owner of land sued for trespass, instead of demanding condemnation proceedings, it was held that the jury, in their discretion, in finding the damages for trespass, could add to the value of the material taken, interest thereon, without finding that there was an unreasonable delay of payment. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Swinney, 97 Ind. 586. It was claimed that the only remedy was to demand new condemnation proceedings. The court said: "The cases of Victory v. Fitzpatrick, 8 Ind. 281, McCormack v. Terre Haute & R. R. Co. 9 Ind. 283, and Indiana C. R. Co. v. Oakes, 20 Ind. 9, are relied upon as maintaining that construction of the law as it then existed. But these cases have all been either expressly or impliedly overruled, and are hence no longer followed as precedents."

In an action for damages to land for the removal of coal, the petition prayed for interest to the verdict. On rehearing the court said: "The court instructed that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the difference between the value of the premises immediately before the defendant commenced to mine and remove the coal, and such value immediately thereafter; and the time covered by the witnesses in their estimate of such damages was limited generally to the 1st of January, 1905. The time of the injury being thus definitely fixed, plaintiff was entitled to interest on the actual amount of damage found; and, unless it can be said that the jury allowed interest in fixing the amount of its verdict, there was no error in adding it to the verdict. It was then merely a matter of computation, and the court could do that as well as the jury." Collins v. Gleason Coal Co. 140 Iowa, 114, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 736, 115 N. W. 497, 118 N. W. 36.

And in an action for injuries to grass from trespassing stock, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the grass at the time of its consumption, with interest to the time of trial. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jones, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 372, 21 S. W. 145. This was on the theory of compensation.

Where stock were infected by trespassing cattle which were diseased, it was held that interest as part of the damages should be allowed. Clarendon Land, Invest. & Agency Co. v. McClelland (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 1088. In this case it was said that the reasons for allowing interest in conversion and unliquidated damages like this case were as cogent in one case as in the other.

In Rhemke v. Clinton, 2 Utah, 230, interest was held to be a question of law, and not of fact, and the plaintiff in an action of trespass for the destruction of property was held entitled to interest eo nomine.

This was on the ground that where damages are easily ascertained and the value of the property fixed, the later doctrine is that the jury should be instructed to give interest.

And in an action against a mortgagee, where he had released the mortgage after he had assigned it, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property destroyed, with 7 per cent from the time of injury until judgment. Sanborn v. Webster, 2 Minn. 323, Gil. 277.

On an award of damages for taking the water from a brook, it was held that it would be presumed that interest was included to the first day of the term. Bridgeport v. Hardwick, 67 Vt. 653, 32 Atl. 502. It was held that plaintiffs were entitled to interest from the date of taking.

Interest is generally awarded from the time of injury, but is held discretionary in some states, and in some cases is to be allowed, if at all, as part of the damages.

In an action for mining coal under plaintiff's land, injuring her property, it was held that the lapse of time could be considered by the jury in fixing the damages, but it was error to instruct the jury to find interest. Emerson v. Schoonmaker, 135 Pa. 437, 19 Atl. 1025.

And in an action of trespass for an explosion of gas, it was held that interest, as such, was not recoverable, but might enter into the computation of damages. Richards v. Citizens' Natural Gas Co. 130 Pa. 37, 18 Atl. 600. The court said: "Into these cases the element of time may enter as an important factor, and the plaintiff will not be fully compensated unless he receive not only the value of his property, but receive it, as nearly as may be, as of the date of his loss. Hence it is that the jury may allow additional damages, in the nature of interest, for the lapse of time. It is never interest as such, nor as a matter of right, but compensation for the delay, of which the rate of interest affords the fair legal measure."

And where property was destroyed by reason of a city allowing its wharf to be used by other parties who removed piling and left debris thereon, causing plaintiff's raft to be injured, it was held that the city was liable for interest as part of the damages. Allegheny v. Campbell, 107 Pa. 530, 52 Am. Rep. 478. The court said: "Without the addition of interest on the value of the property from the time it was destroyed, the

And in an action for damages for construction of a railroad, affecting plaintiff's property, it was held that interest could be allowed from the date of construction as part of the damages, but not as interest. Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 560, 17 Atl. 187. The court said: "In cases of this kind, interest is not allowed as interest, but it is usual to instruct the jury to increase the damages by that amount. In other words, interest is allowed as damages. If it were otherwise, a person whose property has been taken, injured, or destroyed, would not receive full satisfaction."

In Richards v. Citizens' Natural Gas Co. supra, the court said: "These principles have been very recently affirmed by this court in Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 571, 17 Atl. 187, and Plymouth Twp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. 37, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867, 17 Atl. 249; and although . . . there is some conflict in the decisions (Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Gesner, 20 Pa. 242; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Burson, 61 Pa. 380; Pittsburgh Southern R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 580; and Allegheny v. Campbell, supra), it is not so much in regard to the principles as in the mode of expression. The contest has been whether the allowance should be made or not; and the name by which it should be called, whether interest or compensation for delay, measured by the rate of interest, received little attention, and it was incautiously said that interest was or was not to be allowed. The distinction, however, is important, for failure to observe it leads to confusion, as in the present case. Interest is recoverable of right, but compensation for deferred payment in torts depends on the circumstances of each case."

On an appeal from the report of viewers in the assessment of damages to land from a railroad, it was held that the direction of the court to the jury to allow interest was error. Reading & P. R. Co. v. Balthaser, 126 Pa. 1, 17 Atl. 518. The court said: "This would have been an appropriate direction in an action ex contractu, because interest is a legal incident of a debt; but is not justifiable in an action of trespass. We might not have reversed for this alone, but, as the case goes back for other reasons, we again call attention to this well-settled distinction between actions resting on contract and those growing out of a tort, so far as interest is concerned. In the former, interest is demandable as interest; in the latter, it is not. In the former, the court may properly direct its allowance; in the latter, the question belongs to the jury. It may, or it may not, enter into their calculation of the damages. Whether it shall or not depends on the judgment of the jury, in view of all the circumstances of the case."

And in an action for damages to property, caused by the construction of a railroad, it was held that the jury could add interest to the amount allowed from the date of the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

construction of the road. This was not allowed as interest, but as part of the damages. Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, supra.

In an action for trespass on land and removing gravel, where the defense was that it was a public highway, it was held that the jury might enhance the damages by a sum not greater than the interest on the amount from the time the action was brought to the time of trial. District of Columbia v. Robinson, 14 App. D. C. 512, affirmed in 180 U. S. 92, 45 L. ed. 440, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 283. In this case interest was discretionary with the jury.

In an action for damages for wrongful sale of real estate belonging to plaintiff, and conveyed by him to a trustee to secure a note, it was held that the general rule was that interest was not recoverable on unliquidated damages, and the interest was not recoverable in addition to the damages assessed by the jury, but should enter into the estimate, and be found as part of the damages. Dozier v. Jerman, 30 Mo. 216.

And in a suit for trespass to realty, it was held not error to charge the jury that if they found that the plaintiff was entitled to damages, they might, if they saw proper, add interest on the same from the time such damages accrued, and embrace the whole in one amount. Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 104 Ga. 611, 30 S. E. 810.

In Kentucky, interest was held to be discretionary with the jury. In other cases interest was denied where the amount of damages was not susceptible of computation.

In an action for destruction of crops, where the jury decided adversely to plaintiff on interest, the court did not err in refusing to allow judgment for interest prior to the date of the judgment. Connolly v. Varney (Ky.) 116 S. W. 340.

In an action for injury to real property by reason of a tunnel constructed by defendant, it was held that the damages were unliquidated, and the amount could form no basis upon which interest could be computed until a judgment. Chicago v. Allcock, 86 Ill. 384.

And in an action of trespass for cutting timber, it was held that interest on the claim could be allowed only from the time of the judgment, liquidating the damages. Robertson v. Green, 18 La. Ann. 28.

And where an unfinished street was injured by hauling heavy machinery thereon before the work was completed, it was held in an action by the street contractor that interest could be allowed on unliquidated damages only from the date of judgment, and not from the date of judicial demand. Wright v. Abbott, 6 La. Ann. 569.

In New York, interest was allowed on damages caused by mobs. Greer v. New York, 3 Robt. 406. The court said: "The case cannot, we think, be distinguished from Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 50, 62 Am. Dec. 130, which must now be regarded as having changed the rule of damages in cases of this nature. The same principle is involved in the decision in Potter v. Merchants' Bank, 28 N. Y. 641, 86 Am. Dec. 273, which was an action for the conversion of a promissory note, and interest was allowed as part of the damages."

And in an action to recover the value of an elevator destroyed in a riot, it was discretionary with the jury to allow interest. Orr v. New York, 64 Barb. 106.

But in Pennsylvania, in an action for damages caused by a riot, it was held that, in the absence of statute, interest should not be allowed. Weir v. Allegheny County, 95 Pa. 413. The court said: "In general, it appears to be the rule of the courts that have gone farthest in the allowance of interest, that where the defendant has not wrongfully trespassed upon or withheld the property or money of the plaintiff, or has not obtained any advantage by any wrong done, and has not been guilty of fraud, and especially where the liability arises wholly by virtue of a statute, and no provision for interest is made therein, interest cannot be allowed as a part of the damages, either as a matter of law or at the pleasure of the jury."

In Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Brightly (Pa.) 116, and St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Brightly (Pa.) 121 (actions of trespass on the case for property destroyed by a mob), it was held that the jury could allow, as damages, the full value of the property at the time of its destruction, with interest to the time of the verdict.

But in Weir v. Allegheny County supra, those cases were overruled.

And in Allegheny v. Campbell, supra, the case of Weir v. Allegheny County, 95 Pa. 415, was distinguished as not in point.

IX. Replevin.

The general rule in replevin is that the damages will be the value of the property at the time of taking, with interest from that time. This is the rule except in cases where special damages were given for the use of the property, and cases where a statute prevented the general rule from applying. In the following cases it was held that interest should be allowed on the value from the time of taking:

Thus, in an action of replevin to recover the value of life insurance policies, where the administrator continued in maintaining his defense and insisting on his right to possess the policies, which operated as a barrier to the payment, it was held that interest was allowable from the time of demand. Saling v. Bolander, 60 C. C. A. 469, 125 Fed. 701. It was also held that the fact that the policies were delivered to the marshal would not stop the interest, where the claim was asserted and the matter was kept in litigation.

The general rule was held applicable in California. Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 2 Am. Rep. 462.

Under Cal. prac. act, § 200, authorizing the recovery of damages for detention of personal property, it was held that a party 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was not entitled to a gross sum for such damages, and to interest on the value of the property from the time it was taken. Freeborn v. Norcross, 49 Cal. 313.

And in an action to recover possession of iron and for damages for the detention where the goods were delivered back to the plaintiff pending trial, it was held that where the plaintiff accepted the goods which were the subject of the suit, he had made his election to take the goods in lieu of their value, and the only damages that he could recover would be the interest on their highest value, except in case of special damages. Conroy v. Flint, 5 Cal. 327.

Where the findings in a suit of replevin gave the value of the property at the date of taking, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest on such value as damages, under Cal. Civ. Code Proc. § 667, providing that, in an action to recover possession of personal property, judgment for the plaintiff may be for the possession or value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had, and damages for the detention. As no damages were found, interest would be regarded as damages for detention. Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192.

The general rule was held applicable in Colorado. Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514; Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 169; Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 298, 3 Pac. 486; Austin v. Terry, 13 Colo. App. 141, 56 Pac. 810.

And Connecticut. Ormsbee v. Davis, 18 Conn. 555.

And Delaware. Staunton v. Smith (Del.) 65 Atl. 593.

In an action of replevin where goods were not taken under the writ, the measure of damages was held to be the value of the goods when taken by the defendant; and it was held to be the proper practice to leave it to the discretion of the jury whether interest should be allowed on the damages sustained. Boyce v. Cannon, 5 Houst. (Del.) 409.

The general rule was applied in Georgia. Moomaugh v. Everett, 88 Ga. 67, 13 S. E. 837.

And Illinois. Merchants' Sav. Loan & T. Co. v. Goodrich, 75 Ill. 554.

And Iowa. Blaul v. Wandel, 137 Iowa, 301, 114 N. W. 899; McCoy v. Cornell, 40 Iowa, 457; Becker v. Staab, 114 Iowa, 319, 86 N. W. 305.

And Kansas. Palmer v. Meiners, 17 Kan. 478.

And in replevin it was held that the jury should include in their verdict any interest found to be due; but where the rates and dates were stated in the verdict, the court could include the same in the judgment. Mills v. Mills, 39 Kan. 455, 18 Pac. 521.

The general rule is applied in Maine. Washington Ice Co. v. Webster, 62 Me. 341, 16 Am. Rep. 462.

Massachusetts.—Where goods were replevied, and the plaintiff was nonsuited, it was held that the defendant was entitled, as damages, to interest on the value of the goods from the time of service of the writ to the time of judgment. Wood v. Braynard, 9 Pick. 322.

In Mattoon v. Pearce, 12 Mass. 406, the court said: "But where, by his unlawful interference, the plaintiff in replevin not only acquires the use of another's goods, but, by unjustly arresting the process of the law, prevents the creditor from receiving his just debt, and the debtor from procuring his discharge, thereby leaving his other goods and his person exposed to be taken on the same execution,—in such case it is manifestly right that the wrongdoer should pay something by way of mulct or penalty. The legislature have thought that 12 per cent on the value of the goods is a reasonable penalty in such case; and we think that, in a parallel case, although not within the letter of the statute, the same rule should be enforced, even in a hearing in equity." This was under Mass. Stat. 1789, chap. 26, providing that if the plaintiff in replevin should neglect to prosecute, upon complaint by defendant, he should, besides judgment for return, recover damages to the amount of 6 per cent on the bond, which, being double the value of the goods replevied, gave 12 per cent as a mulct; and if upon trial there shall be judgment of restitution, the interest of 6 per cent on the bond shall be taken as a rule in case the goods were taken in execution.

The general rule is applied in Michigan. Hanselman v. Kegel, 60 Mich. 540, 27 N. W. 678; Just v. Porter, 64 Mich. 565, 31 N. W. 444.

And in an action of replevin for logs, where the defendant took judgment for the value of the property, it was held the measure of damages was the value of the logs at the time of serving the writ by which the defendant was dispossessed, with interest from that date. Nitz v. Bolton, 71 Mich. 388, 39 N. W. 15.

The general rule is applied in Minnesota. Berthold v. Fox, 13 Minn. 501, Gil. 462, 97 Am. Dec. 243.

A judgment for defendant in replevin, where the plaintiff retained the property, was held to be a money judgment, and the clerk could add interest from the date of the order as in any other money judgment, under Minn. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 504, giving the clerk such authority. Martin County Bank v. Bird, 90 Minn. 336, 96 N. W. 915.

The general rule was applied in Nebraska. Hainer v. Lee, 12 Neb. 452, 11 N. W. 888; Romberg v. Hughes, 18 Neb. 579, 26 N. W. 351. The court said: "The rule allowing the value of the use is peculiar to replevin, and grows out of the fact that the party to whom the property is awarded seeks to recover the property itself, and not its value. In such case; when the property is returned, the party to whom the return is made is entitled to the damages awarded for the detention. If, however, a verdict is rendered for the value of the property, the action in that regard being one for damages only, the measure of damages is the value of the property as proved, together with lawful interest thereon from the date of the unlawful taking."

In an action of replevin it was held that the measure of damages for detention recoverable by defendant was, first, if there is no special value attaching to use of the property, interest; second, if the value of the use of the property exceeds the interest, then such value, without regard to whether the property is returned, but in such a case no interest; third, if loss, deterioration, or depreciation occur while the property is withheld, then the amount of such loss, damage, or depreciation, to be conditioned, however, upon return of the property, the alternative judgment for the value being fixed as of the date of the taking. Schrandt v. Young, 62 Neb. 254, 86 N. W. 1085. The court said: "If the value of the use exceeds the interest, it is unjust that the defendant, who was entitled to and deprived of the use, should be required to take the interest only; and it is equally inequitable to allow the plaintiff, by merely paying the value of the property and the interest, to retain the difference between the interest and the value of the use of the property."

In Schrandt v. Young, Romberg v. Hughes was distinguished, holding that where it precludes both interest and value of the use, the rule announced in this case was sound; but where the rule goes farther, and makes the recovery of damages for the detention depend upon the property, it works an injustice to the defendant.

The general rule was applied in Sloan v. Fist, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 664, 89 N. W. 760. The court said: "The court instructed the jury that, if it found for plaintiff, the measure of her damages should be the value of the property at the time it was taken, with interest from the time of taking at 7 per cent. This was clearly the correct rule by which her damages should be measured."

And where the sheriff levied an attachment upon goods, and the goods were taken from him in an action of replevin, in which latter case he obtained a verdict, it was held that the value of the interest of the sheriff was the amount of the attachment, with interest thereon, with costs. State ex rel. Hershisher v. Kinkaid, 23 Neb. 641, 37 N. W. 612.

The same was held in Gamble v. Wilson, 33 Neb. 270, 50 N. W. 3. The court said: "Where property is replevied from a sheriff holding it by virtue of a levy under an execution or attachment, the measure of the officer's damages, in case of a verdict in his favor, is, within the value of the property, the amount due upon the writ, with interest and costs."

The general rule was applied in Nevada. Blackie v. Cooney, 8 Nev. 44.

And New York in Suydam v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. 614; Keep v. Kauffman, 6 Jones & S. 476; Brizsee v. Maybee, 21 Wend. 144; Brewster v. Silliman, 38 N. Y. 430.

A wool company shipped wool, and the consignee, without the knowledge of the shipper, stored the same in a warehouse.

and negotiated the receipts to a trust company, and failed. The wool company brought an action of replevin, and the holder of the receipts was made a party, and the wool remained in the custody of the sheriff. It was held that interest should be allowed the plaintiff from the date of demand, where the claim of the trust company was unfounded. Follett Wool Co. v. Utica Trust & D. Co. 84 App. Div. 151, 82 N. Y. Supp. 597.

In Crossley v. Hojer, 11 Misc. 57, 31 N. Y. Supp. 837, in an action of replevin to recover certain goods and chattels, where the question in dispute was the amount of damages, the court said: "In trover, the value at the time of conversion, with interest, is the measure of recovery. In replevin, the successful party can recover the possession of the property, with interest on its value, and the amount of the depreciation thereof, as damages for detention."

North Carolina.—In an action of claim and delivery, it was held that the jury, in their discretion, could allow interest, as damages, on the value of the property from the time it was taken. Patapasco Guano Co. v. Magee, 86 N. C. 350. It was said that North Carolina Rev. Code, chap. 31, made no provision for interest in actions for trover or trespass de bonis asportatis.

Ohio.—In an action of replevin from a sheriff holding property under execution, it was held that if the issue were found for defendant, and the value of the property were greater than the execution, the damages would be the amount of the execution, with interest and costs; but that if the value of the property were less than the amount of the execution, then the rule of damages would be the full value of the property. Jennings v. Johnson, 17 Ohio, 154, 49 Am. Dec. 451.

The ordinary rule is applied in Pennsylvania. Collins v. Houston, 138 Pa. 481, 21 Atl. 234.

In McDonald v. Scaife, 11 Pa. 381, 51 Am. Dec. 556, which was an action of replevin, it was held that the ordinary rule was to give damages for the value of the goods taken, with interest on the value; yet, the jury might give exemplary damages under peculiar circumstances.

Tennessee.—Under Tenn. Code, § 3300, providing that in replevin, if the jury find for defendant, the judgment shall be for the return of the property; or, on failure, that the defendant recover its value with interest thereon, and damages for its detention, it was held that the value at the time the property was taken from the defendant should be adopted. It was also held that whatever the jury might find in regard to damages for the detention, the defendant was entitled to interest upon the value as a matter of law. Mayberry v. Cliffe, 7 Coldw. 118.

ham, 80 Wis. 230, 49 N. W. 745. The court said: "The measure of damages which this court has laid down in numerous cases of this kind is the legal interest on the value of the property while it was unlawfully detained, and compensation for any depreciation, if any, of the property replevied." And in Bigelow v. Doolittle, 30 Wis. 115, the court held that the same rule applied as would be the rule in trover.

Where property was replevied from an officer holding it under execution, if the defendant recovered, and the value of the property was greater than the amount of the execution, it was held that the amount of his recovery should be limited to the amount of the execution, with interest and costs. Booth v. Ableman, 20 Wis. 21, 88 Am. Dec. 730.

In the same case (20 Wis. 602), it was held that the measure of damages was the amount of the judgment, with interest to the time of replevin, with interest on that amount for detention.

Where a party obtained a judgment in his favor for the detention of goods replevied, it was held that interest on the value of the goods unlawfully taken ordinarily formed the proper measure of damages. But it was held error to make no distinction between damages for the detention before the service of the writ and after service. Graves v. Sittig, 5 Wis. 223.

Wyoming.—Interest as damages for detention in replevin where the property was delivered to the plaintiff was held proper. First Nat. Bank v. Ludvigsen, 8 Wyo. 230, 80 Am. St. Rep. 928, 56 Pac. 994, 57 Pac. 934.

A verdict in replevin for the value proved with interest, was held not excessive, in Boswell v. First Nat. Bank, 16 Wyo. 161, 92 Pac. 624, 93 Pac. 661.

Interest and the value of the use cannot both be obtained.

Where the plaintiff secured possession of property, in replevin, an instruction that if the jury found for defendant, they must find the actual damage by reason of the detention of the property, and also the actual value of the property, and also interest on the actual value from the time the property was taken, was held erroneous in regard to interest. McCarty v. Quimby, 12 Kan. 494.

Where 8,000 goats were killed on an island leased from Mexico, and an action for claim and delivery was brought for a large number of goat skins taken by defendant, it was held that a judgment allowing $1 as damages for the detention of the property, and interest on the value from the date of taking, was erroneous under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 667. Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 51 Pac. 684. The court said: "If interest from the time of the taking can be allowed, which we do not decide, it cannot be allowed except as damages for the detention, and in the present case that damage was fixed at $1."

In an action of replevin for two mules and a harness, and damages for each day the same were detained, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the use, but that interest should not be the basis of computation. Morgan v. Reynolds, 1 Mont. 163. The court said: "The plaintiffs were entitled to the value of the use of these mules and harness. It is true that in actions in the nature of trover, the value of the article converted, together with legal interest thereon from the time of conversion, is the true measure of damages. In trover, the plaintiff seeks to recover a moneyed judgment, and it would be proper to allow him only the value of the use of that money which the law declares to be legal interest. This is, however, an action in the nature of replevin. The plaintiff seeks to recover primarily the specific property detained; and it would seem to me to be but just that he should recover the value of the use of the property so detained as compensation."

In Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 562, 10 Am. Rep. 641, which was an action to recover the possession of a horse, and damages for its detention, it was held that the defendant, who recovered, was entitled to prove and recover the value of the use of the horse. The court in this case reviewed the previous cases, and held that where the property has usable value, interest is not the measure of damages, and said: "In many cases interest on the value from the time of the wrongful taking would be a proper measure. It would be generally in all cases where the property detained was merchandise kept for sale, grain, and all other articles of property useful only for sale or consumption. In such cases, if the owner recover the interest on the value of his property from the time he was deprived of it, he will generally have a complete indemnity unless the property has depreciated in value, in which case the depreciation must be added to the interest on the value, taken as it was before the depreciation, and the two items will furnish the amount of the damages. This damage, together with the property or its value at the time of the trial, will give the owner a complete indemnity, as the law is generally able to give any person seeking redress for a wrong. But the same measure of damages would not generally furnish the owner an indemnity in case the property claimed had a value for use, in other words, a usable value, such as horses, cows, carriages, and boats."

In Twinam v. Swart, 4 Lans. 263, which was an action of replevin for a horse against a purchaser at a constable's sale, it was held that the measure of damages was ordinarily the interest on the value of the property from the time of taking to the time of assessment. In this case it was held there was no difference between actions of trover and replevin, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for the use of the horse.

In Allen v. Fox, supra, the case of Twinam v. Swart, supra, was overruled.

In Scott v. Elliott, 63 N. C. 215, it was held that an instruction directing an allowance of 6 per cent interest was error. The court said: "As to the measure of damages, we can see no ground for making 6 per cent interest on the sworn value the rule, and his Honor erred in adopting it. The earnings of the boat might be more or less. As it does not appear whether the boat is in a condition to be surrendered, or has been destroyed, and this may materially affect the question, we give no opinion in regard to it, further than to say that the plaintiff is entitled to damages as well for the taking as for the detention, and has a right to full indemnity for the injury done to him."

Under Tenn. Code, § 3390, it was held that if the plaintiff gives up the property on a verdict for the defendant, the latter will not be entitled to interest on the assessed value; or, in other words, the judgment for value and interest would be discharged by giving up the property. Smith v. Roby, 6 Heisk. 546.

The owner is entitled to recover the value of the use of the property, if he prefers it to interest. Farrand v. Board of Church Extension, 18 Utah, 29, 54 Pac. 818.

So, in an action of replevin, it was held that the measure of damages for wrongful detention was usually the interest on the value of the property when wrongfully detained; but where the property has a usable value, the value of the use, when so detained, was held to be the proper measure of damages. Werner v. Graley, 54 Kan. 383, 38 Pac. 482.

In an action of replevin where the plaintiff succeeded, an instruction that he was entitled to recover the reasonable value of the use of the goods recovered was held to be proper, as he did not sue on the debt, but for the possession of the property, and was not required to sue for interest on the debt. Barton v. Mulvane, 59 Kan. 313, 52 Pac. 883.

Where the plaintiff took household furniture by writ of replevin, and the defendant did not have the use of other property, and the plaintiff was nonsuited, it was held that an instruction that the measure of damages was the interest on the money value of the property during its detention was properly refused, as the jury could award such damages as they would be satisfied the use of the property was worth. Boston Loan Co. v. Myers, 143 Mass. 446, 9 N. E. 805.

In replevin for a horse, a verdict was found for defendant and damages for detention. In the absence of statute, it was held that the damages must be assessed according to the magnitude of the injury he had sustained, agreeably to the rule of common law; this was the instruction of the court. It was contended that it came within the statute, and the jury should have been instructed to consider 6 per cent on the replevin bond as the measure of damages. Bruce v. Learned, 4 Mass. 614. It was held that there was no statute, and the rule contended for did not apply.

An action of replevin was brought for a trunk and contents, consisting of bank bills and bonds. The verdict was taken for defendant because improperly brought. It was held that, in order to recover more than nominal damages, the defendant should have proved actual damages, and none were proved. Bartlett v. Brickett, 14 Allen, 62. The court said: "Except in the special cases in which provision is made by statute, the defendant in replevin who prevails is to recover damages 'measured by the nature and degree of the injury he has sustained according to the common law.' The cases in which 6 per cent upon the value of the goods replevied has been allowed as damages, in analogy to the rule in other cases of unlawful detention of property, will be found to be cases where the defendant was entitled to a return, and where the chattels replevied were merchandise or other property capable of physical use and enjoyment. That rule has no just application to the case of securities for money, bearing interest. It does not appear from the evidence reported, nor is it suggested, that the defendant claims any property in the replevied goods, nor that he has asked for a return of them. There is nothing in the case to show that any actual loss has accrued to him from being deprived of them."

In an action to recover the value of hay, it was held that where the plaintiff in replevin took possession and suit was commenced, and the jury found for the defendant the value at a time subsequent to the taking, interest could not be added to this value from the time of taking up to the time the value was assessed. Atherton v. Fowler, 46 Cal. 323. In this case it was admitted by both parties that where a jury found the value nearly a year subsequent to the taking, the allowance of interest from the time of taking was erroneous, and that the allowance of interest between the times when the verdict was rendered and the judgment entered up was erroneous.

The allowance of interest on the value of property prior to the return of a verdict in replevin was held erroneous under Iowa Code, § 4178, giving a party in an action of replevin, found entitled to property not in his possession, the option to have an execution for the delivery of the property or for its value. This was held to refer to the time when the judgment was rendered, or to a later date, and not to the time when the action was commenced. Bonnot Co. v. Newman Bros. 109 Iowa, 580, 80 N. W. 655.

In Missouri, under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 3854 (Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 1245, § 11, Rev. Stat. 1889, § 7489, Rev. Stat. 1899, § 4473), providing that if plaintiff fail to prosecute his action with effect, and shall have the property, and the defendant claims and demands a return thereof, the jury may assess the value of the property and the damages for taking and detaining the same, for the time such property was taken until the day of trial, it was held that the value at the time of assessment controlled, and that the jury could consider depreciation in estimating damages for taking and detaining, but no interest was to be allowed. Pope v. Jenkins, 30 Mo. 528; Andrews v. Costican, 30-26 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mo. App. 29; Chapman v. Kerr, 80 Mo. 158. This latter case overrules Woodburn v. Cogdal, 39 Mo. 228, and Miller v. Whitson, 40 Mo. 101, which held that interest was proper.

There are some Missouri court of appeals cases following Walker v. Borland, 21 Mo. 289, which was an action of trespass for seizing and selling property, which do not discuss Chapman v. Kerr, supra, or the statute cited therein, controlling "replevin" cases, but cite a statute on "damages." Neither line of cases attempts to reconcile the two statutes, but it would seem that the case of Chapman v. Kerr, applying the replevin statute, is the law of that state. Both statutes were in force when all these late conflicting cases were decided.

In an action of replevin where the plaintiff obtained possession and judgment was for defendant, it was held that it was discretionary whether the jury should or should not allow interest, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2869, providing that the jury on a trial of damages may, if they think fit, give damages in the nature of interest, over and above the value of the goods at the time of seizure. Feller v. McKillip, 109 Mo. App. 61, 81 S. W. 641.

In an action of replevin, if the property was obtained without injury, it was held that the owner was entitled only to damages for the caption and detention, and the ordinary damages were the interest on the value of the property. Reno v. Kingsbury, 39 Mo. App. 240.

In an action of replevin, where the judgment was for defendant, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property when taken, with legal interest to the time of trial. Shenuit v. Breuggestratt, 8 Mo. App. 46.

X. Sale.

a. Nondelivery.

The general rule is that where the price has not been paid and the vendor refuses to deliver, he will be liable for the difference between the contract and the market price, at the time and place of delivery, with interest from that time. If the price has been paid, he will be liable for the market price at the time and place of delivery, with interest from that time. In Indiana interest was denied, where there was no rescission, and in California interest was allowed under one section of the Code, where the damages were easily ascertained, and denied in another case, under another section of the Code, where the damages were not easily ascertained.

So, in an action for breach of contract for sale of goods, the price not having been paid in advance, and the vendor having failed to deliver them according to the contract, the measure of damages was held to be the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery, with interest. Penn v. Smith, 104 Ala. 445, 18 So. 38;

McFadden v. Henderson, 128 Ala. 221, 29 So. 640.

In Bell v. Reynolds, 78 Ala. 511, 50 Am. Rep. 52, where it was held special profits could be recovered for failing to deliver a fertilizer, where no other could be had to raise the crop, the court said: "The general rule is familiar that, in ordinary cases, when the vendor has failed or refused to deliver to the purchaser goods sold, the measure of damages for the breach of contract, if the price has not been paid, is the difference between the agreed price and the market price of the goods at the time and place of delivery, with interest."

And a vendee is entitled to recover for the nondelivery of goods the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery, with interest. Bunch v. Potts, 57 Ark. 257, 21 S. W. 437.

And where a vendor wrongfully stopped in transit goods sold to an insolvent, who had pledged the bills of lading, and the vendor thereby prevented the delivery of the goods, he was held liable for interest on their value. Pope v. Baltimore Warehouse Co. 103 Md. 9, 62 Atl. 1119.

In an action for breach of an agreement to sell and deliver goods, where it was agreed that if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, they were entitled to recover at a certain rate per ton for the failure to deliver a certain number of tons, it was held that plaintiffs were entitled to interest on the amount so computed from the date of their demand. Thomas v. Wells, 140 Mass. 517, 5 N. E. 485. The court said: "The bill of exception states that 'it was agreed that, if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, they were entitled to recover for the failure to deliver 46 6/40 tons, and that the measure of damages should be $10 per ton.' The fair meaning of this agreement is, that, at the time the defendants refused to perform the contract, the plaintiffs were damaged to the extent of $10 per ton; that is, that the goods were then worth $10 per ton more than the contract price. This being so, in order to put the plaintiffs in as good a position as they would have been in if the contract had been performed, they are entitled to interest from the date of their demand."

And in an action for failure to ship a sawmill within the time contracted for, plaintiff was allowed interest as damages on the purchase price only from the time he was deprived of possession of the mill. Edwards v. Sanborn, 6 Mich. 348.

In an action for damages for nondelivery of merchandise purchased, it was held the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and market value at the time and place of delivery, with interest thereon, and that the question of interest was not one of discretion with the jury. Dana v. Fiedler, 12 N. Y. 40, 62 Am. Dec. 130. The court said: "The right to interest, in actions upon contract, depends not upon discretion, but upon legal right; and in actions like the present is as 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) much a part of the indemnity to which the party is entitled as the difference between the market value and the contract price."

That ruling was recognized in White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 393, 34 Am. Rep. 544.

And in an action on a contract for failing to deliver a boat load of flour, where the plaintiffs were ready, able, and willing to perform their part of the contract, it was held that the damages were the difference between the contract price and the value on the day of delivery, with interest. Clark v. Dales, 20 Barb. 42.

In an action for unliquidated damages for breach of an executory contract of sale, where property had a market value, it was held that interest was allowable. Reynolds v. Burr, 104 App. Div. 31, 93 N. Y. Supp. 319.

The measure of damages in a breach of an executory contract for the sale of personal property was held in Enders v. Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364, to be the value of the same when it should have been delivered, with interest from that time until paid.

Where the vendor of cotton agreed to take a certain note in exchange as payment, that the obligor becoming insolvent, the vendor refused to deliver, it was held that the damages would be the face value of the note, with interest from the time of demand. Bicknall v. Waterman, 5 R. I. 43.

And in an action for damages for breach of a contract of conditional sale, it was held that interest would be allowed from the date of failure to deliver the goods. Loomis v. Norman Printers' Supply Co. 81 Conn. 343, 71 Atl. 358.

In Merryman v. Criddle, 4 Munf. 542, the general rule that, in actions for breach of executory contracts, the value of the articles to be delivered, with interest from such time of delivery, forms the proper measure of damages, was held to have some exceptions founded on particular circumstances. The bill of exceptions in this case did not show enough to take the case out of the general rule.

In an action for the nondelivery of stocks, where the same were fraudulently converted by a third party, in no way for the use of the defendant, it was held that the value of the stocks from the time they were charged as delivered, with interest to the time of trial, should be the measure of recovery. Andrews v. Clark, 72 Md. 396, 20 Atl. 429. The agent of the broker misappropriated these stocks, and delivered forged stocks of no value.

The general rule that interest should not be allowed on unliquidated damages was held not to apply to an action against a purchaser of mining property, where he failed to deliver stock in payment, and the stock had a market value susceptible of easy proof. Kuhn v. McKay, 7 Wyo. 42, 49 Pac. 473, 51 Pac. 205.

In an action to recover damages for refusing to transfer on the books of the company and deliver certificates of stock, it was held the measure of damages was the value of shares at the time of such refusal, with interest from that time. Sargent v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 Pick. 90, 19 Am. Dec. 306.

In an action for breach of a contract to sell and deliver stock, where the purchaser did not pay the purchase money in advance, it was held the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day of the breach, with interest from that day. Currie v. White, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 352.

In an action for refusing to deliver wheat, it was held that the measure of damages, where the price had not been paid, was the difference between the market value at the time of default and the contract price, with interest; and this was allowed as compensation for delay in payment of damages. Driggers v. Bell, 94 Ill. 223.

In an action for damages for breach of a contract to ship and transport certain wheat, it was held that the rule of damages was the difference in value at the place and time of delivery, and the value of the same kind of wheat at the place of shipment, at the same time, with cost of transportation to the place of delivery, with interest from the date when it should have been delivered. Cowley v. Davidson, 13 Minn. 92, Gil. 86.

Plaintiff is entitled to interest only from the time of breach. Brackett v. Edgerton, 14 Minn. 174, Gil. 134, 100 Am. Dec. 211.

And on a claim for damages for refusal to deliver the whole quantity of wheat according to contract, it was held the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price of the wheat not delivered and its market value at the time it was to be delivered, with interest on the difference. Fishell v. Winans, 38 Barb. 228.

The jury could allow interest by way of damages. Dox v. Dey, 3 Wend. 356.

In an action of assumpsit founded upon an agreement to deliver personal property, where the price was paid in advance, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the property at the time of delivery, with interest thereon to the time of trial. Bickell v. Colton, 41 Miss. 368.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver hemlock bark, it was held proper to allow interest from the commencement of the action. Gallun v. Seymour, 76 Wis. 251, 45 N. W. 115.

In an action for damages, under contract to sell and deliver so much ice per year for five years, plaintiff was entitled to interest from the close of the year. Winch v. Mutual Ben. Ice Co. 86 N. Y. 618.

The measure of damages for breach of contract for delivery of ice, where the vendor failed to deliver, is the difference between what the same would have cost the purchaser under the contract, and the market value at such time, with interest. Anderson v. Savoy, 137 Wis. 44, 118 N. W. 217.

In an action for damages for breach of contract of sale, and for failure to deliver peaches at a certain price, it was held that the court properly allowed interest upon the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

amount of damages sustained from the date of filing the complaint, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3287, providing that every person who is entitled to recover damages capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled to recover interest from that day. Cutting Fruit Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 75 Pac. 564. The defendant delivered part of those sold, and the plaintiff was compelled to buy at an advance, and sued for the difference.

But in an action for damages for failure to deliver fruit, it was held that interest on the damages could not be allowed under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3308, providing damages for breach of contract to sell, or § 3311, providing damages for breach of contract to purchase. Ellsworth v. Knowles, 8 Cal. App. 630, 97 Pac. 690. It was held that neither section provided for interest, and both sections were subject to § 3357, providing that the damages prescribed in this chapter are exclusive of exemplary damages and interest, except where those are expressly mentioned. In this case the contract was to deliver 1850 12½ "lbs. kilo boxes apricots," which was a combination of two systems of weights that made it uncertain, but it was finally construed to mean kilo boxes at 27½ pounds per box. In this case, differing from the preceding one, the damages could not be made certain by calculation.

So, in an action on a contract to sell and deliver hogs, where the plaintiff did not demand rescission, and sued for damages, it was held that an instruction authorizing a verdict for interest was erroneous. Harvey v. Myer, 9 Ind. 391; Dobenspeck v. Armel, 11 Ind. 31. The court said: "But no authority has been cited, nor do we know of any, which allows interest to be recovered on money advanced on such contract, unless it has been rescinded."

b. Refusing to accept.

Interest will be allowed on damages for refusal to accept goods that were purchased under a contract of sale, if the damages can be readily ascertained.

So, in an action by vendors for breach of an executory contract to purchase, it was admitted that a party is entitled to recover interest as part of the damages, when the property sells at a market value at the time of the breach, but, as the subject of the sale was an old ferryboat that had no market value, it was held that interest could not be allowed. Gray v. Central R. Co. 157 N. Y. 483, 52 N. E. 555.

In an action for breach of contract to purchase lard, and for damages for refusing to take and pay for the same, it was said: "The court instructed the jury that the appellee was entitled to interest on whatever damages he sustained. Cases, even in this state, conflict upon that question. The instruction is in accord with Driggers v. Bell, 94 Ill. 223, and A. B. Dick Co. v. Sherwood Letter File Co. 51 Ill. App. 343, affirmed in 157 Ill. 325, 42 N. E. 440," Murray v. Doub, 63 Ill. App. 247.

In an action by the seller for refusing to take pig iron, it was held that interest on damages from the time of the breach of the contract was allowable. Vierling v. Iroquois Furnace Co. 68 Ill. App. 643.

In an action for breach of contract of goods, where the measure of damages was held to be the difference between the contract price of the goods sold and the market value at the time the defendant refused to receive them, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 3705. Nelson v. Hirsch & Sons Iron & Rail Co. 102 Mo. App. 498, 77 S. W. 590.

But in Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co. 106 Cal. 441, 39 Pac. 853, which was an action by the vendor against the purchaser for refusing to accept a crop of fruit, it was held that interest could not be allowed under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3311, providing that the excess of the contract price over the value of the property to the seller was the measure of damages, and § 3357, providing that the damages prescribed by this chapter are exclusive of exemplary damages and interest, except where those are expressly mentioned. The court said it could not be given under § 3287, providing that every person who is entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him on a particular day, is entitled to interest from that day, "unless it can be held that the damages in this case were" capable of being made certain by calculation, "and this, we think, could not be done." And whether, if the complaint had alleged the market price at date of breach, and demanded judgment for a specific sum, interest might have been allowed, was not decided.

c. Warranty, deceit, and fraud.

Where the damages are easily ascertainable, or the property received is of no value whatever, the rule seems to be that interest will be allowed. But where the damages are unliquidated and uncertain, interest is denied.

Thus, in an action for breach of warranty of a slave, a jury could allow interest on the difference between the real value of the slave at the time of warranty and his value, if sound, according to the warranty, from the time of the sale. Marshall v. Wood, 16 Ala. 806; Kornegay v. White, 10 Ala. 255.

In an action on a written warranty of the soundness of a slave, it was held that where one party had a legal right to recover damages as due at a particular time, he was also entitled to interest from the maturity of the demand until the trial. Stoudemeier v. Williamson, 29 Ala. 558. This would be the difference between the value at the time of the sale and the actual value at that time, with interest from that time.

In a suit to subject a separate estate to a judgment for purchase money of a slave, the defense was fraud in the sale of the slave, and it was held that the defendant was entitled to a deduction of a sum equal to the difference between the actual value of the slave at the time of sale, and the value the slave ought to have had, with interest on that sum. Caldwell v. Sawyer, 30 Ala. 283.

On breach of warranty of title of a slave, it was held that the damages were the purchase price and interest; but interest should not be computed during the time that the title was good. Crittenden v. Posey, 1 Head, 311.

But in Ware v. Weathnall, 2 M'Cord, L. 413, it was held that the measure of damages was the purchase price, with interest from the time of the purchase.

In an action for a breach of warranty for the sale of a slave, where there had been an exchange of slaves, an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest upon the value of the slave, if he was unsound and worthless, from the date of the exchange, was held to be erroneous. Tatum v. Mohr, 21 Ark. 349. The court said: "On general principles, in a suit like the present, for unliquidated contested damages, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover interest as such. . . . If the plaintiff was entitled to interest under the statute (Gould's Dig. chap. 92), it was under that clause of the first section which allows interest 'on money due and withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment,' and this was a question for the jury."

In an action for a breach of warranty in the sale of live stock, it was held that the amount ascertained to be proper compensation at the time of the breach might be increased by the addition of interest; but whether it was or not rested in the discretion of the jury, and it was held error to instruct the jury to find interest. Snowden v. Waterman, 110 Ga. 99, 35 S. E. 309.

Where the vendor of sheep represented that they were free from disease, when they were not, it was held that the measure of damages was the difference in value between the amount paid and what they were really worth at the time, and interest from that time. Routh v. Caron, 64 Tex. 292.

In an action for breach of warranty in the sale of a horse, where there was a failure to replace him, and he was returned to the seller, it was held that the measure of the buyer's damages was the value of the horse as purchased, not exceeding the purchase price, with interest from the time the horse should have been replaced. Christie v. Crawford, 152 Mich. 400, 116 N. W. 202.

And where the plaintiff was entitled to recover for deceit in delivering to him worthless stock, it was held the damages were the purchase money paid, with 6 per cent interest. Heed v. Pierce, 8 Mo. App. 568.

Where the purchaser paid more than the contract price for stock in a corporation, under an agreement that it should be adjusted, it was held that the vendor was liable for the excess, with interest from the date of demand, but not from the date of payment. Ft. Smith Wagon Co. v. Baker, 84 Ark. 444, 105 S. W. 591.

In an action for fraud and deceit in the sale of notes represented to be well secured, it was held that the measure of damages was the difference between the actual value and what the value should have been at the time of the transaction, with interest to the time of trial. Schwitters v. Springer, 236 Ill. 271, 86 N. E. 102, affirming 137 Ill. App. 103.

And in an action for breach of warranty in the sale of a threshing machine, it was held that the jury were properly instructed to find the difference in the value of the machine as it was and as it would have been had it been as warranted, with interest from the date of sale. Pitsinowsky v. Beard-sley, 37 Iowa, 9.

And in an action on a note given for a reaper, where the defense was breach of warranty, it was held that the jury could augment the damages by including interest. Minneapolis Harvester Works v. Bonnallie, 29 Minn. 373, 13 N. W. 149. The court said: "To afford the party just compensation, since his damages accrued at a different time, he must be allowed interest, else, the longer the delay, the more inadequate his compensation would prove to be."

On a breach of warranty for manufactured goods, the purchaser is entitled to recover the price paid, with interest from that time. South Bend Pulley Co. v. W. E. Caldwell Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1084, 54 S. W. 12.

In an action on a warranty of flour purchased, plaintiff is entitled to recover the consideration money paid for the several barrels which prove defective, with interest as allowed. Voorhees v. Earl, 2 Hill, 288, 38 Am. Dec. 588.

The measure of damages for breach of a contract of sale of cotton is the difference in value of that delivered and that contracted for, with interest thereon. Connor v. S. Blaisdell Jr. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 890.

And in an action for damages in inducing the plaintiff, by fraudulent representations, to purchase an interest in a business, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover such loss as might have been the direct result of such fraudulent representations, not exceeding the amount paid by him for the property, with interest. Buschman v. Codd, 52 Md. 202.

In cases where the damages are uncertain, interest is not allowed.

In an action for breach of warranty of cabbage seed, where the referee allowed interest on the damages from the time the crops should have been harvested and sold, it was held erroneous. White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 393, 34 Am. Rep. 544. The court said: "The demand was unliquidated, and the amount could not be determined by computation simply, or reference to market values."

of warranty as to the efficiency of certain boilers, it was held that no interest should have been allowed, as the damages were unliquidated. Krasilnikoff v. Dundon, 8 Cal. App. 406, 97 Pac. 172.

And interest was denied in the following cases:

An action for breach of warranty or unliquidated damages. Young v. Van Natta, 113 Mo. App. 550, 88 S. W. 123. This was a warranty in the sale of live stock.

An action for breach of warranty of rosin. Lewis v. Rountree, 79 N. C. 122, 28 Am. Rep. 309. The court said: "In the present case, although we may assume that the defendant had notice by the commencement of the action, that he was looked to for the payment of damages, yet, as a fact, not only was the amount technically unliquidated, but, owing to the unsettled state of the law, it was uncertain. He could not safely and without risk pay any sum until it was ascertained by a judgment, which he might expect it speedily would be."

A special assumpsit on a warranty of soundness. Ancrum v. Slone, 2 Speers, L. 594, following Holmes v. Misroon, 1 Treadway, Const. 21. The court said: "Interest being stated damages on pecuniary liabilities, to find a sum with interest in an action sounding in damages is to allow damages on damages, which is an incongruity."

But in Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land Transp. & Mfg. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661, Ancrum v. Slone, supra, was not approved.

XI. Fraud and deceit.

In actions for fraud and deceit, where the damages are susceptible of computation, the cases allow interest. But in Virginia, interest was denied.

In an action for damages for falsely representing the value of land in exchange, it was held that interest should be allowed as damages where the difference in value did not compensate. Cook v. Perry, 43 Mich. 623, 5 N. W. 1054.

And in an action for deceit and fraud causing plaintiff loss of property, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to have the value of the property lost, and interest might be allowed in such cases. McBeth v. Ciddock, 28 Mo. App. 380.

And in an action for obtaining money by fraudulent representations, where there was no question as to the amount, it was held proper to allow interest on the amount if the jury should find for plaintiff. Arthur v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 12 Mo. App. 335.

And in an action for fraud in procuring plaintiff to make a loan on land worth less than the sum loaned, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between the amount loaned and the value she received, and interest upon this sum from the time the loan was made. Briggs v. Brushaber, 43 Mich. 330, 38 Am. Rep. 187, 5 N. W. 383.

In an action for money obtained by fraudulent representations, plaintiffs were entitled to interest. Meyer v. Johnson, 122 Ill. App. 87. The court said: "This money belonged to plaintiffs, and was withheld from them by defendant without the knowledge by plaintiffs that defendant had thus obtained and was holding their money. We think the case was within the spirit of § 2 of the interest act. Stern v. People, 102 Ill. 540. But interest was not named in the bill of particulars. A party is bound by his bill of particulars when filed under a rule of court. . . . We hold that, as it is the statute which gives the interest, it was not necessary to claim it in the bill of particulars."

In Snow v. Nowlin, 43 Mich. 383, 5 N. W. 443, in an action of trespass on the case for misrepresentation of the value of land exchanged, the court said: "As to the question of interest: in cases of contract and many cases of tort, the rule is well settled in this state that interest may be allowed by way of damages. The plaintiff is allowed full compensation for the injury he has sustained. He is to be placed as nearly as can be in the position he would have if the representations made had been true. The difference in value will not accomplish this unless interest is added thereto."

In an action for damages by reason of false representations to procure the delivery of personal property on conditional sale, where there was a stipulation that if plaintiff recovered, the court could add interest to the verdict, it was held that although it was discretionary with the jury, in that case the court could add interest to the verdict. Nichols v. Coleman, 96 App. Div. 353, 89 N. Y. Supp. 234.

In an action on the case for fraudulently obtaining property of plaintiff, it was held that, in case of tort, the allowance of interest as damages was in the discretion of the jury, but was not allowable as a matter of law. Lincoln v. Claffin, 7 Wall. 132, 19 L. ed. 106. But in this case the error in allowing interest could not be taken advantage of for want of an exception.

And in an action for fraud and deceit, it was held that the jury had no right to allow interest. Brugh v. Shanks, 5 Leigh, 598. The court said: "It was not within its province or power. It has meddled with a matter with which it had no concern. The verdict as to the interest is therefore impertinent, and mere surplusage, and that part of it should have been disregarded by the county court." After this case, Va. Code 1849, chap. 177, § 14, provides that in any action, whether arising from contract or from tort, the jury may allow interest, and fix the period when it shall commence.

XII. Eminent domain.

a. Generally.

The general rule in eminent domain is to allow interest on the damages from the time of taking. Some cases allow interest from the time of judgment, others from the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

time of confirmation of the report or award. In some cases interest was allowed from the time of the proceedings. The difference in the cases is largely due to the language of the statute authorizing condemnation.

In Iowa the owner of land taken and condemned by a railroad was held entitled to interest from the date of the taking of the land, but it was held that he should have the interest adjudicated when the damages were assessed. It was also held that it was the duty of the jury to assess the damages as of the date of the assessment, and then upon the verdict the court should make a proper order touching the question of interest. Reed v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 25 Fed. 886.

In Newgass v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 54 Ark. 140, 15 S. W. 188, it was held that, as the corporation had been in the enjoyment of the land, the damages assessed would bear interest from the date of filing the petition.

But where the owner was not deprived of possession, it was held that he was not entitled to interest until the actual taking. Los Angeles v. Gager, 10 Cal. App. 378, 102 Pac. 17.

And where a judgment in condemnation was reversed on appeal by the owner, on the second trial it was held that he was entitled to interest on the judgment from the time possession was taken. Moll v. Sanitary Dist. 228 Ill. 633, 81 N. E. 1147. In this case the plaintiff was compelled to appeal, and possession was taken of his property and held for three years, and just compensation was held not only to include the value of the property from the time of filing the petition, but the use of the property from the time the petitioner took possession, measured by the interest for that time on the value of the property, as found by the jury.

And in an action of assumpsit to recover interest on an award of damages, it was held that the owners had no vested right to the condemnation money until the possession was taken; and until that time could not maintain an action for interest. Beveridge v. West Chicago Park, 7 Ill. App. 460. The court said: "As the park commissioner had not taken possession of the plaintiffs' land before the institution of this suit, the plaintiffs had no right of action to recover the damages awarded, and if not, the claim for interest is without foundation."

Interest from time of taking was allowed in Evanston v. Clark, 77 Ill. App. 234; Chicago v. Smythe, 33 Ill. App. 28; Lawrence v. New Orleans, 2 La. Ann. 651; Bangor & P. R. Co. v. McComb, 60 Me. 290; Guinn v. Iowa & St. L. R. Co. 131 Iowa, 680, 169 N. W. 209; Drury v. Midland R. Co. 127 Mass. 571; Reed v. Hanover Branch R. Co. 105 Mass. 303; Whitman v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Allen, 313; Old Colony R. Co. v. Miller, 125 Mass. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 194; Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 125 Mass. 544; Miller v. St. Louis & K. C. R. Co. 162 Mo. 424, 63 S. W. 85; Panhandle & G. R. Co. v. Kirby (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 498 (it was said the statutes do not provide for interest, but there was no reason "why interest may not be recovered as in other cases of appropriation"); San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. Board of Education (Utah) 99 Pac. 263; Sweaney v. United States, 62 Wis. 396, 22 N. W. 609 (overflow caused by a dam); and Lough v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 116 Iowa, 31, 89 N. W. 77. The court said: "There was evidence tending to show that defendant took possession of the land in the month of September, 1899. This would have justified an award of interest after October 1st of that year. It was a matter for the court to act upon, and need not have been submitted to the jury, for no disputed questions of facts were involved."

And where a railroad took land without condemnation, and subsequently brought an action under the statute to assess damages, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of land, with interest from the time of its appropriation. Daniels v. Chicago, I. & N. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 52. The court said: "It will be seen, in view of these considerations, that the value of the land at the time of the appropriation, with interest upon the sum assessed from that date until judgment in this case, is the just measure of plaintiff's damages."

A sheriff's jury found for plaintiff $1,500. On appeal and trial by jury, the damages were assessed at $1,300, with interest. This was held equivalent to a general verdict for $1,300, with interest, and a special verdict that the damages sustained at the time the land was taken were $1,300, and the court properly computed the interest and rendered judgment for $1,414. Noble v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 637, 17 N. W. 26.

And where the jury did not include interest in their verdict, the allowance of interest by the court from the time of the appropriation to the date of judgment was held not erroneous. Hollingsworth v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 443, 19 N. W. 325.

In a proceeding for condemnation it was held that the owner was entitled to interest from the time the land was appropriated; but it would make no difference that the company had deposited the amount of the valuation and assessment with the treasurer of the county. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Owen, 8 Kan. 409.

And where a railroad appropriated a strip of land, and the owner sued for damages, it was held that he could recover interest, or damages in the nature of interest, on the amount due him, from the time of taking. Cohen v. St. Louis, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 34 Kan. 158, 55 Am. Rep. 242, 8 Pac. 138. The court said there were exceptions to this rule, but this case did not come within the exceptions.

In a proceeding to condemn land, it was held that if interest could be allowed at all, it could be allowed only from the time the land was taken, and not from the time of the location. Gay v. Gardiner, 54 Me. 477. The court said: "Till then the owners would have no right to demand payment of their damages, and the respondents would not be in fault for not paying them. In the absence of any express promise or agreement to pay interest, the law does not make a party liable for interest till he is in fault for not paying the principal. Rev. Stat. chap. 18, § 7."

Mass. Stat. 1894, chap. 288, and Stat. 1895, chap. 450, providing that the board shall estimate the damages sustained by any person by the taking of land, or of any right therein; but anyone aggrieved may have such damages assessed by a jury in the same manner as the laying out of ways, was held to have reference only to the mode of procedure, and not to the rule of damages. It was held that interest was to be allowed from the time of taking, and not merely from the time of plaintiff's removal from the premises. Hay v. Com. 183 Mass. 294, 67 N. E. 334. The court said: "Where land is taken for a highway, the damages are not payable till entry is made upon the land for the purpose of constructing the way; and the statute of limitations does not begin to run till then. Accordingly it has been held that in highway cases interest is to be reckoned from the date of the entry, and not from the date of the location. . . . But in the present case the title passed and the right to damages accrued upon the taking. . . . The taking is the point of time as of which the damages are to be assessed, and the general rule must therefore apply and interest be computed from the taking."

And where a leasehold property used for greenhouses was taken in eminent domain, it was held that in a case of this kind, interest should be allowed upon the damages, ascertained from the time when they were payable, which ordinarily is the time of taking. Pegler v. Hyde Park, 176 Mass. 101, 57 N. E. 327. The court said: "By the Pub. Stat. chap. 49, § 14, when land is taken for a public way, damages cannot be ordered paid, and a person claiming damages has no right to demand them, until the land is entered upon and possession taken for the purpose of constructing the way. Under this statute, which applies to the present case, the interest does not begin to run until the land is entered upon for the purpose of construction."

And under Mass. Stat. 1900, chap. 472, providing for the abolition of grade crossings in Fall River, it was held that interest was to be reckoned from the date of taking, and not from the date of entry. Providence, F. R. & N. S. B. Co. v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 45, 72 N. E. 338. The court said: "The reason for the provision of the Rev. Laws, chap. 48, § 13, relied on by the respondents, is not applicable to the assessment under this statute, which statute in itself shows a final determination that the work shall be done, and under which no land of the petitioners was taken, but only certain rights in land."

Where the owner of land retained possession after condemnation, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest from the time of taking to the date of the verdict. Imbescheid v. Old Colony R. Co. 171 Mass. 209, 50 N. E. 609. The court said: "The petitioner's loss of title occurred at the date of the taking. His compensation was then due, and his right to recover it, with interest from that date, is settled."

Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 77, § 3, chap. 171, § 8, providing for interest at 4 per cent from the date of actual entry in taking by eminent domain, was held constitutional, although the general law allowed interest at 6 per cent in other matters. Norcross v. Cambridge, 166 Mass. 508, 33 L.R.A. 843, 44 N. E. 615. The court said: "The rule has been generally laid down in this state that the landowner is entitled to interest from the time of the taking, because compensation has generally been regarded as due and payable then. We think, however, that the rule cannot be held so far to express a matter of common right that a departure from it by the legislature in a statute authorizing a taking by eminent domain would render the statute in which it occurred wholly or partly unconstitutional. In the highway act it is expressly provided that interest shall be payable only from the date of actual entry. Pub. Stat. chap. 49, § 14. The constitutionality of that provision, so far as we are aware, has never been questioned."

And in Edmands v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535, it was held that interest on damages assessed should be allowed only from the time of actual entry, in the absence of any evidence of loss from the use of land. The court said: "The question of interest upon the amount of damages, estimated 'as of the date of the formal paper taking,' is reserved for our determination. In Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. 198, interest upon the value of the land at the time it was taken was held to be recoverable from that time. The decision was put upon the ground that the taking is the purchase of a public easement, and that the consideration is due, as in other purchases, at the moment the purchase is made, and ought then to be paid; but delay being necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the proper amount of the consideration, interest in the meantime is a suitable compensation therefor."

In Hay v. Com. supra, the cases of Edmands v. Boston, and Pegler v. Hyde Park, supra, were distinguished, as in those cases the statute provided that the rule of damages should be the same as in cases of laying out of ways, but there is no such statute in this case.

Where an amended statute was passed June 28, 1902, extending the time when claims for damages could be asserted under an act restricting the erection of buildings to a certain height, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest from June 28, 1902, which was the date of the only taking under which the petition could be maintained. Raymond v. Com. 192 Mass. 486, 78 N. E. 514. The court said: "But it is obvious there can be no entry upon the premises in the sense that when land is taken for the use of the public, physical possession at some period in the proceedings becomes requisite, as in the laying out of public ways, and where interest on the damages awarded, or recovered by suit, is to be computed only from the date of entry."

And under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 43, § 73, providing for assessing damages from laying out a private way in a town, over private land, it was held that in the assessment an allowance of interest from the time when the land was taken could be given by the jury. Kidder v. Oxford, 116 Mass. 165.

And in an action for taking land for the purpose of widening a street, it was held that the rule of damages was the value of the land at the time of taking, with interest thereon, as the measure of damages, adding to or deducting any consequential damages or benefit. Parks v. Boston, supra.

In a petition under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 43, for a jury to assess damages occasioned by widening a street, the commissioners awarded $2,000, as damages. On appeal to a sheriff's jury, who awarded $2,166, as the jury were directed to add interest from the time of taking, it was presumed that they followed the direction, and the original damages were not increased so as to entitle the petitioner to costs. First Baptist Soc. v. Fall River, 119 Mass. 95.

Where the company in condemnation had possession of the land from the date of entry, it was held that the owners were entitled to interest from such time of entry. Webster v. Kansas City & S. R. Co. 116 Mo. 114, 22 S. W. 474. The court said: "The parties throughout the trial recognized that entry as an appropriation, and plaintiffs are equitably entitled to interest to compensate for the use."

In 1877 a railroad prosecuted condemnation proceedings for a right of way and for a depot, and judgment was rendered fixing compensation in 1880. The road was sold under foreclosure in 1881. The owner brought suit to compel payment. The railroad used the right of way, but did not use the part condemned for a depot. It was held that the owner was entitled to compensation for the land actually used, with the election to take the present value or the value at the time of the entry, with interest. And the railroad could elect whether it would take all the land, or relinquish its claim to more than that used as a right of way. Williams v. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. 60 Miss. 689. The court said: "Ordinarily, interest upon the assessment is not allowed the owner when possession remains with him, but in this instance there has been partial possession all the while in the corporation, and as this must have operated in connection with the judgment of condemnation to some extent as a hindrance to the enjoyment and power of sale of the whole, we think interest should be paid in the manner indicated above."

And where the jury in condemnation were instructed to allow interest from the time the railroad took possession, and the jury found a gross amount, it was held that the court could not add interest thereto. Butte Electric R. Co. v. Mathews, 34 Mont. 457, 87 Pac. 450.

And where property was condemned for a right of way by a railroad, and an appeal was taken, it was held that the damages were to be estimated at the time the property was taken. If the railroad company appealed and failed to reduce the amount, it was held that the appellee would be entitled to interest on the award. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Plant, 24 Neb. 127, 38 N. W. 33.

Landowners made a contract with a railroad company to give a right of way in consideration of building a depot, which was not done, and the railroad passed into the hands of receivers and successors. It was held that the latter would be required to pay the value of the land, with interest from the time the land was occupied. New York & G. L. R. Co. v. Stanley, 35 N. J. Eq. 283. The court said: "The foreclosure and sale of the company's property and franchises under the mortgage did not divest the landowners' right to compensation for their land, and they are entitled to such compensation from the purchasers at the sale, though the purchasers are created a new corporation; and interest from the time the lands are occupied is part of the compensation which is recoverable in such a proceeding."

And where a city wrongfully appropriated private property for a street without condemning the same, it was held that the owner could recover the value from the time of taking, and was entitled to interest thereon. Longworth v. Cincinnati, 48 Ohio St. 637, 29 N. E. 274.

And in case of overflow caused by a dam, it was held that the time of complete submergence, and not the date of appraisal, was the time of taking, from which interest would be allowed. Velte v. United States, 76 Wis. 278, 45 N. W. 119. It was held that the rule as in the case of personal property applied.

Where the verdict covers the damages and interest, interest may be allowed on that amount from the date of the verdict, but not from the time of taking. Diedrich v. Northwestern Union R. Co. 47 Wis. 662, 3 N. W. 749.

In the following cases interest was held proper from the time of judgment, decree, or confirmation of the report or award. In California the statute gives interest after thirty days from confirmation of the award.

In a proceeding in the District of Columbia, it was held that under the act of March 2d, 1893, chap. 197, 27 Stat. at L. 532, § 18, providing that when a final decree shall have been made for the payment of damages, and when the money has been paid, the commissioner shall be entitled to take immediate possession of the land, the owner was not entitled to interest pending the proceeding. Bauman v. Ross, 167 U. S. 548, 42 L. ed. 270, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 966.

Interest should be allowed on the damages assessed from the date of filing the report of the committee. New Haven Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Trinity Church, 82 Conn. 378, 73 Atl. 789.

Under Ill. Stat. (1 Starr & C.) chap. 74, § 3, providing that judgments bear interest at 6 per cent, a judgment in condemnation would also bear interest. Epling v. Dickson, 170 Ill. 329, 48 N. E. 1001.

A judgment bears interest where possession was taken. Chicago v. Palmer, 93 Ill. 125.

Ill. Stat. (1 Starr & C. 1359) chap. 74, § 3, providing that judgments shall draw interest at 6 per cent, was held to apply to a judgment in an action at law for injury to property on account of the construction of a railroad on the property. Epling v. Dickson, supra. The court said: "No exception is made in the statute where a judgment has been rendered as compensation for lands taken or damaged for public use, and in the absence of an exception, the statute which controls judgments in other cases must control here. Moreover, it has often been held that a final judgment for the amount found to be due as just compensation will draw interest. Cook v. South Park, 61 Ill. 116; Chicago v. Palmer, supra."

In Cook v. South Park, supra, it was held that interest would not be allowed until final judgment. The court said: "We think that interest should be allowed upon judgments, when final, in proceedings of this character."

After property had been taken, the owner was held entitled to interest, where payment was not made within a reasonable time after confirmation. Beveridge v. West Chicago Park, 100 Ill. 75. The court said: "The land here is shown to have been unoccupied and unproductive, and appellant demanded payment of the damages, thus manifesting an intention not to hold the possession as an equivalent for interest. The demand was made more than five years after the judgment approving the condemnation and assessment of damages. The commissioners were under the legal duty to provide the means and pay the damages within a reasonable time; and failing to do so, they were guilty of a neglect of duty. They should have paid appellant the money before the demand was made, and failing to do so on demand, the commissioners became liable to pay interest."

Where the landowner appealed and obtained a new trial and an award for a larger sum, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of the award. Hartshorn v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 613, 3 N. W. 648. The court said: "Ordinarily, it may be conceded that interest cannot be allowed upon unliquidated damages. But the theory of the law is that damages for right of way shall be estimated as of the date of condemnation, and that payment shall be made before possession is taken of the property. Where possession is taken of the property, and the damages are not paid because of the failure of the sheriff's jury to assess sufficient damages, it seems to us to be proper that interest should be allowed upon the damages finally recovered, if they are in excess of those awarded by the sheriff's jury."

In Lake Koen Nav. Reservoir & Irrig. Co. v. McLain Land & Invest. Co. 69 Kan. 334, 76 Pac. 853, it was held that the proper rule was to allow interest on the damages from the date of condemnation; but the amount should be reduced by the value, if any, to the owner for use of the land.

On an appeal from an award by commissioners, it was held that the court properly instructed the jury that if they found the damages greater than $510, they should allow interest from the time of the appropriation; but if they found the sum not greater than $510, no interest should be allowed, as this instruction did not inform the jury what the previous award was, but simply directed them as to interest. Wichita & W. R. Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 104, 18 Pac. 75.

In an action for damages for appropriating land by a railroad, where the verdict did not include interest nor give data for its computation, it was held error for the court to compute interest for a period prior to the date of the verdict. Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Showalter, 57 Kan. 681, 47 Pac. 831. Kansas Code, Civ. Proc. § 288, provides that when, by the verdict, either party is entitled to recover money, the jury must assess the amount of recovery. The court said that under this it has been held that interest must be computed by the jury and included in the verdict.

Where the company had taken possession, it was held that interest should be allowed from judicial demand. Shreveport & A. R. Co. v. Hollingsworth, 42 La. Ann. 749, 7 So. 693.

After the payment of the judgment, where the owners claimed interest from the day of inquisition, it was held that where property was vacant, the standard of damages should be interest on the value from the day of inquisition, for the time that delay was without justifiable excuse; but that a mandamus did not lie until the jury had ascertained the amount. Norris v. Baltimore, 44 Md. 598.

The owners were entitled to interest on the claim from the day of the confirmation of the inquest. Harness v. Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. 1 Md. Ch. 248.

In Jackson v. Brockton, 182 Mass. 26, 94 Am. St. Rep. 635, 64 N. E. 418, where an appeal was taken because judgment was entered upon an auditor's report for damages, without including interest from the date of the writ, the court said: "In some cases, where the amount to be paid is unliquidated until the report is filed, it would be unjust to treat the defendant as in default before that time. Under such circumstances, the usual practice under Pub. Stat. chap. 171, § 8, is to compute interest from the date of the report."

amount of the verdict from the date of filing the award. Knauff v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 22 Minn. 173; Wilkin v. St. Paul, S. & T. F. R. Co. 22 Minn. 177.

And where the proceedings were confirmed and the city, prior to that date, took possession and had occupied the property ever since, and on appeal the order of confirmation was the same, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of the award. Weide v. St. Paul, 62 Minn. 67, 64 N. W. 65.

The date of filing of the award by the first commissioners was to be deemed the time of taking property, for the purpose of assessing its value; and as the landowner was deprived of all claims subsequent to the first award, and was prevented from selling his property pending appeal, or improving it, he should be allowed interest from that date. Minneapolis v. Wilkin, 30 Minn. 145, 15 N. W. 668.

The interest should be computed upon the amount of verdict from the date of filing of the award, to the entry of the judgment. Warren v. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 424. It was said: "It is true that until the company actually takes possession, at the end of the proceedings, the owner has the legal right to possess and use the land. It cannot be assumed that the value of this legal right is equivalent to the interest on the assessed value of the land. . . . Where the owner has actually derived benefit and value from his possession and use, between the filing of the award and the assessment by the jury, the value of such possession and use may be ascertained by the jury, and the amount of it deducted from the interest allowed."

The jury was required to determine claimant's damages, as of the date of the taking of the property by the company, which was constructively the time when the award was filed; and in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, it was presumed that the verdict referred to the amount of damages the claimant was entitled to at the time the award appealed from was filed, and the district court could allow interest on such verdict to the time of entry of the judgment. Whitacre v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 24 Minn. 311.

Under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1091, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 747, interest is not recoverable against the United States upon an unpaid account or claim; but this is not applicable to a condemnation proceeding by the United States; but a state statute providing that all damages shall bear interest from the time of filing the commissioner's report applies. United States v. Sergeant, 89 C. C. A. 81, 162 Fed. 81.

In Martin v. St. Louis, 139 Mo. 246, 41 S. W. 231, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest on the award from the date of final judgment. The court said: "What might be the city's right if the property owner shall appeal is an entirely different question. Here the city could have avoided all interest by paying the money into court, as permitted by the Constitution and charter. It must be constantly borne in mind that neither the award of the commissioners nor the approval of the court are final. No final order is entered until the city has elected to pay the amount awarded, and certified its assent to the court. Then for the first time we hold that the final judgment is rendered and bears interest like any other money judgment or order."

Interest should be allowed on the judgment from the date of its rendition. Mississippi River Bridge Co. v. Ring, 58 Mo. 491.

Where there is no statute making a provision for interest after a sum is fixed by the award, unless the corporation makes a tender or deposits the money, interest should be allowed from the time of award. Concord R. Co. v. Greely, 23 N. H. 237.

In an appeal from an award in condemnation for a highway, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest from the time of filing the report by the referee until the date of judgment. Wentworth v. Portsmouth, 68 N. H. 392, 44 Atl. 531. The court said: "In the present case, the judgment on the report of the commissioners legally established the highway. The question of the plaintiff's land damages was still being litigated, and was undetermined during the pendency of her appeal. Lyman's Bridge Co. v. Lebanon, 59 N. H. 196. There was no judgment for the plaintiff, entitling her to receive interest upon it, until the judgment upon the report of the referee. The damages were not ascertained until the referee made his report. Before then the plaintiff could not demand them. It is assumed that before then the land was not actually taken from the plaintiff to build the highway, and that she had the use of it until then. But if the land was actually taken from her before then, it is to be presumed that the referee's report, like the verdict of a jury, included in the assessment of damages such interest as she was entitled to receive to that time. The plaintiff is entitled to interest on the award only from the time of filing the report of the referee until the date of the judgment thereon."

And where damages were for plaintiff on laying out a road, and he subsequently brought an action of debt for the amount, it was held that he was entitled to interest from the time the road was opened. Fiske v. Chesterfield, 14 N. H. 240.

In an action for damages to land caused by opening a street, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest from the date of the award. Pepin v. Elizabeth, 57 N. J. L. 653, 32 Atl. 213. This was under New Jersey Pamphlet Laws, 1863 p. 109, § 99, providing that the person entitled thereto may sue for and recover interest from the date of the award.

Under N. J. act March 7, 1873, providing that in case assessments are made in connection with an improvement, the award shall not be payable until the assessment for 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

benefits has been ratified by the council, and only the difference shall be payable to the owner, and interest upon the award shall commence on the date of ratification of the assessment for benefits; and in case the city shall have taken possession before the date of ratification, the award shall be payable and the interest commence on the date of possession,—it was held that interest should be allowed, but that if the landowner, after ratification, had had any use of the property, the value of such use should diminish the interest claim. Fink v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 11.

And under Tenn. Code, § 1326, where commissioners or a jury allowed damages, but did not give interest as such, it was held that the case was in the nature of a proceeding in equity; and the jury not having been directed to find interest, the court could add interest on the confirmation of the report. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Burnett, 11 Lea, 525.

And where the property owner, on an appeal, increases the award, he is entitled to interest on the amount of the verdict from the date of the award. Neilson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 557, 64 N. W. 849.

In Re Water Comrs. 132 App. Div. 75, 116 Supp. 495, that case was distinguished, in that it rested upon West v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 56 Wis. 318, 14 N. W. 292, and Uniacke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 67 Wis. 108, 29 N. W. 899, the first of which does not discuss this question, and the other says there might be equitable considerations which would take a given case out of the rule.

Under a California act concerning railroads, § 36, providing that the railroad company shall pay or tender the amount of award within thirty days after final confirmation of the report, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest on the award, to commence thirty days after the confirmation. Phillips v. Pease, 39 Cal. 582.

In the following case interest was held proper from the date of the condemnation proceedings: Harlan County v. Hogsett, 60 Neb. 362, 83 N. W. 171. The court said: "This is upon the principle that the land is regarded as appropriated as of that date. Upon the same rule, damages by reason of the location of a highway accrue at the date of the condemnation proceedings."

So, in the following cases, where the award was increased by appealing to the court: Burlington & M. R. Co. v. White, 28 Neb. 166, 44 N. W. 95; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Buel, 56 Neb. 205, 76 N. W. 571 (the court said: "It is well settled that where, on an appeal for an award of damages for lands taken for right of way, the damages are found to exceed the sum returned by the commissioners, the owner is entitled to interest from the date of the appropriation"); Sioux City, etc. R. Co. v. Brown, 13 Neb. 317, 14 N. W. 407 (the court said: "It is true, as claimed by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that there is a hardship in requiring the payment of interest on the whole amount of the condemnation money, when, during the time for which it is computed, a large portion thereof has been lying idle in the custody of the law. But it would be a hardship, also, to deprive the owner of the property of its use during the same time without compensation therefor; and, besides, it would be a flagrant violation of his constitutional right to a 'just compensation.' In such case, we think, a nearer approximation to exact justice is reached by visiting the loss upon the party at whose instance and for whose benefit it was incurred, than by putting it upon the one whose property is forcibly taken from him for the benefit of others").

In Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Plant, 24 Neb. 127, 38 N. W. 33, Sioux City, etc. R. Co. v. Brown was distinguished, as that case was not intended to preclude a landowner from recovering interest in case of an appeal by the railroad company, where it failed to reduce the amount of the award.

The Tennessee statute on condemnation makes no provision for interest; but, on general principles, interest should be allowed from the time of the appropriation of the property. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Burnett, 11 Lea, 526; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Moggridge, 116 Tenn. 445, 92 S. W. 1114; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 510, 8 L.R.A. 123, 13 S. W. 123.

And the order of condemnation was held to start the running of interest, as the order vested the petitioner with the right to use the property and deprive the landowner of its use. Snowden v. Shelby County, 118 Tenn. 725, 102 S. W. 90.

In an action for an injunction on the ground that no steps in eminent domain had been taken and no compensation paid by a railroad, it was held that the jury could add interest from the date of the commencement of the suit. Taylor v. Bay City Street R. Co. 101 Mich. 140, 59 N. W. 447. The court said: "The authorities are not uniform upon this subject. The old rule undoubtedly was that interest could not be allowed upon unliquidated damages, and, in action of tort, damages are, of course, unliquidated. The tendency of courts has been, however, to set this rule aside, and adopt the more reasonable one, in cases of injury to property, that the jury must first determine the actual damage sustained, and allow interest upon that sum from its date."

Interest cannot be given except as part of the damages, and then only from the time the damages occurred. Selma, R. & D. R. Co. v. Redwine, 51 Ga. 470. In this case the road was partly graded in 1859, and nothing was done on the road until 1870, when the writ of assessment was sued out, and interest could not have gone back of that time.

b. Pennsylvania cases.

Interest seems to have been allowed from the time of award. In some cases it is held 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that interest is not allowed as interest, but the jury may consider the lapse of time in awarding damages.

Under Pa. act 1849, P. L. 79, making the sum awarded payable when the judgment was entered, it was held that the award of damages bore interest only from the time of filing the award. Hays v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 3 Pennyp. 52.

Where a railroad appealed, it was held that it should pay interest on the amount of award, although it abstained from taking actual possession of the land. Davis v. North Pennsylvania R. Co. 2 Phila. 146. The court said: "This, as well as any other judgment, draws interest; and if the company did not choose to exercise the rights which they demanded and obtained upon the entry of the judgment, by taking possession of the land, that delay would not affect the rights of the parties, who, by not objecting to the judgment, consented to the immediate use of the property by the company."

And under Pa. act Jan. 6, 1864, providing that when the report of a jury assessing damages for opening a street shall be finally confirmed, the sum assessed as damages, against the owners found to be benefited, shall be liens for six months, and when said award is confirmed the street shall be opened and the city shall pay the damages, it was held that interest began to run at confirmation. Norris v. Philadelphia, 70 Pa. 333.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Cooper, 58 Pa. 408, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover interest on the value of his property taken by the railroad from the time that it was taken. The court said: "He is in the position of a vendor of land, who has always been held to have a right to interest on the purchase money where possession has been delivered to the vendee. The viewers, no doubt, allowed him interest up to the date of the report. He has been paid by the company, interest from the time of the final confirmation of it by the court below, including the period during which the cause was delayed by the certiorari from this court. Why shall he not also have interest during the period that the cause was delayed in the court below by the exceptions filed there? No good reason has been or can be given."

Where either party under the charter of a railroad had the right to institute proceedings to ascertain the amount of damages for taking property by the railroad, and the injured party was a lunatic, it was held that the jury could allow interest, where the railroad had used the property for a long time without paying any attention to his rights. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Gesner, 20 Pa. 240.

And under Pa. act 1834, April 15, it was held that the owner was entitled to interest on the confirmation of the report assessing damages. Re Second Ave. 42 W. N. C. 104. The court said: "It was a common rule to allow interest for the detention of money after it should have been paid, and this rule was applicable here."

And under Pa. act April 14, 1868, providing that whenever any report of commissioners shall have been confirmed by the court, the valuation made shall be forthwith payable, it was held that interest should be allowed from the confirmation. Miskey v. Philadelphia, 68 Pa. 48.

In assessing damages for opening a street, it was held that interest could be allowed from the time of taking. It was further held that Pa. act 1851, P. L. 320, amended by act May 22, 1883, related only to the subject of interest after adjudication. Weiss v. South Bethlehem, 136 Pa. 294, 20 Atl. 801. The court said: "In this case, the court directed the jury that if they found for the plaintiffs they should allow interest from October 10, 1887, the date when the report of viewers was filed. As the land of the plaintiffs was taken before that date, there was no harm to the defendant in fixing that time as the period when interest should commence. We do not think the filing of the report had anything to do with this subject, but it was no injury to the defendant to give such an instruction."

A railroad company failing to have the amount of damages ascertained has no right to complain of compensation for the delay in the shape of interest. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Burson, 61 Pa. 369.

The jury could not allow interest as interest, but could consider the lapse of time in allowing damages. Becker v. Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co. 177 Pa. 252, 35 L.R.A. 583, 35 Atl. 617.

Klages v. Philadelphia & R. Terminal R. Co. 160 Pa. 386, 28 Atl. 802. The court said: "Interest as interest has no place in the computation of damages. The question for a jury in every case is what sum will make a just compensation to the landowner for the entry and appropriation by the corporation. The land occupied may have been wholly unproductive, and without value except for speculative purposes; it may have been highly productive and valuable; it may have been built upon, and its net income capable of easy ascertainment; the entry may have increased the value of the remainder of the tract more than enough to compensate for what was taken. All these considerations are for the jury, and will help them in the effort to determine what just compensation in any given case requires."

In making up the damages, the jury could include interest in their estimation from the time the damages should have been paid. Getz v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 105 Pa. 547.

In an action for injuries to mill property by reason of an appropriation of water, it was held error to instruct the jury to allow interest as interest, but the jury could consider the lapse of time. Mengell v. Mohnsville Water Co. 224 Pa. 120, 73 Atl. 201. The court said: "It is wholly within the province of the jury to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to any additional sum for the delay, and, if so, what amount will compensate him for the delay. They may allow a sum not exceeding 6 per cent, but they can allow a smaller amount, just as they think the circumstances require, in order to make the plaintiff whole. It is therefore purely a question for the jury to determine whether any or what sum shall be added to the amount of damages ascertained to be due as of the date of the appropriation of plaintiff's property."

Where the owner appealed, and withdrew his appeal, and asked to have the judgment entered nunc pro tunc, with interest from a prior date, it was held that he was not entitled to such interest, as he had put it out of the power of the railroad to pay his claim by his appeal. Ross v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 14 W. N. C. 143; Donaldson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 15 W. N. C. 312.

Under Pa. act 1855, April 21, authorizing the laying out of streets, and providing that no proceedings to assess damages shall lapse by delay of a year in paying damages, and authorizing a suit to be brought for the sum assessed at the expiration of the year, it was held that the first assessment fixed the extent of the liability, and the time when the owner had a right to his money, and delay beyond that time entitled him to interest from the date of the assessment. Philadelphia v. Dyer, 41 Pa. 463.

In Norris v. Philadelphia, 70 Pa. 333, the court said: "Whatever has or may be said of Philadelphia v. Dyer, supra, the fact is shown by a simple calculation of interest on the award, that interest was only allowed in the final judgment, from the confirmation of the award. Any person can satisfy himself of this by making the calculation from the papers on file. The result of the case was this and no more. It required an act of assembly to authorize an allowance of interest on a verdict before judgment. Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. 340. Why should it not be so in case of an award like the one in question, before confirmation, which is equal to a verdict at least?"

Pa. act April 21, 1869, providing that no interest will be allowed on damages for ground taken up to the time of their payment or the issue of any warrant for their payment, was held invalid as retroactive in applying to proceedings commenced under prior statutes. Miskey v. Philadelphia, 68 Pa. 49.

Under Pa. act March 26, 1867, providing that owners of ground taken shall be paid according to the value to be ascertained, it was held that interest was to be allowed from the date of the assessment; and it was further held that the Pa. act of April 21, 1869, declaring the intent of the act of 1867 and 1868 to be, that no interest shall be allowed on damages for ground taken up to the time of their payment, or the issue of any warrant for their payment, was destitute of retroactive force because it was an act of judicial power, and in contravention of the Constitution. Haley v. Philadelphia, 68 Pa. 45, 8 Am. Rep. 153.

In Miskey v. Philadelphia, Haley v. Phila- delphia was distinguished, as there was a difference in the statute.

Under Pa. act March 19, 1860, providing that the damages awarded landholders for the opening of streets shall be paid within six months after approval, it was held that, under general principles, interest was to be calculated only from the time the demand was payable; and it is to be presumed that the viewers took this delay into consideration, and if the owner continued undisturbed in the full receipt of the rents and profits, he should not receive full interest. Re Second Street, 66 Pa. 132.

In Stewart v. County, 2 Pa. St. 340, where land was entered upon to open a street, it was held that the damages did not bear interest until occupation. The court said: "The report had relation to the time when the street should be opened, for, till then, the plaintiff, having the use of his ground, could receive no injury. The proceedings would be vacated by lapse of time, at the end of a year, if the public did not exercise its right; and it is true that, in the meantime, he might be prevented, by the uncertainty of the event, from making improvements; but that is an inconvenience which the legislature did not mean to compensate."

In Philadelphia v. Dyer, Stewart v. County was distinguished, as in that case the statute was different, and no right to sue for damages from a street opening was given by statute.

c. New York cases.

Proceedings for condemnation are now required to be made under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3357-3384, except in condemning for streets or public places, provided for by special acts. The Code does not make specific provisions for interest. The cases in this state, where the question of interest arose, were generally under special differing statutes. It seems that in New York city interest was held due from date of vesting of title. In some cases interest is held to be due from the confirmation of the report.

Under New York Code of Civ. Proc. §§ 3371-3373, providing that if the report is confirmed, the court shall enter a final order, directing compensation to be made to the owner, and that, on payment thereof, plaintiff shall be entitled to possession, and that on entry of the final order the same shall be docketed with the force and effect of a money judgment, it was held that the entry of the final order fixed the date from which interest should be computed. New York & B. Bridge v. Third M. E. Church, 45 N. Y. S. R. 615, 18 N. Y. Supp. 257.

In Re Mott Haven Canal Docks, 196 N. Y. 175, 89 N. E. 474, where a case had been sent back to the commissioners to make an award to unknown owners, it was held that interest on the value of land was to be calculated to the date of the second report, and 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such interest, with the value of the land, should then become a new principal, carrying interest until paid. This was under Greater New York charter, § 990, requiring the commissioners to allow interest from the time of vesting of title to the date of their report, and § 1001, providing for the payment of the damages with interest from the date of report, interest to cease six months after confirmation unless demand is made within that time. This involves compound interest from the date of the report.

New York city charter, Laws 1897, chap. 378, § 990, authorizes an allowance of interest on the value, from the date of vesting of title to the date of report. Re East 158th Street, 39 Misc. 598, 80 N. Y. Supp. 594. It was said: "That compensation the legislature has determined shall be the value at the time of taking, plus interest thereon to the date of the commissioners' report."

Under Greater New York charter, § 1001, it was held that one claiming an award to an unknown owner could recover only six months' interest after the date of the confirmation of the report, when the claim was made more than six months after the award. Re New York, 91 App. Div. 532, 86 N. Y. Supp. 1035.

A provision in an order confirming a report of commissioners, allowing interest from date of confirmation, was held proper in United States v. Engeman, 27 Abb. N. C. 141. This proceeding was under 26 Stat. at L. 316, providing that the proceeding is to be in accordance with the laws of the state.

Commissioners were appointed to acquire land in New York city, March 31, 1897, under N. Y. consolidation act. Laws 1882, chap. 410, § 992, amended by Laws 1893, chap. 660, and Laws 1895, chap. 449. It was held that Greater New York charter, taking effect January 1, 1898, and providing that, unless a demand for payment of an award was made within six months from date of confirmation, interest ceased, did not apply, as the proceeding was instituted and title vested while the consolidation act was in force, and interest was allowed on the award up to the date of payment. Re Cromwell Ave. 96 App. Div. 424, 89 N. Y. Supp. 180.

Under Buffalo charter, Laws 1870, § 519, providing that an award of condemnation shall be paid within one year after confirmation, it was held, in an action by the county against the city, to recover the amount of an award, that interest should be allowed from one year subsequent to the confirmation, as provided in the statute. Erie County v. Buffalo, 63 Hun, 505, 18 N. Y. Supp. 635, affirmed in 138 N. Y. 629, 33 N. E. 1083.

Under N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 410, and amendments, providing for street openings in New York city, it was held that the land was taken by the city when the title vested, and the right to compensation was vested at the moment of the taking, and interest from that moment began to run upon any award, as compensation therefor, as of that

Under N. Y. Laws 1897, chap. 665, authorizing commissioners to condemn lands, and providing that the value shall be paid with interest from the day when the title vests, it was held that interest on interest could not be allowed. Re Dorsett, 179 N. Y. 496, 72 N. E. 522. The court said: "The interest still ran upon the sum fixed as the value of the land, but it did not run upon the sum which the commissioners reported as the interest on that value down to the date of their report. As already observed, they were not required to report the interest, since that was determined not by anything contained in their report, but by the terms of the statute, which declared that the sum awarded as the value of the land, together with interest from the date when the title vested in the city, became due and payable by the city immediately upon the confirmation of the commissioners' report."

Under N. Y. consolidation act, Laws 1882, chap. 410, amended by Laws 1893, chap. 660, providing that the city must pay interest from the date when the title to land shall have vested, the city was held liable for interest. Re Board of Street Opening, 35 App. Div. 406, 54 N. Y. Supp. 911.

And under N. Y. consolidation act, Laws 1882, chap. 410, as amended by Laws 1893, chap. 660, providing that the damages awarded and interest from the date when the title should vest in the city should be paid by the city, it was held that interest began to run from the time when the report was confirmed. Re Board of Street Opening, 21 App. Div. 357, 47 N. Y. Supp. 564. The court said: "The very fact that the statute expressly provides that, as to the premises situated in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth wards, the damages shall be due and payable at the date of the confirmation of the report, and that it makes no such provision with regard to damages for lands taken elsewhere in the city, shows the intention of the legislature that a different rule should be applied to the payment of these damages than is applied in the case of premises situated elsewhere."

In proceedings by the city of New York to acquire land for a public park, it was held that when an award was made it related back to the time the property vested in the city, and under a contract entitling plaintiff to one half the award, it was held that he was entitled to interest from that time to the time of payment. Re Board of Street Opening, 128 App. Div. 432, 112 N. Y. Supp. 845.

Under N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 56, providing for appraisement of lands in New York city for a park way, and that from the date when the commissioners decided what lands should be acquired, such lands shall be a public park way for public use, it was held that the owners were entitled to the actual cash value of their lands upon that date. And upon that obligation the right of interest rested. Re New York, 40 App. Div. 281, 58 N. Y. Supp. 58.

And under N. Y. Laws 1888, chap. 191, providing for school sites in New York city and for payment with interest within four months from confirmation, it was held that interest on the award was part of the compensation, and could be recovered in an action where the owner had accepted the award under protest. Devlin v. New York, 131 N. Y. 123, 30 N. E. 45, reversing 60 Hun, 68, 14 N. Y. Supp. 251.

But under Greater New York charter, § 1001, interest cannot be collected in a separate action after acceptance of the award, although interest was demanded at the time the award was paid. Cutter v. New York, 92 N. Y. 160, affirming 14 N. Y. Week. Dig. 296.

In an action of money had and received, in Boyce v. Wight, 2 Abb. N. C. 163, interest was allowed under N. Y. act 1813, chap. 86, relating to awards for compensation for lands taken for local improvements, and authorizing the owner to sue for and collect the same, with interest.

Where there was a delay of four years in making a report, and the property had increased in value, it was held that the commissioners properly awarded the value at the time of appropriation, with interest to the time the award was payable. This was under N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 56, providing for a just and equitable estimate of the damages to parties affected in taking for public parks. Re New York, supra.

In condemnation of springs for a water supply, where payment of damages given for injuring water power was delayed for six years, it was held that interest should be given. Port Henry v. Kidder, 39 App. Div. 640, 57 N. Y. Supp. 102.

In some cases interest was held not to run until after demand.

So, demand was held necessary to start interest, under N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 56, § 4, requiring the city to pay the award within four months from confirmation of the report. Deering v. New York, 51 App. Div. 402, 64 N. Y. Supp. 606; Carpenter v. New York, 44 App. Div. 230, 60 N. Y. Supp. 633.

Also under Greater New York charter, § 1001, providing that interest shall cease to run six months after confirmation of report, unless demand be made within that time. Barnes v. New York, 27 Hun, 236.

A demand made prematurely was held not to start interest under N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 746, § 4, providing that an award in taking for a park shall be paid in four months after confirmation, and if not paid on demand, interest shall run. Fredericks v. New York, 44 App. Div. 274, 60 N. Y. Supp. 724, affirmed in 165 N. Y. 656, 59 N. E. 1122.

And under N. Y. Laws 1888, chap. 191, in regard to condemnations in New York city, providing that, on confirmation, the mayor of the city shall be seised in fee, and shall take possession, and on confirmation the comptroller shall pay; and, in default within four months after date of such confirmation, the parties may sue for and recover the same, with interest from and after the demand thereof, it was held that a demand was necessary, and after a demand, interest was due. Irwin v. New York, 31 N. Y. S. R. 104, 9 N. Y. Supp. 264.

And under N. Y. Laws 1874, chap. 746, authorizing the taking of land for the purpose of a park, and § 4, providing that the amount should be paid within four months, and in default the owner may sue for and recover the same, with interest after demand, it was held that after refusal to pay on demand, after the four months, interest would be allowed from the date of the demand; but where the demand was made on Saturday, and the four months expired on Sunday, it was held that the demand was premature and interest would not be allowed. Fredericks v. New York, supra.

Under Greater New York charter, § 990, providing for opening streets, and that in such cases interest at the legal rate upon the date of vesting of title, from said date to date of report of the commissioners, shall be allowed, it was held that if the claimant was entitled to interest, he should have made such claim to the commissioners, and if they did not allow it, he should have opposed the confirmation of the report; and his only remedy was to appeal or move to vacate and set aside the report. It was held that the statute was the only authority by which interest could be allowed, and the court had no power, in case interest was not awarded by the commissioners, to allow it. Re Belmont Street, 128 App. Div. 636, 112 N. Y. Supp. 858.

In condemnation for a canal, it was held that the state was liable for interest after a demand made by the party entitled. People ex rel. Bank of Monroe v. Canal Comrs. 5 Denio, 401. The court said: "Hence, if the question of the liability of the state to the payment of a claim for damages come properly before a judicial tribunal, whether so brought up by the public officer or the other party, the tribunal, in adjudicating upon the question, will, if it determines the claim against the state to be just, in addition to directing its payment, also direct the payment of interest thereon, where it would in other cases direct such interest to be paid. In the case of Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, 26 Wend. 404, the proceedings to award canal damages were brought before the court by the state officers by certiorari, and the court, on affirming the proceedings and deciding that the state was liable to pay the award (as appears by the report and also by the rule entered on that occasion, which we have examined), directed the payment of interest thereon."

In an action by a mortgagee to recover the proceeds of an award made for condemnation of the mortgagor's land, it was held that interest could not be claimed before a demand made for the money, under N. Y. Laws 1874, chap. 604, providing that an award is payable on the confirmation of the report. Barnes v. New York, 27 Hun, 236. The court said: But the statute "did not provide that interest should be payable on it from that time."

Under N. Y. act, 1869, providing for condemnation in New York city, fixing the time when the widening of a street should take place, it was held that the time of payment of an award should run from the confirmation of the report; and under N. Y. act 1813, providing for payment of interest on an award after demand, it was held that interest did not run until after demand. Phillips v. Cudlipp, 50 How. Pr. 363. In this case the court held: That in Hamersley v. New York, 67 Barb. 35, the act of 1813 was so far altered as to suspend the right to sue for nineteen months after confirmation, unless the corporation took possession by the act of 1818, authorizing a corporation to suspend the opening, not exceeding fifteen months. This did not apply to the proceedings under the act of 1869, but the previous acts are made applicable.

And mortgagees were held entitled to interest on their mortgages to the date when the award was payable, and if unpaid after demand, to subsequent interest. Carpenter v. New York, 51 App. Div. 584, 64 N. Y. Supp. 839.

And under N. Y. 2 Rev. Stat. 1552, 7th ed., providing that when a new appraisal in condemnation for a railroad has been made, and the second is less than the first, the difference shall be refunded, it was held that the party repaying the same was not required to pay interest, until he was in default after a copy of the final order of confirmation had been served on him. Re New York Elev. R. Co. 44 Hun, 117.

Greater New York charter, § 990, relating to interest on awards, was held to apply to original proceedings after Jan. 1, 1898, and would not apply to proceedings instituted under the consolidation act. Re Whitlock Ave. 51 App. Div. 436, 64 N. Y. Supp. 717; Re East 175th Street, 49 App. Div. 114, 63 N. Y. Supp. 468, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 601, 57 N. E. 1117.

Under N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 410, consolidation act, chap. 978, authorizing the city to acquire title to land for the opening of a street, where the award was made to compensate for damages by reason of an injury to a building, it was held that the relator was not entitled to interest, as the city did not acquire title to any of its land. People ex rel. New York City Church v. Coler, 60 App. Div. 77, 69 N. Y. Supp. 863, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 644, 61 N. E. 1133.

Where a statute appropriated certain land for parks, it was held that the owners were not entitled to interest. Re Public Parks, 53 Hun, 280, 6 N. Y. Supp. 750. In this case the commissioners reported especially that they took into consideration the fact of delay in realizing upon the award which was to be made by them, and made their estimate accordingly.

On an appeal for a new taxation of costs, it was said: "The second question raised upon this motion is whether the clerk was right in inserting in the bills of costs interest on the amounts awarded to the claimants by the order of June 18, 1907. I do not see any justification for this allowance of interest. The rights of the parties under that order were fixed by the order, and, if they are entitled to interest, it is by virtue of that order. One of the counsel cites in his brief the provision in § 500 of the charter of New York (Laws 1901, chap. 466, p. 224), which he claims shows that the respective amounts ordered to be paid to the owners by way of costs draw legal interest. If this be so, the interest may be collected in the same way as the principal sum. This interest is certainly not a part of the costs of the court of appeals or of the appellate division. There is no provision in the Code which justifies such allowance." Re Pine's Stream, 129 App. Div. 929, 114 N. Y. Supp. 681.

d. Possession by owner.

Possession of the land by the owner will prevent interest from running during that time.

In condemnation for a park by the United States in the District of Columbia, it was held that the owner of the land was not entitled to interest from the initiation of the proceedings to the time of payment of the money into court. Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282, 37 L. ed. 170, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 381. In this case the owner was in receipt of the rent and profits during the time occupied in fixing the amount to which he was entitled, and the inconveniences were presumed to be considered and allowed for in fixing the amount of compensation.

In United States v. Sargent, 89 C. C. A. 81, 162 Fed. 81, the dissenting opinion said that the allowance of interest was in conflict with Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 284, 37 L. ed. 177, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 381.

Where the owner of land taken in condemnation had the right to use the same until the damages were paid, it was held that he was not entitled to interest from the commencement of the suit to the trial. South Park v. Dunlevy, 91 Ill. 49.

And, where a town had condemned a right of way of a sewer and water system, and the same was again condemned by the United States, it was held that as it was admitted that, at the time of the trial, there had been no actual interruption of the town's possession, and that the town had continued in its enjoyment of the right as fully as if the government proceedings had not been instituted, interest should not be recovered. United States v. Nahant, 82 C. C. A. 470, 153 Fed. 520.

And, where the property had not been injured or taken, it was held that the judgment would not bear interest. Chicago v. Barbican, 80 Ill. 482. The court said: "That such a judgment bears interest was first announced in Cook v. South Park, 61 Ill. 115, where it was assumed possession had been taken of the property prior to the judgment of condemnation, and subsequently held; and it was allowed not because the order of court possessed all the elements of an absolute judgment, but because it was within 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the spirit of the statute allowing interest on judgments. And in the subsequent case of Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. McClintock, 68 Ill. 296, where interest was also allowed upon a like judgment, the fact was made to distinctly appear that possession had been taken and retained of the condemned property.

In an action to enjoin a city that had taken possession of land condemned without paying interest on the award from the date it began, it was held that plaintiff should do equity by accounting for rents and profits received from the possession of the land since that date. Plum v. Kansas City, 101 Mo. 525, 10 L.R.A. 371, 14 S. W. 657. The court said: "The theory on which plaintiff's case proceeds is that the final judgment of condemnation was the 'taking' of plaintiff's beneficial title. Assuming that theory correct, it would be inequitable to permit him to recover interest on that judgment and retain the benefits of the possession held by him meanwhile (in contemplation of equity, at least), as trustee for the city."

Where the instructions directed the jury to add interest to the damages, but did not require plaintiffs to account for rents after the date of taking possession, it was held that it was too late to raise this question on appeal. Ragan v. Kansas City & S. E. R. Co. 144 Mo. 623, 46 S. W. 602.

In Re Riverside Park, 59 App. Div. 603, 69 N. Y. Supp. 742, affirmed in 167 N. Y. 627, 60 N. E. 1116, the owners were held entitled to interest from the date of appropriation until the confirmation of the report, to be offset by rents or value of use during that time, under N. Y. Laws 1894, chap. 152, providing for acquiring title to certain property.

In Donnelly v. Brooklyn, 121 N. Y. 9, 24 N. E. 17, an owner in possession was held not entitled to interest on a street widening improvement. The city was held liable only from the time of demand for payment. The city charter did not provide the time of payment, but seemed to extend it so long as the right to make assessments continued.

N. Y. act 1818, chap. 206, authorizing the suspension of the opening of a street, not exceeding fifteen months, was held to change Laws 1813, chap. 86, requiring payment to be made within four months after confirmation, but the act of 1818 gave the owner the rents and profits for the fifteen months. The award in this case was paid within four months after the lapse of fifteen months, and the owner was held not entitled to interest. Hamersley v. New York, 56 N. Y. 533, affirming 67 Barb. 35.

In Eric County v. Buffalo, 63 Hun, 565, 18 N. Y. Supp. 635, Hamersley v. New York, 56 N. Y. 533, was distinguished because of difference in possession.

Under N. Y. act 1818, chap. 206, altering N. Y. act April 9, 1813, substituting the right of possession during fifteen months for interest on the award, it was held that, in such a case, interest should not be allowed. Re Public Parks, 53 Hun, 280, 6 N. Y. Supp. 750, following Detmold v. Drake, 46 N. Y. 320.

In Re New York City, 40 App. Div. 281, 58 N. Y. Supp. 58, Re Public Parks was distinguished, on the ground of use.

On reversing an order refusing to affirm an award, it was held that interest should not be added from the date of refusal to affirm, as payment could not be made until final confirmation. Re New York & B. Bridge, 137 N. Y. 95, 32 N. E. 1054. This was on the ground that there was no statute as to interest, and the special or general term could not alter the award, and that under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 3371, providing for change of possession on payment, the owner would be enjoying the fruits.

And where land was taken for a road, it was held that the owner was not entitled to interest during the time that he was in possession, and it was held that it was doubtful if interest could be given where it was not claimed in the pleadings or submitted to the jury. Morris v. Coleman County (Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 29.

And under Utah Rev. Stat. § 3001, providing that, in eminent domain, the plaintiff must, within thirty days after final judgment, pay the sum of money assessed, it was held that interest could not be recovered where there was no entry or occupation of property and the amount of liability was not ascertained prior to the verdict, and there was no time when possession could have been taken. Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Jones, 29 Utah, 147, 80 Pac. 732.

And in State ex rel. Donofrio v. Humes, 34 Wash. 347, 75 Pac. 348, the owner of land taken was held not entitled to interest, where he had retained possession, and had not accounted for the rents and profits.

e. Tender or deposit of money.

The deposit in court of an amount sufficient to cover the damages will stop interest, where the landowner appeals and the amount of damages is not increased. But an increase of damages on appeal, or a deposit that could not be drawn by the landowner, will entitle to interest. If the clerk loans out the deposit, it seems that the landowner will be entitled to the interest earned.

Where the railroad paid the money into court, it was held that the landowner was entitled to interest received by the clerk from the deposit. Snyder v. Cowan, 120 Mo. 389, 25 S. W. 382. The court said: "Defendant was under no obligation to place the funds deposited with him as clerk of the court upon interest. 'Had he locked them up in his chest, or merely deposited them in the bank for safe keeping, and received no compensation for the use of them, he would not have been accountable for interest. But having placed them where they drew interest, that interest must be consid-

So, the owner was only entitled to such interest as the deposit had earned. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Clark, 121 Mo. 169, 28 L.R.A. 751, 25 S. W. 192, 906. The court said: "It has been held in the appeal of defendant in this case that he was entitled to have the damages awarded by the commissioners paid to him, or into the court for him, before plaintiff had a right to the possession of the property. Defendant was not, therefore, entitled to interest on the damages found by the jury. The money was paid to the clerk for him, which was a sufficient compliance with the law. It was subject to the order of the court (St. Louis, O. H. & C. R. Co. v. Fowler, 113 Mo. 458, 20 S. W. 1069; St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Clark, 119 Mo. 357, 24 S. W. 157), and should have been paid to the defendants when demanded by them."

Under N. H. act Dec. 25, 1844, requiring that railroads, before taking a lease from the state, should pay into the treasury a sum equal to the amount assessed for the land, and that a railroad cannot enter until the damages assessed have been tendered, and act of July 3, 1845, providing that, in case of appeal, the railroad may enter upon land by giving security, it was held that a railroad could not be charged with interest on the money which it had paid into the treasury to satisfy the damages awarded; but where the railroad elected to give security, the landowner who appealed could not take damages awarded until the determination, and he ought to have interest on the same which had been detained from him on giving security. Shattuck v. Wilton R. Co. 23 N. H. 269.

In Re Water Comrs. 132 App. Div. 75, 116 N. Y. Supp. 495, Shattuck v. Wilton R. Co. was distinguished because the landowner was deprived of the use of the money.

In Burlington & M. R. Co. v. White, 28 Neb. 166, 44 N. W. 95, and Sioux City R. Co. v. Brown, 13 Neb. 317, 14 N. W. 407, Concord R. Co. v. Greely, 23 N. H. 237, and Shattuck v. Wilton R. Co. supra, were distinguished, the court saying: "By the statute under which these two cases were decided, in case of appeal from an award of damages for right of way, the railroad company had the option either to deposit the money awarded for the use of the landowner, or to give security for the costs and damages that might be adjudged on the appeal; and, if a deposit were made, the landowner had the privilege of taking it without prejudice to his appeal. . . . In principle, those decisions seem rather to uphold the view taken by the court below, inasmuch as, by our statute, it is provided that the deposit, in case of an appeal, 'shall remain in the hands of the probate judge until a final decision be had,' so that it is legally impossible for the owner, although deprived of his land and all benefit of a possible rise in its value during the delay, to have the use of the money until the proceedings under the appeal are terminated."

Interest was held proper from the date of filing the award, where the railroad company appealed, and instructed the clerk not to pay the owner the amount deposited, although the possession was not taken. Seefeld v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 67 Wis. 96, 29 N. W. 904; Uniacke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 67 Wis. 108, 29 N. W. 899.

In an action to recover the amount of two awards where a deposit had been made, but an appeal was required to correct the order of deposit, so that plaintiff could draw the money, it was held that he could recover interest from the date of confirmation. Eno v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 24 Jones & S. 95, 1 N. Y. Supp. 521.

And where a new assessment was awarded on appeal, it was held that, in making the assessment, the jury could allow interest from the time the possession of the property was taken, although the money had been deposited in court under the first assessment. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. v. Koblenz, 21 Ohio St. 334. The court said: "It is not just that the loss should be cast upon the owner. The law by which the loss is occasioned is no act of his, but an act of the public, and he has no power to repeal or modify it, so as to avoid the loss. He is compelled to be passive, and can only insist, as he does in this case, that compensation for his property taken by the public shall either be paid at the time it is taken, or paid with interest, or with a fair allowance for the use of the property during the time it is withheld."

But where a landowner appealed, and the amount was reduced, it was held that he was not entitled to interest on the money deposited pending the appeal. Reisner v. Atchison Union Depot & R. Co. 27 Kan. 382.

Where the owner appealed and the amount was not increased, it was held that interest could not be recovered, where the amount of damages had been tendered. March v. Portsmouth & C. R. Co. 19 N. H. 372.

Under N. Y. Code of Civ. Proc. 3375, providing in eminent domain that proceedings shall not be stayed on appeal, but by order of the court, and the appeal shall not affect the possession of property taken, it was held that where the petitioner deposited the award with the county treasurer, and the award was confirmed on appeal, that the owner was not entitled to interest. Re Water Comrs. supra.

Under Mo. Constitution, art. 2, § 21, providing that until the compensation shall be paid to the owner, or into court for the owner, the property shall not be disturbed, it was held that if the condemning company was not satisfied to pay into court for the immediate use of the owner, and not simply by way of a mere deposit as a security, it should defer taking possession until the final adjudication; and that, as the landowner could withdraw the money paid to the clerk for him, the company should not thereafter be required to pay interest on the amount paid into court, but it should pay interest on the excess, if any, found by the jury. St. Louis, O. H. & C. R. Co. v. Fowler, supra. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Approved in Re Water Comrs. supra, and Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 130 Mo. 270, 32 S. W. 658.

Where money has been paid into court, the owner is not entitled to interest pending the determination of exceptions filed to the commissioner's report. Chicago, S. C. & C. R. Co. v. Eubanks, supra. The court said: "By § 21 of article 2 of the Constitution, as well as by § 2736, Revised Statutes 1889, the landowner's property shall not be disturbed or his proprietary right therein devested, until the award of the commissioners shall be paid to the landowner, or into court for him; and as the money is paid in for him, subject at all times to his disposition, the railroad company cannot be required to pay interest on defendant's money, by his carelessness or obstinacy left idle and unproductive."

Where a city paid into court the amount of condemnation, and filed an interpleader on account of doubt as to who was the proper party to receive the money, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, p. 1607, authorizing the payment into court, and it was not shown what was the nature of the property, nor that the city had ever taken possession, it was held that interest did not run while the party claiming the property remained in undisturbed possession, especially where the substituted party was guilty of laches in the prosecution of the suit. Tilton v. St. Louis, 99 Mo. 190, 12 S. W. 657.

In a bill filed by one railroad to enjoin another road from obstructing the construction of a crossing, where a tender of the amount was made, it was held to stop interest. National Docks & N. J. Junction Connecting Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 54 N. J. Eq. 142, 33 Atl. 936.

Where two claimants asserted a right to a fund, and litigated the same, it was held that the corporation was excused from paying interest. Gillespie v. New York, 3 Edw. Ch. 512.

f. Other cases.

In an action against a city for damages assessed to open a street, it was held under Illinois interest law, giving interest on money withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment, that a delay for more than two years was unreasonable, under city charter, chap. 8, § 4, giving a lien for two years after confirmation and report, and the injured party was entitled to receive interest at the expiration of that time. Chicago v. Wheeler, 25 Ill. 478.

On certiorari against the county commissioners who failed to provide for the payment of damages sustained by the proprietor of a bridge in laying out a highway, it was held that the court might charge the county with payment of interest on the sum apportioned to the city from the time of said demand. Haverhill Bridge v. Essex County, 103 Mass. 120, 4 Am. Rep. 518. The court said: "Upon the correction of the error and the entry of the proper judgment, it became necessary to provide for the payment by the county not only of so much of the damages as remained in arrear, but also of the interest which had accumulated in the meantime. The delay was owing to no fault on the part of the bridge proprietors, and if interest should not be allowed them, they would not receive the full indemnity intended in the original award."

On an appeal from an award of damages for right of way, where the appeal was not prosecuted with diligence, and the award was affirmed, it was held that the appellant could not dismiss its appeal without payment of interest. Berggren v. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. 23 Neb. 620, 37 N. W. 470.

Where the railroad company appealed, it was held that interest should be allowed. Metler v. Easton & A. R. Co. 37 N. J. L. 222. The court said: "If the owner is the sole appellant, and the verdict of the jury should not be in excess of the appraisement of the commissioners, interest should be disallowed. In that event, the postponement of the receipt of the compensation adjudged by the commissioners and decided by the jury to have been adequate would be due to his own act. To allow him indemnity for such delay in the form of interest would be unreasonable and unjust. But in this case the company was also an appellant."

Where it was apparent from the verdict that the jury did not include interest, and the party was entitled to interest in addition to the amount stated in the verdict, and the interest could be computed from uncontroverted facts, it was held that the court could compute the interest and add such sum to the verdict. St. Louis, E. R. & W. R. Co. v. Oliver, 17 Okla. 589, 87 Pac. 423, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 748.

Where the jury were authorized to give interest, and the record did not show whether they did or did not, it will be presumed that they exercised their discretion, and the court could affirm the verdict. Blackwell, E. & S. W. R. Co. v. Bebout, 19 Okla. 63, 91 Pac. 877, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1145.

Where damages were awarded for a highway, it was held the owner was entitled to recover interest, although the road was discontinued, and interest was recoverable from the time of demand. Clough v. Unity, 18 N. H. 75.

In West v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 56 Wis. 318, 14 N. W. 292, a direction to the jury not to allow interest on the verdict was held error; but the defendant could cure this by a stipulation to allow interest. If the plaintiff had continued in possession, such instruction might have been proper.

On appeal, where the amount was decreased, it was held that the railway company was entitled to interest on the amount which the owner was required to refund. Watson v. Milwaukee & M. R. Co. 57 Wis. 332, 15 N. W. 481. The court said that "interest is always allowed the owner upon the sum so fixed, from the date of the taking to the rendition of the verdict;" and this rule should be reciprocal.

Where a city did not pay the money into court, but claimed readiness to pay to the party entitled thereto, it was held that it should pay interest. Kluender v. Milwaukee, 57 Wis. 636, 15 N. W. 769.

But where there was a reassessment, and the amount was paid under a stipulation, it was held that thereafter there remained no principal to draw interest. Bishop v. New Haven, 82 Conn. 51, 72 Atl. 646.

And where the owners of improved land agreed together to lay out an improved street, and agreed that the payment of damages should be delayed until the balance between the damages and betterments was ascertained, it was held that no claim could be made until the time had come for setting off the betterments against the damages, and that interest should not be allowed before that time. Burrage v. Boston, 198 Mass. 580, 84 N. E. 1017. The court said: "Interest is never allowed upon the value of land so taken on the ground that it is included in a contract, or is a stipulated part of a debt, but only as damages for the failure to pay the money when it ought to be paid."

There is no provision in the California Code requiring the payment of interest to be allowed from the date of verdict. San Francisco & S. J. Valley R. Co. v. Leviston, 134 Cal. 412, 66 Pac. 473. Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1251-3 provides for the payment of the sum "assessed" within thirty days after final judgment.

Interest is not allowed under the Colorado statute. Greeley, S. L. & P. R. Co. v. Yount, 7 Colo. App. 189, 42 Pac. 1023.

Where an application was made for mandamus to require a township board to draw their order for the sum appraised to applicant in laying out a highway, "with interest," it was held that the writ should be denied, as no interest could be legally claimed, but by virtue of a statute or custom; and this was not embraced in the Michigan Revised Statute. People ex rel. Anderson v. Le Grange, 2 Mich. 187. But see Taylor v. Bay City Street R. Co. 101 Mich. 140, 59 N. W. 447, subd. XII. a, supra.

Where the owner of land conveyed a part to a railroad for its track, it was held that a mortgagee of the whole land was not entitled to interest on the award subsequently made, as the amount due the mortgagee could not be ascertained until a sale was made of the residue of the mortgaged premises. North Hudson R. Co. v. Booraem, 28 N. J. Eq. 593.

In a suit for compensation for land taken for a highway, it was held that interest would not be allowed, where it was not claimed in the petition. Cunningham v. San Saba County, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 557, 32 S. W. 923, 33 S. W. 892.

Under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3287, providing for interest for every person who is entitled to recover damages capable of being made certain by calculation, it was held that this did not apply to damages against the county for laying out public roads, and interest was not allowed. Hopkins v. Contra Costa County, 106 Cal. 566, 39 Pac. 933.

XIII. Highway, — change of grade.

Some cases allow interest from date of injury, other cases allow interest from the date of report. In some cases interest was allowed on account of delay.

In an action for damages for injury to property, caused by changing the grade of a street, it was held that interest was properly allowed from the time the injury was done, down to the trial. Hampton v. Kansas City, 74 Mo. App. 129. The court said: "There is a class of cases which allow interest when the land has been taken from the owner, and assign as a reason that the party taking the land has had the use of it. But that reason is not the only one which would suggest the allowance of interest. The injury to the other party must be compensated. The injury to the property is based on an estimate at time of injury. If he is deprived of the sum thus estimated, he is deprived of complete compensation unless he receives interest."

And in an action for damages for changing the grade of a street, where there was long neglect to compensate, it was held that the damages were properly measured by the condition of the property immediately after the change of grade, and compensation should be made by interest also. Cincinnati v. Whetstone, 47 Ohio St. 196, 24 N. E. 409.

In Kimball v. Salt Lake City, 32 Utah, 253, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 483, 125 Am. St. Rep. 859, 90 Pac. 395, it was held that interest should be allowed from the time of completion of the work. Utah Rev. Stat. 1898, § 282, provided that cities shall be liable for consequential damages to property in case the established grade is changed. The court said: "We have had occasion to pass upon the subject of when interest is to be allowed on claims for unliquidated damages at this term in the case of FELL v. UNION P. R. Co., and this case clearly falls within the principles announced in that case."

On an appeal from an assessment of benefits and damages resulting from a change of grade in a highway, it was held that the landowner could not recover interest from any date prior to that of filing the committee's report, as they should take into consideration the allowance in the nature of interest from the period when the damages were liquidated to the time of judgment. New Haven Steam Saw Mill Co. v. New Haven, 72 Conn. 276, 44 Atl. 229, 609.

Where a plaintiff failed in his suit for damages for raising the grade of the street, and then brought another action, it was held that the jury could consider the lapse of time caused by the failure of the first suit, in assessment of damages. Peabody v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 187 Mass. 489, 73 N. E. 649. The court said: "The principal sum to be ascertained would be the damages directly resulting from the acts of the defendant, assessed as of the time of the completion of the act, or series of acts, which caused the injury; and if the jury found that this method of assessment would not give the plaintiff full compensation be- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cause of the delay to which he had been subjected, they might allow such additional sum, computed as interest at the legal or any reasonable rate, they found proper and necessary for this purpose, and these sums combined would make the amount of damages assessed by them."

In an action for damages caused by change of grade of a street abutting on plaintiff's ball ground, it was held that damages in lieu of interest for detention of payment should not be allowed, where the owner caused delay by an unreasonable demand. Philadelphia Ball Club v. Philadelphia, 192 Pa. 632, 46 L.R.A. 724, 73 Am. St. Rep. 835, 44 Atl. 265.

In an action by a property owner for damages for change of grade, it was held that interest, as such, could not be allowed by the jury upon the amount of the damages. Leavenworth v. Duffy, 10 Kan. App. 124, 62 Pac. 433.

The rule that a demand which was in its nature uncertain and unliquidated did not draw interest until the amount was fixed by a court or jury was held to apply to damages from a change of grade. Tyson v. Milwaukee, 50 Wis. 78, 5 N. W. 914.

XIV. Negligence.a. Damages from fire.

The weight of authority holds that interest should be allowed in actions for damages to property caused by fire, and interest "as damages" is allowed in Iowa and Massachusetts. Interest is held to be discretionary with the jury in California, Georgia, Indiana, Michigan, New York, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Tennessee. But interest is denied in Missouri, and is not within the Kansas statute, and is not allowed in New Hampshire where there is a tender.

In the following cases it was held that interest should be allowed:

Injury to property by fire from a locomotive. Regan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 60 Conn. 124, 25 Am. St. Rep. 306, 22 Atl. 503. The court said: "It has been sometimes said that interest is not to be allowed on unliquidated demands. There are actions, such, for instance, as assault and battery or slander, to which the rule is applicable. But where the demand is for property that has a market value susceptible of easy proof, there is no propriety in such a rule. A loss of property having a definite money value is practically the same as the loss of so much money; the loss of the use of the property is practically the same as the loss of the use (or interest) of so much money. We think, therefore, a just indemnity to the plaintiff required the addition to the value of the goods at the time of their destruction, of the interest from that time to the date of judgment."

Destruction of an ice house by fire. Parrott v. Housatonic R. Co. 47 Conn. 575. The court said: "In cases of trover, where property has been taken, the rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the actual value of the property at the time of its conversion by the defendant, with interest on the amount to the day of the judgment. It is only thus that the plaintiff can be made whole. The interest thus allowed is not technically interest, but an addition to the damages of a sum equal to interest. In trespass for taking property, if the case be one where no exemplary damages ought to be assessed, as is the case here, the rule should be the same. If the plaintiff's property is taken or destroyed, the rule as to damages should be the same, whatever the form of action may be."

Destruction of property by fire through negligence of a railroad. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular Land, Transp. & Mfg. Co. 27 Fla. 1, 17 L.R.A. 33, 9 So. 661. In this case it was held that there should be no distinction between the cases of trespass and trover, and damages for negligence and replevin, and that just compensation means the interest on the value of the property destroyed.

Injuring timber by fire from a locomotive. Buridick v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 384, 54 N. W. 439.

Injury to plaintiff's wheat stored in an elevator. Arthur v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 648, 17 N. W. 24. The court said: "But notwithstanding it is unliquidated, we think the court did not err in allowing interest. Indeed, we can see no difference between this case and the case of Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 22, 1 Am. Rep. 212. That was a case where, by reason of the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff's baggage was stolen from the warehouse of the defendant, and it was held that interest on the value of the stolen property was properly allowed."

Hay burned by fire caused by a railroad engine. Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 666, 45 N. W. 512. The court said: "The plaintiff was deprived of his property by the fire. He was entitled at that moment to recover its value. He ought to have the legal interest for the time compensation was withheld from him. When personal property is destroyed, the measure of damages is fixed by this rule. See Field, Damages, p. 619, § 781, and note. Brentner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 530, 23 N. W. 245, 27 N. W. 605, is not in conflict with our conclusion on this branch of the case. The statute under which that action was prosecuted fixed the measure of damages. It was therefore rightly held that these damages could not be increased by adding interest thereto."

Destruction of property through negligence by fire. Lucas v. Wattles, 49 Mich. 380, 13 N. W. 782. The court said: "Interest was certainly not demandable of right, but it was admissible and just to give it."

Destruction of a sawmill by fire, in the operation of a private logging railroad. Kendrick v. Towle, 60 Mich. 363, 1 Am. St. Rep. 526, 27 N. W. 567. The court said 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that unless the addition of interest would increase the damages unduly, so as to be unjust, no objection could be made to the allowance of interest.

Action against a railroad company for destroying property by fire. Union P. R. Co. v. Ray, 46 Neb. 750, 65 N. W. 773. The court said: "Finally, it is contended that the court erred in directing the jury if it found for the plaintiff, to allow interest on the value of the hay from the time of its destruction; but this rule of damages was precisely that stated in Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, 13 Am. St. Rep. 482, 40 N. W. 948, to wit: 'Where property is destroyed by the negligence of another, the owner will be entitled to interest on the value of such property from the time of its destruction.'"

Injury to property from fire from railroad trains. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shepherd (Tex. Civ. App.) 76 S. W. 800; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jagoe (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 717; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cusenberry, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 119, 23 S. W. 851; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Day (Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 772; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Horne, 69 Tex. 643, 9 S. W. 440. The court said: "The rule in such cases is the same as in an action for trespass; namely, the value of the property, with interest from the date it was lost to him."

Cotton stored in a warehouse. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Tankersley, 63 Tex. 57. This was on the ground that, in cases of tort, the owner was entitled to the value of his property in money at the time it was destroyed.

Destruction of property by fire. Chapman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 295, 7 Am. Rep. 81. The value was held to be merely a matter of compensation.

The following cases hold that interest may be allowed, within the discretion of the jury:

Destroying hay by a locomotive fire. Eddy v. Lafayette, 1 C. C. A. 441, 4 U. S. App. 247, 49 Fed. 807. The court said: "We entertain no doubt that interest may be allowed as damages in cases where property has been destroyed through the culpable negligence of another, as well as when it has been wrongfully converted; but the usual, and perhaps the better, practice, is to leave such allowance to the discretion of the jury."

Goods stored in a warehouse. King v. Southern P. Co. 109 Cal. 96, 29 L.R.A. 755, 41 Pac. 786. The court said: "Section 3288 of the Civil Code provides: 'In an action for the breach of an obligation arising from contract, and in every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given, in the discretion of the jury.'"

Action against a railroad for damages by fire. Albany & N. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 6 Ga. App. 270, 64 S. E. 1114.

Action for damages occasioned by fire.

Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Barnes, 2 Ind. App. 213, 28 N. E. 328.

Injuries caused by locomotive fire. Brush v. Long Island R. Co. 10 App. Div. 535, 42 N. Y. Supp. 103, affirmed in 158 N. Y. 742, 53 N. E. 1123; Jamieson v. New York & R. B. R. Co. 11 App. Div. 50, 42 N. Y. Supp. 915, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 630, 57 N. E. 1113; Hinds v. Barton, 25 N. Y. 544; Garratt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 121.

Action by an insurance company subrogated for the insured, against a railroad company, for loss by fire. Home Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 11 Hun, 182.

Destruction of trees by fire, under Dak. Comp. Laws, § 4578, providing that the giving of interest was discretionary with the jury. Bailey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 531, 19 L.R.A. 653, 54 N. W. 506; Uhe v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 3 S. D. 563, 54 N. W. 601, s. c. subsequent appeal 4 S. D. 505, 57 N. W. 484.

So, for injuries to property, caused by fire from a railroad. Johnson v. Northern P. R. Co. 1 N. D. 354, 48 N. W. 227.

Negligently causing fire to damage plaintiff's property. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Fort, 112 Tenn. 432, 80 S. W. 429. This was on the ground that it was allowed as compensation to the injured party.

In the following cases it was held that the jury could consider interest in making up the damages, but it was to be as damages, and not as interest:

Thus, in an action for damages caused by defendant's wall, after a fire, falling on plaintiff's property for lack of support, it was held that the proper instruction would be, that, in assessing damages of this kind, the plaintiff was not to be awarded interest as interest, but that, in ascertaining the damages at the date of the verdict, the jury should take into account the lapse of time, and put the plaintiff in as good a position in reference to the injury as if the damages directly resulting from it had been paid immediately. Ainsworth v. Lakin, 180 Mass. 397, 57 L.R.A. 132, 91 Am. St. Rep. 314, 62 N. E. 746. This would authorize the jury to fix the damages at the date of their verdict by adding interest at the legal rate on the amount of damages at the time of the injury, but it would not require them to do so.

And in an action for damages caused by fire from an engine, it was held that the court could not add interest to the verdict, although the jury might have included interest in their amount of damages. Garratt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra.

And in an action against a railroad for injury to property by fire, it was held that the damages were unliquidated, and plaintiff was not entitled, as a matter of law, to interest; but, in estimating the unliquidated damages, the jury might take into account interest on the sum found necessary to compensate the plaintiff for the injury suffered at the time of the loss, on the theory that such interest was a part of his damages. Black v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 122 Iowa, 32, 96 N. W. 984.

Interest was denied in Missouri and in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

New Hampshire, where a tender had been made, and in Kansas under the interest statute.

In actions for injury caused by fire of a locomotive, no statutory provision allowing interest for such damages appeared to exist and it was denied. It was held that the statute allowing interest for wrongful conversion did not apply. Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 63 Mo. 99; Atkinson v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 63 Mo. 367; De Steiger v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 73 Mo. 33; Flannery v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 44 Mo. App. 396; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ayers, 56 Kan. 176, 42 Pac. 722. The court said: "A recovery of damages for simple negligence of a party to whom no benefit could accrue by reason of the injury inflicted does not include interest as such. Neither the act of 1885 nor chapter 51, Gen. Stat. 1889, relating to interest, in terms authorizes it; and, in the absence of a statute, we think interest is not allowable any more for damages by fire than for the killing of cattle."

Where the defendant offered to pay more than the amount recovered in a suit for damages by fire, although no formal tender was made, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest. Thompson v. Boston & M. R. Co. 58 N. H. 524. The court said: "The reason for allowing the jury to add interest is more satisfactory in cases of liquidated than unliquidated damages: In the first, it is for the detention of money due, while in the latter it is the theory of the law that nothing is due till the damages are liquidated. Still an analogy exists between the two in this: that the right to recover unliquidated damages accrues at the time the injury is done, and the damages are assessed for the injury as then received; and if the wrongdoer causes long and vexatious delay, and the jury cannot add interest as damages for the delay, as is done in cases of liquidated damages, injustice is the result."

b. Injury to stock.

In some cases, interest was held recoverable in actions for injuries to stock from the operation of railroads, and interest was held to be properly allowed in the following cases:

Loss of a cow, killed by negligence of a railroad. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Fullerton, 79 Ala. 298.

Injuries to live stock. Alabama G. So. R. Co. v. McAlpine, 75 Ala. 113.

Negligently killing stock. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Biggs, 50 Ark. 169, 6 S. W. 724 (the court said that the old rule was that interest was not recoverable on unliquidated damages; but the modern rule of allowing interest in such cases has been adopted by this court); Wabash R. Co. v. Williamson, 3 Ind. App. 190, 29 N. E. 455; Varco v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 18, 13 N. W. 921.

Injuries to stock by a railroad train. Chicago & N. R. Co. v. Shultz, 55 Ill. 421. The court said: "The object in allowing a recovery for injuries sustained is that the party wronged may be compensated for the loss; and to allow interest from the date of the injury, on the value of the property, would only give appellee compensation."

Horses killed by a railroad train. Woodland v. Union P. R. Co. 27 Utah, 543, 26 Pac. 298. The court said: "The authorities are not in harmony, but the weight of them is to the effect, as we think, that interest may be given as damages, where the plaintiff has been deprived of his property by the wrongful act or neglect of the defendant, and the latter delays payment. Some of the authorities hold that interest should be computed on the value of the property, and added from the time of its destruction; others, from the time of instituting the suit. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, 13 Am. St. Rep. 482, 40 N. W. 948; Whitney v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Wis. 327; Chapman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 295, 7 Am. Rep. 81; Parrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 46 N. Y. 361; 1 Sutherland, Damages, p. 473."

In Dean v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 43 Wis. 305, the court told the jury they should allow interest on the immediate damages from the time the stock was killed by a railroad train. It was held that there was no exception sufficient to require the court on appeal to consider this question. It was said that in a prior case a direction to the jury to allow interest from the commencement of the action was upheld.

Under W. Va. Code, chap. 131, § 18, providing that a judgment shall bear interest from date, and § 14, providing that the jury shall find the aggregate of the principal and interest due at the time of the trial, and judgment shall be entered thereon, with interest from date of judgment, it was held that a judgment for interest on damages found by the jury prior to the day the judgment was entered, in an action for negligence, was erroneous. Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 629, 36 Am. Rep. 825.

On a verdict for $800 for killing stock by a railroad company, on the affidavit of the jurymen that the $800 did not include interest, but was only the value, and that the foreman had been instructed to add $168 interest, it was held that the court erred in amending the verdict, as the remedy was a motion for a new trial. Parker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 93 Mich. 607, 53 N. W. 834.

In the following cases interest was held to be discretionary with the jury:

Injury to horses. Schulte v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 128 Ky. 627, 108 S. W. 941.

In an action against a railroad for killing stock on the track, the finding by the referee, allowing interest on the value of the property destroyed, was held not erroneous. Lackin v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 22 Hun, 309.

In the following cases interest was held allowable, but only as part of the damages: 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where there is a basis of calculation of value in an action for killing stock by a railroad, interest is not recoverable eo nomine, but the jury may consider the length of time, the character of the tort, the conduct of the defendant, and to that extent increase the damages. Central R. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170, 52 S. E. 679, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 128 (the court said: "Where the damages found are discretionary or punitive, this rule does not apply. Western & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 S. E. 912; Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574, 4 S. E. 684"); Western & A. R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818.

And in an action for killing cattle, it was held that the finding of interest, as such, was contrary to law. Chattanooga, R. & C. R. Co. v. Palmer, 89 Ga. 161, 16 S. E. 34. The court said: "The verdict is contrary to law in finding interest, the action being one ex delicto; and if interest was found at all, it should be added into the principal sum of the verdict."

In an action for negligently killing stock, it was held that unliquidated demands arising ex delicto did not bear interest, and the jury could not find a given amount for principal, with an additional amount as interest; but it was held that the jury might add to the value of the property destroyed, a sum equal to the interest on such value, but such sum should be found and returned as damages, and not as interest. Western & A. R. Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13, 29 S. E. 130.

And in an action for damages against a railroad for killing stock, the whole amount awarded by the verdict was held to be the damages, although it might include interest added to the value; but if the amount thus found exceeded the amount claimed, the verdict should be set aside, or the excess struck off. Georgia R. & Ekg. Co. v. Crawley, 87 Ga. 191, 13 S. E. 508.

In a suit for damages for negligently killing stock, it was held error to charge the jury that after ascertaining the market value, they should add interest from the time of the judgment of the court below to the time of the verdict. Western & A. R. Co. v. Calhoun, 104 Ga. 384, 30 S. E. 868. The court said: "While in cases of this character the jury are authorized to increase the damages found by the addition of interest from the time that the property was damaged or destroyed, they are not compelled to do so."

In an action for negligence for frightening a horse by operation of a railroad, it was held that the jury should not have been instructed to allow interest. Pittsburgh Southern R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 580.

In Missouri, in cases of this kind, interest is not allowed.

Frightening a horse, causing a runaway. Damhorst v. Missouri P. R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 350.

Killing stock at a public crossing. Kimes v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 85 Mo. 611.

Injury to stock by operation of a railroad train. Meyer v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 64 Mo. 542. The court said: "The precise question as to allowance of interest in cases like this has been expressly decided in the cases of Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 63 Mo. 99; Atkinson v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 63 Mo. 367, and necessarily leads to a reversal of the judgment in this case; and as it will be retried, it may be well to observe that this action is founded upon the common law, and not the statutory liability of defendant."

In Goodman v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 71 Mo. App. 460, it was said that in this state there are cases where interest is recoverable as a matter of right, and others where the jury may or may not allow interest, as they see fit (State ex rel. Roberts v. Hope, 121 Mo. 34, 25 S. W. 893); and others, where interest is not allowed, as for killing stock or setting out fires.

In Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Johnston, 74 Ill. 83, an action for damages for killing stock by a railroad company, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the value from the time of the killing.

Tex. Rev. Stat. 1895, art. 4528, giving a right to recover for stock killed by a railroad train, was held not to include the right to interest. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Barton, 93 Tex. 63, 53 S. W. 1117, s. c. (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 797; St. Louis Southern R. Co. v. Chambliss, 93 Tex. 62, 53 S. W. 343; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Vaughan (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 1055. This statute was the same as act 1860, Paschal's Dig. art. 4926. The court said that this was the ruling in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Muldrow, 54 Tex. 233, and that would have to be followed, although no good reason is shown why the owner should not have damages commensurate, with interest for the detention.

Under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 4245, providing that railroads shall be liable for the value of stock killed by their trains, it was held that interest could not be recovered. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Muldrow, supra. The court said that this decision was not intended to conflict with those cases of trespass or conversion of goods where interest was discretionary with the jury.

And under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5312, providing that a railroad is liable for stock killed or injured, and § 5316, providing that the court or jury should give judgment to the plaintiff for the value of the animal killed or injured, it was held that interest should not be allowed. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Zumbaugh, 12 Ind. App. 272, 39 N. E. 1058. In this case the court said that interest in addition to the value of property is ordinarily held to afford the fair measure of damages; but our statute "does not allow any discretion in the assessment of damages in excess of the value of the animals killed."

And in an action under Kan. Laws 1874, chap. 94, providing that a railroad company shall be liable to pay the owner of stock full value for each animal killed, and damage to each animal wounded, in the absence of a fence, no interest was recoverable. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gabbert, 34 Kan. 132, 8 Pac. 218.

c. Personal injuries and death.

1. Personal injuries.

The general rule is that interest will not be allowed on damages for personal injuries. There seems to be a conflict as to whether a verdict will bear interest. In some Federal cases, interest on the verdict was allowed, to give jurisdiction on appeal.

In Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant, 133 U. S. 376, 33 L. ed. 656, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397, where a stewardess was injured on a steamer and the judgment was reversed on appeal, because of the fellow-servant doctrine, where the verdict was for $5,000, and the judgment was for that amount, and $306 interest between the verdict and judgment, it was held that the Supreme Court had jurisdiction on appeal.

In Griffith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 44 Fed. 574, where there was a verdict of $5,000 for damages against a railroad company for personal injuries, the defendant demanded that interest should be added to the verdict in order to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction. The court said: "I have conferred with the circuit judge upon this question, and the conclusions in which we concur are as follows: That it is proper to allow interest on the verdict from the date of its rendition up to the entry of judgment. This was done below in Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant, 133 U. S. 376, 33 L. ed. 656, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397, and the Supreme Court sanctioned it, and entertained jurisdiction. It does not appear that the practice was rested upon any New York statute."

In an action against a railroad for negligence in causing injury to an employee, it was held that interest was discretionary with the jury. Ell v. Northern P. R. Co. 1 N. D. 336, 12 L.R.A. 97, 26 Am. St. Rep. 621, 48 N. W. 222. This was under Dak. Comp. Laws, § 4578, providing that in an action for breach of an obligation not rising from contract, interest may be given in the discretion of the jury.

In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries caused by negligence, it was held that the jury could allow in their verdict, by way of damages, interest on the sums expended by the plaintiff on account of the injury to his wife. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Hickey, 12 App. D. C. 269. It was said: "It is true that, in actions of tort, at least in this jurisdiction, interest is not allowable upon the judgment recovered. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Harmon (Washington & G. R. Co. v. Tobriner) 147 U. S. 571, 37 L. ed. 284, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557. But that is quite a different question from that here presented. Whether a judgment bears interest or not is purely a legal question, that can only be decided by the court. But in actions of tort, interest can only be allowed as damages, and whether it shall be allowed or not rests entirely in the discretion of the jury, in arriving at what is a fair and just indemnity of the plaintiff for the wrong suffered."

In an action for personal injuries sustained by a passenger on a railroad, where verdict was rendered for the plaintiff, it was held that where the entry of the judgment was delayed by motion on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the amount of the verdict, with interest from the date of its rendition. Freemont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Root, 49 Neb. 900, 69 N. W. 397.

Under W. Va. Code, 1868, as amended by Acts 1882, p. 341, chap. 120, providing that judgment shall be entered with interest from the date of the verdict, it was held in an action for negligence that the judgment should bear interest from the date of the verdict. Campbell v. Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 159, 52 S. E. 220. The cases of Fowler v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 18 W. Va. 579, and Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, hold that the original section applies to actions for damages, and the amendment would therefore apply also.

But in the following cases interest was held improper:

Personal injuries caused by negligence. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Carr, 91 Tex. 332, 43 S. W. 18.

Action for personal injury against a master, where the party causing the injury could not be benefited. Marshall v. Schricker, 63 Mo. 308. The court said: "It has been recently decided by this court, that in actions ex delicto based upon the simple negligence of a party to whom no pecuniary benefit could accrue by reason of the injury thereby inflicted, interest is not allowable."

In an action for injuries to a passenger on a train, the refusal of an instruction that no interest could be allowed on any damages to which they might find the plaintiff entitled, neither as part of such damages nor as interest proper, was held to be immaterial error, where the instruction as to damages left no room for the allowance of interest. Trumbull v. Donahue, 18 Colo. App. 460, 72 Pac. 684.

And where discretionary damages were awarded for personal injuries, it was held that interest at the legal rate could not be added; that only special damages, computable upon evidence of actual malice, could be thus increased. Western & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320, 7 S. E. 912. In this case the court instructed the jury that they might, in their discretion, award further damages in the nature of interest, computed at 7 per cent from the date of injury to the time of trial. This was held erroneous, as there could be no payment nor any tender where the amount was uncertain. The court said: "As far back as 1799 we have statutory evidence adverse to the policy of increasing verdicts on account of interest upon unliquidated demands. Cobb's Dig. 495. It was thought consistent with this statute to increase the damages in trover by the addition of interest on the value of the property from the time of conversion. See Collier v. Lyons, 18 Ga. 648, and other cases. So, in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Garr, 57 Ga. 280, 24 Am. Rep. 492, the power of the jury to add interest in computing damages recoverable by a widow for the homicide of her husband is tacitly recognized. And in Central R. Co. v. Sears, 66 Ga. 499, there is apparently a like recognition of the power, whilst the direct adjudication was that it is not obligatory as a duty. To the same effect, perhaps, is Western & A. R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818, where the action was for killing a bull. But in all these cases the damages recoverable were special, and had to be proved by evidence applying directly or indirectly to values; whilst in the present case there is no such evidence, and the entire recovery is for damages of a nature incapable of any standard of measurement external to the minds and consciences of the jury."

And in an action for personal injury, it was held error to allow interest on the verdict for the time between the finding and the rendition of judgment. Clyde Mill. & Elevator Co. v. Buoy, 71 Kan. 293, 80 Pac. 591.

And under Ky. Rev. Stat. vol. 2, p. 65 (1852), providing that a judgment, except for malicious prosecution, libel, slander, or injury to the person, shall bear legal interest from its date, it was held that the judgment for personal injury to a passenger on a railroad did not bear interest. McMurtry v. Kentucky C. R. Co. 84 Ky. 462, 1 S. W. 815.

In an action by an employee for negligence causing injury, it was held that no Oregon statute made any provision for interest on unliquidated damages arising out of a tort until after judgment. Sorenson v. Oregon Power Co. 47 Or. 24, 82 Pac. 10. So it was held, where there was a counterclaim for unliquidated damages in an action on a note, interest would not be allowed. Smith v. Turner, 33 Or. 379, 54 Pac. 166.

In an action against a common carrier for personal injuries, it was held that, in the District of Columbia, a judgment for tort did not bear interest. Washington & G. R. Co. v. Harmon, supra. In this case it was held that D. C. Rev. Stat. § 829, and 5 Stat. at L. 516, 518, chap. 188, and §§ 713-717, 16 Stat. at L. 91, providing for interest on judgments, did not change the act of 1812, providing for interest on judgments on contracts.

In a libel against a steamer for personal injuries, it was held that interest in admiralty is within the discretion of the court; but this rule does not apply to actions for personal injuries, and a demand for such damages will not bear interest until they are judicially ascertained and determined. Burrows v. Lownsdale, 66 C. C. A. 650, 133 Fed. 250.

2. Death.

In actions for causing death, interest is allowed in some of the cases. Nebraska allows it where there is delay. Georgia allows it as damages. The cases in New York give interest under the act of 1870, chap. 78, providing for interest. But in Tennessee and Louisiana interest is not allowed.

For killing a slave, it was held the measure of damages should be the value of the slave at the time of the trespass, with interest on such value. Fail v. Presley, 50 Ala. 342. In this case the court charged the jury that they might add interest in addition to the value.

In an action for damages for death, for the benefit of a widow, the court reduced the verdict based on the expectancy of life of the deceased, and estimated the amount of the damages as that which would give the widow $150. a year for twenty-seven years, with interest, which was estimated to be $1,650. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Trammell, 93 Ala. 350, 9 So. 870.

In an action for death caused by negligence, an instruction that the measure of damages was that sum which, being put out at interest at 8 per cent per annum, would yield each year, by taking a proportionate part of the principal and adding it to the interest, the amount of deceased's yearly contributions to his family, less his personal expenses; and such that the whole remaining principal at the end of his expectancy of life, added to the interest on his balance for that year, would equal the amount of his yearly contributions to his family. Decatur Car Wheel & Mfg. Co. v. Mehaffey, 128 Ala. 242, 29 So. 646.

In an action for death caused by the negligence of a railroad, it was held that recovery should be allowed for damages, with interest from the date of decedent's death to the date of recovery. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Cleere, 76 Ark. 377, 88 S. W. 995.

Where a slave was sent to mill with corn to be ground, and in assisting to put the water wheel in order, was killed, in an action for damages against the mill owner, it was held that the measure of damages was interest on the value from the time of death to the time of trial. Collier v. Lyons, 18 Ga. 648. The court said: "We are not unmindful of the statute which forbids a verdict for unliquidated damages to be increased by the computation of interest, but suppose that the act was not intended to prohibit a resort to interest merely as an element or criterion by which to estimate the damages. The interest on the value was less than the hire; and the verdict, as rendered, less than the largest price put upon the boy."

In an action by a widow for the death of her husband, it was held erroneous to instruct the jury, as a matter of law, to add interest to the damages they might find at the date of the homicide. It was held that the question of increasing damages was for the jury. Central R. Co. v. Sears, 66 Ga. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

499. The court said: "In trover and conversion, where property has been taken and converted, the plaintiff has been considered as entitled to have interest calculated by the jury and added to the actual damage, thus making the full measure of his rights; but this rule has never been applied, as far as we can ascertain, to other classes of torts, where no property was taken or involved, and where the question was one of damages purely, unliquidated, and to be assessed by the jury. The rule, even in cases where property is involved, is to leave the question to the jury, not only as to the damages, but the interest."

In an action for personal injuries causing death, by a railroad train, it was held, where there was delay occasioned by the defendant after verdict, that the plaintiff would be entitled to interest on the verdict from the date of judgment. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Neb. 531, 83 N. W. 744.

In an action for causing death through negligence, under N. Y. act 1870, chap. 78, providing that the amount of damages shall draw interest from the time of the death, it was held that the rate of interest was governed by the statute regulating interest in force when the damages were ascertained. Salter v. Utica & B. River R. Co. 86 N. Y. 401.

And under this statute, it was held that interest should be calculated at 7 per cent, which was the lawful rate at the time of the death. Erwin v. Neversink S. B. Co. 23 Hun, 578.

This statute was held to be constitutional in Cornwall v. Mills, 12 Jones & S. 45.

And under this statute the jury had nothing to do with the question of interest, but it should be added by the clerk. Manning v. Port Henry Iron Ore Co. 91 N. Y. 664.

But in an action under N. Y. Laws 1847, chap. 450, for damages for negligence causing death, it was held that the jury could consider the time that had elapsed, as affecting the amount of damages, but they could not properly give interest as such, and it was held that Laws 1870, chap. 78, amending this act, allowing interest, did not apply, as this action was commenced prior to that act. Cook v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Hun, 426. The court said: "But in actions where the damages rest in the discretion of the jury, interest, as such, upon the damages, cannot be recovered."

Under N. Y. Code of Civ. Proc. § 1904, providing that when final judgment for plaintiff is rendered, the clerk must add to the sum so awarded interest thereon from the decedent's death, and include it in the judgment, it was held that the plaintiff, in an action for wrongful death, was not entitled to interest on a verdict for the full amount claimed from the date of the decedent's death. Robostelli v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 34 Fed. 719. In this case, as the addition of interest by the clerk would have exceeded the amount claimed in the petition, it was held that a remittitur would be required, and judgment entered for $5,000 only.

But in an action for negligence causing death, it was held that interest could not be allowed, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35, 14 L.R.A. 548, 17 S. W. 882. In this case the cases allowing interest for injuries to personal property were distinguished, also the different editions of Sedgwick on Damages, saying that the later editions had stated the more correct rule.

And in an action for death of a child killed by a railroad train, it was held that interest would be allowed on the judgment liquidating the damage, and not from judicial demand. Ortolano v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. 109 La. 902, 33 So. 914.

d. Defective highways.

In actions for damages from defective highways in New York, interest is allowed in the discretion of the jury. In Pennsylvania it is allowed as part of the damages, but not eo nomine. In all the other cases it is not allowed.

So, in an action for damages for injury to a horse from falling into a trench in the street, it was held that interest could be allowed in the discretion of the jury. Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 18 L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44.

In an action against a township for injury caused by a defective road on which plaintiff was driving, it was held that the jury could consider the time which had elapsed in estimating the amount of his damages. Plymouth Twp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. 24, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867, 17 Atl. 240. The court said: "It is true the plaintiff was not entitled to interest, as such, upon the value of his horse, but, in computing the amount of the damages, the jury may consider the time which has elapsed since the injury was received. There is some conflict in the cases (Pittsburgh Southern R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 580; Allegheny v. Campbell, 107 Pa. 530, 52 Am. Rep. 478); but this we think is the rule generally recognized."

In the following cases interest was disallowed: Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. v. Vandervort, 71 Kan. 101, 79 Pac. 1068, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 30; Sargent v. Hampden, 38 Me. 581; Gerst v. St. Louis, 185 Mo. 191, 105 Am. St. Rep. 590, 84 S. W. 34 (injury to a house, caused by excavating an alley); Brown v. Southbury, 53 Conn. 214, 1 Atl. 819 (injury to property, caused by a defective highway; but it was held that the amount allowed was too small to justify a reversal).

e. Other injuries.

Interest was held discretionary in actions for other injuries to property in Ohio, Wisconsin, Alabama, and New York, and could be estimated in increasing the damages in Massachusetts. But interest was denied in Colorado, Missouri, and Virginia.

In an action of assumpsit for negligently constructing a chimney, causing damages, it 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was held that the jury could add interest to the expenditures from the time they were made. Somerby v. Tappan, Wright (Ohio) 570.

In a suit for damages to personal property, caused by the negligence of the defendant, an instruction that "you may allow interest from the day this action was commenced" was held proper. McArthur v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 34 Wis. 139.

In a claim against a bankrupt estate for damages resulting from negligence in running a ferry, causing loss of horses and vehicle, it was held that the measure of recovery was the amount of the injury sustained, to which interest might be added. Borden v. Bradshaw, 68 Ala. 362.

In an action for injury to personal property from negligence, it was held that interest was discretionary with the jury. Reiss v. New York Steam Co. 27 Jones & S. 57, 12 N. Y. Supp. 557.

In an action against a village for injury caused by a wall falling on plaintiff's property, it was held the measure of damages was the actual injury of plaintiffs, with interest from the time of injury. Ludlow v. Yonkers, 43 Barb. 493.

In an action for injury to a horse, causing death and expenses, it was held that interest eo nomine would not be allowed in this class of cases; but that, in determining the amount of damages, the lapse of time might be considered, and the fact that the assessment was made on the day of the verdict, for a loss which occurred a long time before. This might be necessary to make the compensation adequate. Atwood v. Boston Forwarding & Transfer Co. 185 Mass. 557, 71 N. E. 72.

But in an action for negligently storing gunpowder near plaintiff's dwelling, causing damages, it was held that interest was not recoverable upon the damages. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Conway, 8 Colo. 1, 54 Am. Rep. 537, 5 Pac. 142. The court said: "Interest in this state is a creature of statute and regulated thereby. It is only recoverable, in the absence of contract, in the cases enumerated in the statute, and damages to property arising from the wrong or negligence of a defendant is not one of the enumerated cases." The same was held in a similar case. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Moynahan, 8 Colo. 56, 5 Pac. 811.

And in an action for collision between a wagon and cable cars, it was held the damages should not include interest. Sonnenfeld Millinery Co. v. People's R. Co. 59 Mo. App. 668.

In an action for property destroyed through the negligence of the defendant, it was held that interest could not be recovered. Fisher v. New Orleans Anchor Line, 15 Mo. App. 577.

And in an action ex delicto, based upon the simple negligence of the defendant, where no pecuniary benefit could arise from the injury, it was held error to allow interest on the damages found by the jury. Eagan v. Missouri P. R. Co. 6 Mo. App. 594. The case does not show the kind of injury.

The failure of an attorney to use diligence in collecting bad debts was held to render him chargeable for the principal lost, but not with interest. Rootes v. Stone, 2 Leigh, 650.

And in a special action on the case for negligence, it was held that N. Y. Session Laws 1844, p. 508, authorizing interest to be taxed upon verdicts, did not apply to verdicts rendered before the act, and interest was not allowable. Bailey v. New York, 7 Hill, 146.

And in an action against an abstractor for damages, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the loss occurring from defective title, where he had the uninterrupted possession of the lots, and enjoyed the rents and profits. Keuthan v. St. Louis Trust Co. 101 Mo. App. 1, 73 S. W. 334.

Whether interest eo nomine was recoverable in an action of negligence was held unnecessary to determine, in Lindsey v. Danville, 46 Vt. 145.

Where damages were given for negligent delay in transmitting a telegram, it was held error to allow interest from the commencement of the suit, where the amount allowed was the amount claimed in the complaint. Pacific Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Fleischner, 14 C. C. A. 166, 29 U. S. App. 227, 66 Fed. 899. The court said: "In the complaint, the allegation of the amount of damages is $3,704.37. The demand for judgment is for the same amount. The claim in this case was for unliquidated damages. Such demands do not bear interest."

XV. Nuisance.

It seems that in actions for damages from nuisance, interest will not be allowed. It was held discretionary in a case in New York, and refused in other similar cases in the same state.

In an action for a nuisance to real property, thereby preventing a sale, it was held that the allowance of interest by a jury for three years, where the only attempt to make a sale was less than two years before action brought, was erroneous. Hetzel v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Mackey, 1.

In a similar action it was held that it was not admissible to assume as a matter of law that the loss of enjoyment occasioned by the diminution of the value of land on account of a nuisance was to be measured by interest on the diminution of the value. Moore v. Langdon, 6 Mackey, 6. This case holds that damages may be recovered for wrongful detention, or the wrongful diminution of the use of property, but the jury cannot consider interest in estimating the damages.

In Lester v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 27 Utah, 470, 101 Am. St. Rep. 988, 76 Pac. 341, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 761, and Evans v. Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. 27 Utah, 475, 76 Pac. 1135, it was held that for injury to crops by reason of deposits and nuisance caused by a smelter, the damages were unliquidated, and interest was 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

not recoverable. The Lester Case was overruled in FELL v. UNION P. R. Co.

In an action for injuries caused by the operation of an elevated railroad, it was held that the jury, in their discretion, could give interest. Moore v. New York Elev. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 671, 27 N. E. 791. And the same was held in regard to a decision of the court where part of the interest was stricken out. Kerr v. New York Elev. R. Co. 49 Misc. 331, 96 N. Y. Supp. 1021.

But in Remsen v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 9 App. Div. 533, 41 N. Y. Supp. 593, the interest allowed on annual rents estimated as damages for the injury caused to abutting property by the operation of an elevated railroad was stricken out. And in a similar case interest was denied. Klipstein v. New York Elev. R. Co. 9 Misc. 708, 29 Supp. 1145.

XVI. Penal actions.

The rule seems to be that interest will not be given in penal actions. In Michigan, however, under the statute, interest was allowed.

So, in an action against a constable for not returning an execution, it was held that interest was not recoverable, as the remedy was the penalty given by statute, which could not be extended beyond the letter of the statute. Thomas v. Weed, 14 Johns. 255. The court said: "If the plaintiff had brought an action for negligence or for money had and received, he would have been entitled to interest."

And in an action against a sheriff for an escape, it was held that plaintiff could not recover interest, under N. Y. 1 Rev. Laws, 425, § 9, making the sheriff liable for the debt and damages. Littlefield v. Brown, 1 Wend. 398; Hutchinson v. Brand, 6 How. Pr. 73; Rawson v. Dole, 2 Johns. 454. In Renick v. Orser, 4 Bosw. 384, referring to this last case, it was said: "This case arose prior to the passage of the statute allowing interest upon the amount of the judgment to be collected or demanded upon the execution issued thereon." The Renick Case, however, gave judgment only for the amount due on the judgment, without interest.

In Little v. Banks, 85 N. Y. 258, an action by booksellers for the refusal of the publishers to sell to them New York Reports, published under contract with the state, providing $100 as liquidated damages, the claim was held to draw interest. This was so held because the contract was construed as providing for liquidated damages, and not a penalty.

Interest on treble damages in a penal action for overcharge by a common carrier was held improper in Blair v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 73 N. W. 1053.

And, in a similar action for unjust discrimination, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest. Blair v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 369, 80 N. W. 673. The court said: "The court allowed interest on the treble damages claimed from the time the alleged cause of action accrued to the date of the judgment. We think this was error. This statute is penal in character, and therefore liability should be limited to the amount fixed by the statute as compensation for damages sustained; to wit, the treble damages, attorneys' fees, and costs."

In an action to recover double the value of cattle killed by railroad, under Iowa statute, § 2077, allowing a recovery of double the damages sustained, it was held that under this statute no interest could be allowed on claims of this character. Brentner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 530, 23 N. W. 245, 27 N. W. 605.

Interest was not allowed in an action against a railroad for injuring stock through failure to have a fence, under the statute authorizing double damages. Wade v. Missouri P. R. Co. 78 Mo. 362. The court said: "This instruction might do in an action of trover for the conversion of personal property. I allude to that part of it relating to interest. But it has been held that it will not apply to actions for negligence."

Nor in an action for treble damages for cutting timber. McCloskey v. Powell, 138 Pa. 383, 21 Atl. 148, 150.

In an action for treble damages for cutting trees, where the jury gave a verdict for damages and interest, it was held that the court could not, in trebling damages, treble interest. Dunbar Furnace Co. v. Fairchild, 121 Pa. 563, 15 Atl. 656.

And under Wis. Rev. Stat. 4269, authorizing a recovery of the highest market value of lumber, in actions for damages for cutting timber, it was held that this was a statute penal in its nature, and interest could not be added. Smith v. Morgan, 73 Wis. 375, 41 N. W. 532. Prior to this statute, where the owner recovered only stumpage value, interest was allowed on the damages. Ingram v. Rankin, 47 Wis. 406, 32 Am. Rep. 762, 2 N. W. 755.

In an action under the statute to recover for damages of trespass by cattle, it was held interest should not be allowed, as the damages were in the nature of a penalty fixed by statute, without any reference to fault on the part of the owner. Jean v. Sandiford, 39 Ala. 317.

In an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, it was held that damages would not bear interest until after verdict and judgment (following 39 Ala. 317). Glidden v. Street, 68 Ala. 600.

But under Mich. Comp. Laws, chap. 211, § 24, authorizing complainant, in summary proceedings in an action of trespass, or trespass on the case, to recover treble damages, and all other damages to which he may be entitled, where the court trebled the rent and added interest and damages, it was held doubtful whether the court was authorized to treat the rent or interest reported by the jury as damages subject to be trebled. Howser v. Melcher, 40 Mich. 185.

N. W. 515 (Penal Stat.), Howser v. Melcher, supra, was distinguished, because the court did not decide whether, if the damages in trespass had been properly found and included interest, they could be trebled.

Under this statute the jury assessed plaintiffs' damages at $1,669, and damages on account of the revenues which might have accrued to them if the defendant had not retained possession, at $156. The trial court entered judgment for single damages only, and struck out the item of interest. This was held error, and judgment was entered upon appeal on the treble damages, with interest from the date of the verdict below. Lane v. Ruhl, 103 Mich. 38, 61 N. W. 347.

Under Mich. How. Stat. § 7957, providing that in trespass for cutting timber a person shall be liable to the owner of such land in three times the amount of damages which shall be assessed, in an action of trespass, by a jury, it was held that the assessment contemplated in the statute was to be according to the usual forms of law by the jury (which would, in a proper case, include interest), and that such damages, when found, should be trebled by the court. Gates v. Comstock, supra.

See Trespass, subd. VIII., supra.

XVII. Infringement of patents.

The general rule in equity cases seems to be to allow interest from the date of decree, or from the date of the master's report. Some cases allowed interest from the commencement of the action, and some from the date of infringement where the damages were estimated on the basis of royalties. In some cases interest was denied.

The profits allowed in equity for infringement of a patent were held to be the measure of damages in Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 136, 31 L. ed. 664, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 894, which, as a general rule, do not bear interest until their amount has been judicially ascertained.

In Keep v. Fuller, 42 Fed. 896, in a suit for infringement, on confirmation of the master's report, interest was allowed from the date of its submission to the court. In Rose v. Hirsh, 51 L.R.A. 801, 36 C. C. A. 132, 94 Fed. 177, and in Winchester Repeating Arms Co. v. American Buckle & Cartridge Co. 62 Fed. 278, the same rule was adopted.

On a decree for profits, interest was held proper from date of the master's report. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Turrill, 110 U. S. 301, 20 L. ed. 154, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 5.

And in Creamer v. Bowers, 35 Fed. 206, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of the interlocutory decree. The court said that the general rule is that interest should be allowed on royalties from the time they ought to be paid, where a royalty is the measure of damages, but that no interest is due on damages measured otherwise than by a royalty, because unliquidated. But this was subject to exceptions, and in equity appears largely to have been left to the discretion of the court.

In Steam Stone Cutter Co. v. Windsor Mfg. Co. 17 Blatchf. 24, Fed. Cas. No. 13,335, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest on the profits decreed, from the time of the entry of the interlocutory decree. The court held: In Silsby v. Foote, 20 How. 378, 15 L. ed. 953, Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. 620, 20 L. ed. 860, and Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. 205, 22 L. ed. 577, interest upon profits of an infringement was disallowed in the first without remarks; in the second on the ground that profits were unliquidated, upon which interest was not generally allowable; and in the latter, that profits were usually the measure of unliquidated damages; that circumstances might arise which would justify interest, but this was for the court to determine. That the tendency in the cases prior to the act of 1870 seems to have been towards confining the liability to account for gains and profits, not strictly to those actually received, and at the same time recognizing a liability for interest on the profits received, but no rule was laid down. It was held that since the entry of a decree the money has been detained with full knowledge of the detention, and for that reason defendant should be charged with interest.

Where the royalty constituted the measure of damages, the jury were instructed to allow interest from the commencement of the action. May v. Fond du Lac County, 27 Fed. 691.

In McCormick v. Seymour, 2 Blatchf. 240, Fed. Cas. No. 8,726, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from commencement of the suit; but in 16 How. 480, 14 L. ed. 1024, the decision was reversed, because the court had laid down an erroneous rule of damages, as the jury gave a verdict for nearly double the amount demanded for the use of three patents in a suit where the defendant was charged with violating one only.

In Pitts v. Hall, 2 Blatchf. 229, Fed. Cas. No. 11,192, interest was allowed from the commencement of the suit.

In Bates v. St. Johnsbury & L. C. R. Co. 32 Fed. 628, where interest was found from a demand which was made, as part of the damages, it was held that although damages do not carry interest as such, interest may be allowed as part of the damages by the trier of the facts, in awarding damages.

In Sickels v. Borden, 3 Blatchf. 535, Fed. Cas. No. 12,832, it was held that if the patentee has an established price in the market for his patent right, or what is called a patent fee, that sum, with the interest, constitutes the measure of damages.

And where damages were estimated by the value of royalties, interest was held proper from the time of infringement. Locomotive Engine Safety Truck Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 5 Bann. & Ard. 514, 2 Fed. 677. The court said: "The amount of the royalty was fixed when the defendants began to use the invention. To that amount 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

complainants were entitled at that time, and interest, therefore, is only compensation for the delay of payment of a liquidated sum."

In Tatham v. LeRoy, 2 Blatchf. 474, Fed. Cas. No. 13,760, it was claimed that plaintiffs were entitled to damages, with interest upon the same from the time of infringement down to the present. It was held that the jury, in estimating damages, could take into account interest if they chose, and give it in the way of damages; and they could take into account, in estimating the damages, the fact that the party had been deprived of them from the time infringement took place down to the present time.

But in Mowry v. Whitney, supra, it was held that interest was not generally allowable on unliquidated damages. In this case the defendant manufactured under his own patent, and his infringement of the complainant's patent was not wanton, and although he was responsible for damages, those facts were held to relieve him from liability to interest upon the profits.

And in Littlefield v. Perry, supra, it was held that, as a general rule, interest was not recoverable upon the account of profits, except under peculiar circumstances.

And profits were held to be unliquidated damages which did not draw interest without a special order of the court. Parks v. Booth, 102 U. S. 96, 26 L. ed. 54.

In Silsby v. Foote, supra, interest on the decree for profits found for complainant was stricken out, the judges being divided in respect to the amount of profits which should be allowed the plaintiff.

And where a bill for infringement was dismissed, and an injunction had been issued on an indemnifying bond being given, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to interest on his damages, under the circumstances of this case. Tobey Furniture Co. v. Colby, 35 Fed. 592.

XVIII. Water and water courses.

The general rule seems to be that interest should be allowed in actions for damages to property caused by water, sewage, or by diversion of water. This is under the rule that the value of the property destroyed is susceptible of computation. Some cases hold that it is discretionary with the jury. In Michigan, Missouri, and South Carolina, where the damages could not be easily computed, interest was denied.

So interest was allowed on damages from overflow of water in an action against a railroad, the overflow causing destruction of a crop. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yarrowborough, 58 Ark. 612, 20 S. W. 515; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holliday, 65 Tex. 512; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Calloun (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 362. The court said that "in this class of cases, the party whose property has been destroyed is as much entitled to interest on its value as to the value itself."

In an action for damages to crops, caused by diverting and discharging surface water on plaintiff's land. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, 13 Am. St. Rep. 482, 40 N. W. 948.

In an action against a milldam company for damages to property. Pick v. Rubicon Hydraulic Co. 27 Wis. 433.

In an action against the United States for causing injury by a dam in Lake Winnebago. Jones v. United States, 48 Wis. 385, 4 N. W. 519.

In Folsom v. Apple River Log Driving Co. 41 Wis. 602, where the defendant, in an action for damages for overflow of a stream, claimed that the measure of damages was the difference between the rental values of the land with and without injury, and interest, it was held that the value of the crops destroyed was the measure of damages.

And in an action for damages to land, caused by a waste ditch, it was held that if the land was permanently injured, but not totally destroyed, the owner would be entitled to recover the difference between the cash value of the land at a time immediately preceding the injury, and the actual cash value after the injury, with legal interest to the time of trial. And if the land was temporarily, but not permanently, injured, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover the amount necessary to repair the injury, and put the land in the same condition in which it was before, with legal interest to the time of trial. Young v. Extension Ditch Co. 13 Idaho, 174, 89 Pac. 296.

In an action for injury to a railroad, caused by a break in a reservoir, where the defendant had the means of ascertaining what the repairs to the roadway and costs were, it was held that he would be liable in a sum equal to what would be interest on the amount of compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled, computed from the date of the loss. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Ansonia Land & Water Power Co. 72 Conn. 703, 46 Atl. 157.

And in an action for damages caused to a stock of goods by water on the adjoining premises, it was held that interest was properly allowed. Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Asso. 89 N. Y. 498.

And interest was allowed,—in New Milford Water Co. v. Watson, 75 Conn. 237, 52 Atl. 947, 53 Atl. 57, where there was a wrongful diversion of water, caused by the maintenance of a reservoir.

In Lakeside Paper Co. v. State, 55 App. Div. 208, 66 N. Y. Supp. 959, an action for injury to a paper mill, caused by the state cutting off the water. The court said: "That the claimant is entitled to interest upon his claim from the date of the filing of the claim seems to have been settled both in this court and in the court of appeals and in this very case. (See this case upon the former appeal, 45 App. Div. 114, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1081; Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 105, 18 L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44; Weeks v. State, 48 App. Div. 357, 63 N. Y. Supp. 203.)"

In Dodge v. Rockport, 199 Mass. 274, 85 N. E. 172, an action by a mill owner for diversion of water, under Mass. Stat. 1894, chap. 78, § 4, providing that the town should pay all damages sustained by any person by the taking of any land for a water right.

In an action for injury to a boat, caused by a dam built in a navigable river, and for failure to open a lock, it was held that interest could be allowed on the damages. Hogg v. Zanesville Canal & Mfg. Co. 5 Ohio, 410. The court said: "My own opinion is that this interest ought not to be allowed, and that the recovery should be for the value of the property only. In this, however, the other members of the court differ from me, and think that the interest is a proper item of charge against the defendants."

And in an action against the purchasers of Pennsylvania canals under act of May 15, 1857, requiring the purchaser to keep the same in repair, it was held that the purchasers were liable for damages caused by failure to repair, and for interest from the date of each loss that plaintiff had sustained up to the time of the trial. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Patterson, 73 Pa. 491.

In the following cases interest was held to be discretionary with the jury. A New York case denied interest, but a subsequent case distinguished this by saying that it was discretionary:

In an action for the destruction of buildings, dams, and personal property by accumulation of water, where the defendant had denied liability, and interest had been allowed in a similar case against the same defendant, it was held that where the plaintiff had been kept out of the sum that would have made him whole at the time, so long that the sum was no longer an indemnity, the jury, in their discretion, could consider the delay caused by the defendant, and award interest on the original damages as a measure. Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 141 Mass. 126, 4 N. E. 620. The court said: "It is argued that the discretion was exercised wrongly, because delay was due to the plaintiff's not bringing his action. But he presented his claim, and was informed that the defendants denied their liability. Under such circumstances, the most prudent and economical thing for both parties was for the plaintiff to postpone his suit until a test case settled the question. The delay for that purpose was caused by the defendants as truly as if a suit had been begun and continued to await the decision."

And in an action for damages caused by the erection of a dam below plaintiff's sawmill, it was held that the allowance of interest was in the discretion of the jury. Walrath v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 457.

In an action for damages occasioned by an eviction from, and injury to, the lands of plaintiff, caused by a sewer, it was held that the allowance of interest was in the discretion of the jury. Duryee v. New York, 96 N. Y. 477.

In a claim against the state for damages caused by water from a canal, it was held that interest should not be allowed, in Sayre v. State, 123 N. Y. 291, 25 N. E. 163. The court said: "The claimant's causes of action are based upon the negligence of the state, and all his damages were caused by the flooding of his land. They are damages caused by a tort, and were in every sense unliquidated, and we can find no case justifying an allowance of interest in such a case."

In Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 18 L.R.A. 449, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817, 32 N. E. 44, Sayre v. State was distinguished, because in that case the court acted as a court of original jurisdiction, and refused interest in its discretion.

For diverting water from a tannery, the jury may allow interest from the commencement of the suit to the time of the verdict. Bare v. Hoffman, 79 Pa. 71, 21 Am. Rep. 42.

But in the following cases interest was denied. In Michigan this was on the ground of inability to compute damages:

In an action for damages for preventing the passing of logs by maintaining a boom, and preventing the plaintiff from completing a contract, it was held that, as the damages were not only unliquidated, but as the claim could not be determined prior to the verdict, interest could not be allowed from the time that the last expense was incurred. Coburn v. Muskegon Booming Co. 72 Mich. 134, 40 N. W. 198.

For obstructing natural water courses interest is not allowable. Brink v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 17 Mo. App. 177.

And in an action to compel the removal of obstructions from a water course and for damages, plaintiff is not entitled to interest on the damages. Lamar v. Charlotte & S. C. R. Co. 10 S. C. 476. It was said that interest was never allowed on unliquidated damages.

XIX. Splitting actions.

In an action of trespass on the case for a breach of a statutory duty in having in the city treasury a sum of money accruing from a special assessment to which plaintiff was entitled, it was held that whatever right plaintiff had, he should have recovered in the proceedings referred to as part of that demand, and he could not split his cause of action and maintain one for interest. Hoblit v. Bloomington, 71 Ill. App. 204.

Where the defendant in a condemnation proceeding made a deposit of the amount awarded, it was held that the owner could not bring a separate action or motion to obtain interest, as such matter should have been presented while the case could be said to be in court. Jamison v. Burlington & W. R. Co. 87 Iowa, 265, 54 N. W. 242.

Where the owner of land accepted damages for widening a street in the city of New York, and receipted in full, it was held that he could not thereafter maintain an action for interest on the same, although he entered a protest for nonpayment of interest at the time of settlement. Cutter v. New York, 92 N. Y. 166.

After payment of the award in a condemnation proceeding, it was held that the owner could not maintain a separate action for interest on the amount awarded. Hayes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 753, 19 N. W. 245. The court said: "Where the landowner is kept out of both the use of the money and the use of the land, he is entitled to what would be equivalent to 6 per cent interest upon the money. Daniels v. Chicago, I. & N. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 52; Hartshorn v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 616, 3 N. W. 648. The assessment is to be reached through a computation. But from what date? The date of the commissioner's appraisal is not material. That appraisal, as we have seen, did not of itself give a right to interest, or anything equivalent thereto. The date, manifestly, from which computation is to be made, is the time of taking possession. But this date does not appear in the record upon which the appeal is heard. It is to be established by evidence, and calls for an adjudication. It is not true, then, as the plaintiff claims, that the amount of damages which he is now claiming has been rendered certain by the adjudication already had, and it is true that he is seeking the adjudication of his case by piecemeal."

On a rule against executors to hold them liable for interest, it was held that interest could not be recovered distinctly from the principal, the law making no distinction between interest as damages and interest as in other cases. The claimant should have insisted on the right to interest on the trial, in opposition to the account. Anderson's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 95; Mann's Succession, 4 La. Ann. 28.

Where the principal of a debt was paid and accepted, it was held that an action of quantum meruit could not be maintained for the interest. Simmons v. Almy, 103 Mass. 33.

But where, on an award, it was agreed that claims for interest on the award should be determined in a subsequent action, it was held that the prior action did not bar an action for interest. Grote v. New York, 190 N. Y. 235, 82 N. E. 1088.

XX. Other actions.

Interest should not be allowed where exemplary damages are permitted. Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Jones, 29 Utah, 147, 80 Pac. 732.

In an action for assault and battery, it was held that where exemplary damages could be allowed in the discretion of the jury, it was error to charge that interest could be computed on the sum awarded. Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574, 4 S. E. 684. The court said: "In a case of tort, when the law allows the recovery of exemplary damages, the allowance of which and the amount thereof being entirely in the discretion of the jury, we do not think that the law contemplates or will allow interest to be computed on the sum awarded by them."

Interest was held to be a question of fact for the jury, and not a matter of law, in actions of tort, and where the plaintiff paid under duress an illegal warrant for a highway tax, to avoid imprisonment, it was held that he could recover, in an action for false imprisonment, the amount paid, without interest. Taylor v. Coolidge, 64 Vt. 506, 24 Atl. 656.

Under Va. Code, § 3390, providing that, if a verdict be rendered which does not allow interest, the sum thereby found shall bear interest from its date, it was held that a verdict for damages for seduction should bear interest from the date of the verdict, and the judgment should be so entered. Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. 671.

XXI. English cases.

a. Eminent domain.

In England, under the statutes, it seems that in condemnation proceedings the owner is treated as the vendor and the condemner as the purchaser; and interest is generally given from the time of taking possession. This was held in the following cases:

In James v. Ontario & Q. R. Co. 12 Ont. Rep. 624, it was held that interest was properly allowed to the landowner from the time of taking, which was held to be the date the railroad company gave notice to the landowner of its intention to take the land.

And in a proceeding under the lands clauses consolidation act, it was held that the railroad should pay interest from the time it took possession, where the title was satisfactory. Blount v. Great Southern & W. R. Co. 2 Ir. Ch. Rep. 40.

And a railway company was held liable for interest from the time of taking possession, where the money had been paid into court under railway act (Ireland) 1851, 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 70, where the company did not move after the final award to have the money applied to the credit of the sum awarded, or did not pay the amount awarded to the parties out of court, and asked to have the deposit returned. Re Dublin, W. & W. R. Co. Ir. L. R. 27 Eq. 79.

And where the amount due from a company was ascertained by the verdict of a jury upon the traverse of an award, it was held that the owner was entitled to 5 per cent from the date of entry, under § 22, railways (Ireland) act 1851, providing that the company shall, where they enter upon lands, pay interest at the rate of £5 per annum upon the compensation money from the time of their entry until the time of the payment. Re Belfast Water Comrs. Ir. L. R. 15 Eq. 13. This overrules Ex parte Spear, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 467.

Under railway act (Ireland) 1851, § 27, providing that where there is an increased award on a traverse, the difference between the amount paid in (under the certificate) and the damages shall, at the cost of the company, be paid into court, it was held that where the company had paid this amount into court, it would not be liable for interest at £5 per cent on the damages 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

awarded by the verdict, from the time of taking possession. Ex parte Spear, supra. It was admitted that if there had been no traverse, interest at £5 per cent would have been payable on the sum certified by the arbitrator from the time of entry. The court said this phase of the question was overlooked by the legislature.

And under land clauses consolidation act 1845, interest was held payable from the time possession might have been taken. Re Spencer-Bell, 33 Week. Rep. 771.

A railroad company that delayed depositing the amount of the award was held liable for interest from the time it might prudently have taken possession,—that is, from the time a good title was shown. Re Pigott, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 146. This was under land clauses consolidation act 1845.

A holder of a leasehold which was taken in eminent domain was held entitled to interest on the amount due him, as agreed in the bond, from the time the board of public works took possession. Cooper v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 472. The holder of this leasehold had mortgaged the same, and had agreed that his other damage to trade and expenses would be £250, which the board agreed to pay. The plaintiff brought an action for specific performance, and the board took possession and paid the money into court.

In Willey v. South Eastern R. Co. 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 201, it was said, in a proceeding to condemn land, when possession was taken under land clauses consolidation act (8 Vict. chap. 18), that the act provides that interest shall be calculated from the time of taking possession.

In condemnation, where there was an appeal, and the award was increased, it was held that interest should be allowed on the difference from the time of taking possession. Re Shaw, 33 Week. Rep. 74. The same was held where the award was increased on a traverse. Re Navan & K. R. Co. Ir. Rep. 10 Eq. 113.

And interest was held to be due from the time the railroad took possession of land under land clauses consolidation act 1845. Rhys v. Dare Valley R. Co. 23 Week. Rep. 23. The court said: "From the time when the railroad company exercised their statutory rights and took possession of that property which had been the plaintiff's, they became the owners of the land, and the plaintiff became the owner of the price payable for the land."

Some cases hold that interest attached at the time of verdict or award; but these cases do not seem to have been approved.

In a proceeding under vendor and purchaser act 1874, and notice to treat, under public health act 1875, which includes the compulsory powers contained in lands clauses consolidation act 1845, it was held that from the time of the verdict the vendors ceased to be owners, and were entitled to receive the purchase money; that interest was payable to the persons to whom that purchase money belonged; that if the vendors collected rents during that time, they should be deducted. Re Eccleshill Local Board, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 214.

The case of Re Eccleshill Local Board, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 365, holding that interest in eminent domain attached from the time of verdict, was criticized in Re Pigott, supra, the court saying: "I am quite unable to understand the principle on which that case proceeded. I am not embarrassed by it, because I have no verdict of a jury to deal with in this case."

In an action for specific performance, it was held, under the charter of the company and enabling act 5th of June, 1851, that the company could maintain a bill for specific performance of a contract with the landowner, without proceeding under the compulsory clauses of their act; that as soon as the company had given notice, the relative situation of vendors and purchasers was constituted; that where the amount was fixed by an award, the purchaser would have to pay interest on the purchase money, and the vendor account for the rents. Regent's Canal Co. v. Ware, 23 Beav. 575.

In Re Pigott, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 679, it was said: "There have been some cases cited, but they do not appear to me to have any direct bearing on the subject. The cases rather assume that this is the law than decide it; but there is certainly one case (Regent's Canal Co. v. Ware, supra,) where the company was plaintiff, and the title having been accepted before the amount was ascertained, interest was given by the award. The cases, as I said before, seem rather to assume that interest is payable. There is another, before Vice Chancellor Bacon, where he adverted to the fact of the verdict of the jury being given, and he held interest to rise from that moment. I am quite unable to understand the principle on which that case proceeded. I am not embarrassed about it, because I have no verdict of a jury to deal with in this case; but I am free to confess that, if I had the case to deal with, I should not have been able to decide it otherwise than I have decided the one before me."

Under 8 Vict. chap. 18, § 85, making £5 per cent interest payable on a sum recovered under § 68, for neglecting to issue the warrant to the sheriff within twenty-one days after notice that the proprietor wishes to have compensation settled by a jury, the company failing to issue the warrant in time was held required to pay the amount claimed, and interest. Re Aberdare R. Co. 8 Week. Rep. 603.

Where a municipal corporation had lodged in court the amount awarded by an arbitrator for land condemned under the labourers and artisans' act 1875, and took possession, and the owners appealed, and a verdict of the jury increased the award, it was held that interest should be allowed from the time of the award. Re Shaw, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 51.

On a bill for specific performance and for injunction under land clauses consolidation act 1845, notice of the intention to take plaintiff's property had been served. The 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

court said: "After that notice, the only thing to be ascertained was the amount of the purchase-money; and as the mode of ascertaining that is prescribed by the statute, it is, in contemplation of law, certain, although it remains to be ascertained." Walker v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 6 Hare, 594.

Where, in eminent domain proceeding, the railroad company paid into court the sum assessed by the jury, it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to make any order as to interest on the purchase money, although there was some controversy by a judgment creditor and mortgagee as to the fund. Re Crystal Palace R. Co. 1 Jur. N. S. 995.

And under railway clauses consolidation act (Scotland) 1845, and land clauses consolidation act (Scotland) 1845, it was held that interest would not be allowed where the landowner did not take the proper and usual mode of having the amount of payment ascertained. Caledonian R. Co. v. Carmichael, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 56.

b. Admiralty and collision.

Interest will be allowed from the date of the collision.

Under 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 63, limiting the liability in cases of collision to £8 a ton of the ship's tonnage, it was held that the shipowners were liable for interest on that amount from the date of the collision. Smith v. Kirby, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 131.

And under 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 63, § 54, on a bill to determine the liability for collision at sea, it was held that interest would be allowed on the damages from the date of collision. Straker v. Hartland, 11 L. T. N. S. 622. In this case the court said: "Surely, if the debt is not paid on that day, then interest begins to run. There is a further difficulty: that this is a question of tort, and not of contract, and it is hard to see how to give interest for a tort; but if you find that interest has, for a long series of years, been allowed by a given court (and this appears to be the result of the researches made by the court of admiralty in the case of The Amalia, 10 L. T. N. S. 826), then this becomes a settled rule of law, and will be followed by this court."

Under merchant shipping act 1854, § 504, it was held that the value of the vessel causing such collision and damage to person or goods, where the damage to the person was satisfied, should be estimated at its actual value. Nixon v. Roberts, 4 L. T. N. S. 679. The court said: "As to the interest, an inquiry will be directed as to whether there was any freight earned. If so, interest from the time when the freight would become due. If no freight, then from the time of collision."

In The Kong Magnus, 65 L. T. N. S. 231, it was held that interest should be allowed although the action was not instituted until twelve years after the collision. It was held that the rule in admiralty differed from that of the common law. The rule in admiralty is on the ground that the person liable in damages, having kept in his pocket the sum of money which ought to be paid to the claimant, ought to be held to be keeping it for the person to whom the court has found it payable.

In The Dundee, 2 Hagg. Adm. 137, under 53 G. III. chap. 159, § 1, providing that a shipowner is not liable for loss or damage done by his ship, beyond the value of his ship, appurtenances, and freight, it was held that interest should be allowed on the amount reported by the registrar and merchants to whom it had been referred, and whose report included interest. The court said that "if, without payment of interest, the wrongdoer could retain the money due to the sufferer, he might apply it to the purpose of an unjust and persevering litigation."

And under 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 63, § 54, limiting the liability of the owners only in respect of damages to ship, goods, or merchandise, it was held that the practice under the old law, which decreed a restitutio in integrum by the wrongdoer to the sufferer, was applied, limited by the statute, and it was held that the limited amount took the place of the restitutio in integra, and there was no reason why interest should not accrue on the delay to pay that limited amount, as well as in the case where the amount was unlimited. The Northumbria, L. R. 3 Adm. & Eccl. 6. In this case the prior decisions were reviewed, saying: "The contention is that interest is part of the damages, and that therefore the court is precluded by the statute from giving it, in addition to the statutory limitation of £8 per ton. The answer to this contention appears to me conclusive. First, if it were necessary, I should be inclined to dispute the axiom; but, in truth, the application of it is at variance both with the decided cases in the court of chancery as well as in the court of admiralty, and with the principle on which they are founded; that principle being, that the lien attaches from the moment when the injury has been inflicted. The cases are, in the court of chancery, African S. S. Co. v. Swanzy, 2 Kay & J. 660, decided in 1856; General Iron Screw Collier Co. v. Schurmanns, 29 L. J. Ch. N. S. 877, decided in 1860; and Nixon v. Roberts, 30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 844, decided in 1861. All these cases were decided upon the provisions of the merchant shipping act 1854, § 504; and I think it was well remarked by Mr. Clarkson, that the legislature, when it passed the subsequent merchant shipping act of 1862, must be taken to have been aware of these decisions; and in this last merchant shipping act the words of the former act, 'shall not be answerable for damages,' are repeated, without any provision that they shall not be deemed to include interest. The cases under this last act are Straker v. Hartland, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 122, in the court of chancery, decided in 1864; and The Amalia, 34 L. J. Prob. N. S. 21, in the court of admiralty, the best report of which appears to be contained in the New Reports. (5 New Reports, 164, note.) In all the cases in the court of chancery it is to be observed that they have avowedly followed the practice of the court of admiralty. I arrive, therefore, without hesitation, at the conclusion that, notwithstanding the merchant shipping acts, some interest is payable on the limited amount. I entirely agree with the observations of Wood, V. C., in Straker v. Hartland, 34 L. J. Ch. N. S. 123: 'It was quite clear that justice required that a debt which was due, but the payment of which was delayed, should carry interest.'

c. Trover and conversion.

The statute authorizes interest in trover or trespass de bonis.

Under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 42, § 29, authorizing a jury in trover or trespass de bonis asportatis to give damages in the nature of interest in addition to the value of the goods at the time of seizure, and 21 & 22 Vict. chap. 27, § 2, Lord Cairn's act, authorizing courts of equity in injunctions to give damages, which power was vested in the high court by § 16, judicature act 1873, which was not affected by the repeal of Lord Cairn's act, it was held, in an action by the holders of bills of lading, for an injunction against the master of the vessels' and a claimant of cargoes, to prevent the delivery to anyone but themselves, that the proper measure of damages would be interest on the amount which plaintiffs had been prevented from receiving to the date of the judgment. Dreyfus v. Peruvian Guano Co. L. R. 42 Ch. Div. 66. In this case, part of the cargoes was put in the hands of a receiver, and plaintiff deprived of possession, which occasioned plaintiff's loss, and the rule of damages in trover was held applicable.

In Chitty on Pleadings, 7th ed. p. 412, it was said: "Before the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 42, § 29, interest was recoverable only in a few cases of contract; but under that act a jury may give damages, in the nature of interest, over and above the value of the goods at the time of the conversion or seizure, in all actions of trover or trespass de bonis asportatis, and over and above the money recoverable in all actions on policies of assurance."

In Fisher v. Prince, 3 Burr. 1363, it was said: "In Trover for money numbered, or in a bagg. The court have ordered it to be brought in: Yet the Jury may give more in Damage; they may allow interest, (and in some Cases they ought.)"

And where a vessel and cargo were bought from the commander, who had no power of sale, it was held that the purchaser was liable for the value, with interest at the rate allowed in India from the time of obtaining the property. Elkins v. East India Co. 1 P. Wms. 396. The interest in India was about 12 per cent, and the plaintiff had rested thirteen years.

In Mercer v. Jones, 3 Campb. 477, which was an action of trover for a bill of exchange, it was held that the damages were "the amount of the principal and interest due upon the bills of exchange at the time of the demand." This case was overruled as to the time of estimating value, and it was held that the jury could give the value at the time of conversion or any subsequent time. Greening v. Wilkinson, 1 Car. & P. 625.

But an action to compel the defendants to account for the profits which they had made out of wrongs that they had committed in mining coal on plaintiff's land was held to be neither trespass nor trover, as one of the defendants had died, and such action would have abated, and did not entitle to interest under 3 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 42, § 29, providing for interest in actions of trover or trespass de bonis; and it was further held that laches of plaintiff prevented any recovery of interest. Phillips v. Homfray, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 210.

d. Common carrier.

A common carrier, having lost a piece of machinery in transit, was held liable in damages for the amount necessarily expended in replacing the same, and the freight, and interest upon the amount for the time the plaintiffs were delayed. British Columbia & V. I. Spar, Lumber & Sawmill Co. v. Nettleship, L. R. 3 C. P. 499.

e. Contract.

The latest case holds that where the amount could and should have been ascertained at a time certain, interest should be allowed.

In Mackintosh v. Great Western R. Co. 4 Giff. 683, where, by a contract, a sum of money was payable at a time certain, to be ascertained by engineer's certificates, and the amounts were disputed, but settled by the court, it was held that, under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 42, interest should be added. The court said: "When a dispute arises as to the sum payable at a certain time, and the proper amount ought, according to the contract, to have been ascertained at the time which was certain, the result of the litigation being to settle the amount which was certainly due at the time, certain interest is payable."

In Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co. L. R. 18 Eq. 154, the case of Mackintosh v. Great Western R. Co. supra, was criticized, the court saying: "The Vice Chancellor Stuart, however, did not, in his judgment as to interest, refer to the cases which I have already mentioned, but he seems to have gone on some earlier authorities, which, in the case to which I have referred, were reviewed and considered to be no longer applicable at law. . . . I do not consider that that case is an authority in favor of the plaintiffs for the allowance of interest."

In Mildmay v. Methuen, 3 Drew. 91, a demand was made of executors to pay £10,097 and interest on a contract for building, to be paid within six months after an architect should certify. No certificate was made. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A reference was made by the vice chancellor to an architect, who reported a deduction of £1,500. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date of his demand and notice, under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 42, § 28, providing that on all debts or sums certain the jury may allow interest from the time when such debts were payable, if payable by a written instrument, or, if otherwise payable, from the time of demand of payment in writing. This was held to be a sum certain, although the demand exceeded the allowance by £1,500.

Mildmay v. Methuen was criticized in Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co. supra, the court saying that in the former case there was a demand for £10,000, from which a deduction of £1,500 was made on investigation of the accounts, and interest was allowed on the balance. The circumstances under which reference was made to an architect to ascertain the amount are not set out with that amount of detail which would make the decision satisfactory, and "the nature of the deduction is not explained. No authority was referred to, and the judgment of the vice chancellor is not a very full one."

In an action by a contractor who was to be paid monthly on engineer's certificate, where the certificate was not given, it was held in an equitable action that interest could not be collected under 3 & 4 Wm. IV., chap. 42, § 28, providing for interest on a sum certain, or where there is a written demand for interest. Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co. supra. In this case the amount due was disputed. It was claimed that the balance demanded was a sum certain. It was held that § 29 did not apply, as that section was applicable in trespass and trover and insurance. The court said that if § 28 applied, it was discretionary with a jury to allow interest, and a new trial would not be granted for not allowing interest.

f. Negligence.

A purchaser of a leasehold estate, where the title failed by reason of a prior mortgage, and who sued his attorney for damages in failing to discover the defects in the title, and who was liable to the mortgagee for mesne profits, was held entitled to have the jury instructed "that he was entitled to interest or to rent, and that the damages should be increased by that amount." Allen v. Clark, 7 L. T. N. S. 781. This action was for the purchase money and costs of ejectment.

g. Injunction.

On the dissolution of an injunction restraining the payment of money, it was held that the damages would be interest at 5 per cent during the delay, minus any interest the party might have made. Graham v. Campbell, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 490.

h. Waste.

In an action by the tenant in tail after taking possession, against the estate of the life tenant, for waste, it was held that the personal estate of the late duke was liable to account to his son for all the beneficial profits which he received from those acts of dilapidation, with interest at £4 per cent from the time of his death. Leeds v. Amherst, 14 Sim. 357.

Cases involving interest on actions of covenant or on contracts for the sale of real estate are not intended to be included in this note.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

CHARLES E. NEWMAN.

(— Ark. —, 127 S. W. 735.)

Negligence — property unsafe for cattle — duty.

A railroad company which permits a leaky oil car to stand near where cattle are rightly accustomed to graze along a highway and its unfenced track, so that the oil forms pools, the drinking of which will be injurious to the cattle, is bound to guard the pools, or drive away cattle which it sees drinking the oil.

Note.—Liability of railroad company for attracting animals running at large, to its premises, by allowing freight or waste attractive to live stock to remain exposed thereon.

This note is confined to cases where the question considered was the negligence of the railroad in allowing substances attractive to animals to remain exposed upon its premises, and it does not include cases passing upon the question of its negligence in managing or operating its trains.

Where a railroad negligently permits substances calculated to attract animals, to remain upon their premises, they are liable for injury resulting to animals running at large.

Thus, where salt, in some manner not appearing, gets upon a railroad track near a depot platform, early in the morning of the day previous to that on which a horse which was attracted thereby was killed, and railroad employees could have discovered that stock had been licking the salt, the railroad is liable. Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 394.

And where stock is attracted upon a railroad track in front of the company's warehouse, by drippings of molasses from cars, and there killed by its train, the road is liable. Page v. North Carolina R. Co. 71 N. C. 222.

So, a railroad which permits cotton seed to accumulate on or about its track must APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County affirming a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of a cow which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Hemingway, E. B. Kinsworthy, and James H. Stevenson, for appellant:

The acts alleged and relied upon by the plaintiff, as constituting negligence, did not, in law, amount to such, and were not done in violation of any duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff.

Morrison v. Cornelius, 63 N. C. 346; Hess v. Lupton, 7 Ohio pt. 1 p. 216; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 562; Kansas City, S. & M. R. Co. v. Kirksey, 48 Ark. 366, 3 S. W. 190.

The leaving of the leaky cars at Judsonia is not shown to have been the proximate cause of the death of the cow.

Ingham, Animals, §§ 42, 47, pp. 121, 147; Fennell v. Seguin Street R. Co. 70 Tex. 670, 8 S. W. 486; Herold v. Meyers, 20 Iowa, 378; Bush v. Brainard, 1 Cow. 78, 13 Am. Dec. 513; Hess v. Lupton, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 216; Henry v. Dennis, 93 Ind. 452, 47 Am. Rep. 378; Ferguson v. Miami Powder Co. 9 exercise reasonable care to prevent injury to stock attracted thereby, and the burden is upon it, in an action to recover the value of stock killed by its trains, to overcome the prima facie case made by showing a killing of the stock. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Dick, 52 Ark. 402, 20 Am. St. Rep. 190, 12 S. W. 785.

And where a railway, for more than a year, permits brine and other rubbish coming from a refrigerator situated near its track, and owned by third persons, to drain upon its premises near its track, with knowledge that it attracts stock, and that several cattle have been killed at that point, it is liable for the killing of a cow which was struck by its cars. Morrow v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 29 Mo. App. 432.

But where the matter which attracts the animals is under the control of a third person, the railroad is not rendered liable by its presence.

Thus, it is not liable for the killing of a cow attracted by barrels of salt left open and exposed in a warehouse on its right of way, where the warehouse was not owned by it, and the salt was stored there by the railroad's agent personally, as a merchant, and not as agent for the railroad. Whitesides v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 58 Mo. App. 655; Burger v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 123 Mo. 679, 27 S. W. 393.

And where a railroad leases a part of its right of way for use as an elevator, it is not liable for the killing of a cow which

Ohio C. C. 445; Morrison v. Cornelius, 63 N. C. 346; Gilman v. Noyes, 57 N. H. 627; Durham v. Musselman, 2 Blackf. 96, 18 Am. Dec. 133.

Mr. P. R. Andrews also for appellant. Messrs. S. Brundidge, Jr., and H. Neely, for appellee:

Defendant was bound to either guard the pools, or drive the cattle away.

Jones v. Nichols, 46 Ark. 207, 55 Am. Rep. 575.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of appellant's freight trains was wrecked at Bald Knob, and several tank cars containing raw cotton seed oil were damaged to such an extent that they leaked. These tank cars were hauled to Judsonia, Arkansas, and left there for several days, during which time the oil ran out of them in a steady flow. The cars were first placed near a road crossing, and later a short distance therefrom, and the oil ran down into the ditches by the sides of the track and road, and stood in great pools in these ditches and in the road. The grounds on which the cars were placed were uninclosed, and cattle were accustomed to pass over them at will, and there graze at times. A number of cattle drank of this oil, and from twenty to twenty-five head of them died therefrom, amongst which was a cow owned by the appellee. The oil gave forth a great stench, and some of the owners who saw their cattle drinking it drove them away, because they feared they would be injured by the oil. The appellant made no effort to guard the cattle from the oil, or to drive them away. The plaintiff did not see his cow drinking the oil, or know of it until sometime afterwards. He sued the appellant, and recovered judgment for the value of his cow, and this appeal is brought to reverse that judgment.

It is urged by counsel for appellant that, under the evidence in this case, it owed no duty to appellee, and therefore was guilty of no act of negligence for which appellee would be entitled to a cause of action, and that, if the appellant was guilty of any negligence, it was not the proximate cause of the injury, and, on this account, the appellee is not entitled to recover for the death of the cow. The liability of the appellant for the death of the cow depends upon the right of appellee to permit his cow to range at large, and the effect that the act of appellant had in permitting the oil to run in the ditches at an uninclosed place near a public road, and in thus attracting the cow to drink, the oil which caused its death. The common law made it the duty of the owner of domestic animals to keep them upon his own land, and, if he failed in that duty, and permitted them to stray upon the land of another, though uninclosed, he was chargeable with a trespass. But such a doctrine is not recognized in this state. The stock owner in this state is not accountable as a trespasser for permitting his stock to stray upon the open premises of another. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Finley, 37 Ark. 562. The owner of domestic animals is therefore guilty of no violation of duty or of any act of negligence in permitting his cattle to run at large on such uninclosed lands of another. On the other hand, the owner of the land is not required to fence out the stock, and ordinarily owes no duty to one who thus suffers his stock to stray upon his land. He has the right to use his own property as he may see fit, but in that use he has no right to do a negligent act which will result in an injury to another. His liability arises in the use of his premwas attracted by cobs and corn which the lessees allowed to accumulate. Gilliland v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 411.

And the proper use of salt to free its switches from ice and snow, in order to enable it to manage and handle its trains, does not render a railroad liable for the killing of stock which is attracted thereby. Kirk v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 41 W. Va. 722, 32 L.R.A. 416, 56 Am. St. Rep. 899, 24 S. E. 639; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Phillips (Miss.) 12 So. 825.

In Schooling v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 75 Mo. 518, where there was no evidence that plaintiff's cow which had been killed was enticed to the defendant's track by hay loaded on cars, the court said that negligence could not be imputed to the railroad for receiving the hay and loading it on its cars, when they were despatched within a reasonable time. But it was stated that, if the evidence had showed that the cow had been killed at the place where the hay was loaded, and that the car had been left standing an unreasonable length of time, recovery might have been had; and it was also implied that, if the hay had been negligently loaded so as to scatter it on the track, and it had been negligently left there, and cattle had thereby been attracted to it and killed, the railroad would have been liable.

In Harlan v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 18 Mo. App. 483, where an action was brought to recover the value of a cow killed by railway cars, it was held that the railroad was not negligent in leaving a car which was loaded with hay in the afternoon on a side track during the following night.

It has been held that the fact that the owner of the horse turned it out knowing that there was salt on the track, and that it was attracting animals, does not render him guilty of contributory negligence. Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 394.

ises, when he fails to observe, for the protection of the property of another, that degree of care and precaution which the circumstances demand, whereby an injury results to such other person's property. He does owe therefore to the owner of straying stock the duty to refrain from attracting or drawing to a dangerous object or substance which he has placed upon his land such stock. Such act becomes one of negligence whereby, if injury results to another, a liability is incurred. The landowner has no right to thus actively draw into peril straying stock. He may not be under any duty to guard the stock from the dangers to which they ordinarily might be exposed, but if he places on his land a dangerous substance which would attract passing animals, and thereby the animals are injured, if the injury is the natural and probable result of the act, which a prudent man would have foreseen, then the landowner is liable for the injury resulting therefrom. Kansas City, S. & M. R. Co. v. Kirksey, 48 Ark. 366, 3 S. W. 190; Ingham, Animals, p. 153; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 57 Ark. 17, 18 L.R.A. 110, 38 Am. St. Rep. 217, 20 S. W. 545.

Thus, in the case of Crafton v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 55 Mo. 580, some salt was spilled at a depot while the employees were unloading it, and afterwards a cow was attracted to the place by the salt, and killed by the cars, and it was held that it was an act of negligence to leave the salt on the track. Page v. North Carolina R. Co. 71 N. C. 223. In the case of Henry v. Dennis, 93 Ind. 452, 47 Am. Rep. 378, the defendant placed and left exposed an open barrel of fish brine upon a public street where the plaintiff's cow was lawfully running at large, and the cow ate and drank of the fish brine, and was thereby poisoned. It was held that the defendant was guilty of an actionable wrong. See also Young v. Harvey, 16 Ind. 314. But we think that the doctrine announced in the case of Jones v. Nichols, 46 Ark. 207, 55 Am. Rep. 575, is decisive of this case. In that case the appellants were the owners of a cotton gin, and, in an open space under the building, a pit was dug for their cotton press. The appellee's cow fell into the pit, and was killed. In that case the court said: "The pit which the appellants dug, and into which the cow fell in the nighttime, was close to the highway. It was uninclosed, and was without signal of warning or protection. Moreover, cotton seed and corn had been left by the appellants scattered in the neighborhood of it, so that, in the language of one of the witnesses, it was not only a stock trap, but was actually baited for the game. The court instructed the jury, in effect, that, if they should find such a state of facts from the proof, the appellants were guilty of negligence which would render them liable for the injury done. This proposition cannot be controverted."

In the case at bar the appellant placed, in an open space on its land, its cars from which the oil leaked until it filled the ditches along the roadside. Here, the domestic animals of the townspeople were accustomed to stray and graze, and they were attracted to the pools of oil, and drank of it. This the employees of appellant saw and permitted for some days; and, although they saw that the owners of some of the animals, seeing this, drove them away, because they feared the oil would kill them, the appellant's employees made no effort to guard the cattle from the danger, or to drive away the animals of the other owners, but permitted them to drink the oil, amongst which was this cow of appellee's. The oil was a poison to the cattle when drunk in the quantities as was done by them; and appellee's cow was killed by the oil which it thus drank. Under these circumstances, we think that the appellant was guilty of negligence which rendered it liable for the death of the cow.

The instructions given by the court were in accord with this view of the case, and we find no error in the rulings of the court upon any of the declarations of law given or refused.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

ALEXANDER J. CARRICK, Appt.,
v.
JACOB JOACHIM.

(— La. —, 52 So. 173.)

Slander — vilification — right to damages.

Where one man (and he much the heavier of the two), without provocation, assaults another upon the street, and, in a voice which is heard half a square away, applies to him the vilest epithets in the English language, the injured party ought not to be denied such compensation for the wrong done him as money can afford.

Headnote by MONROE, J.

Note. — Libel and slander; applying vile epithets to man.

The question of slander and libel in charging woman with unchastity is treated in the note to Battles v. Tyson, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 577.

On the actionable character of epithets that impute immorality to a woman, see

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division B, in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged assault and slander. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Arthur J. Peters, for appellant:

A plaintiff who makes out a case of slander and abuse is entitled to substantial redress.

Simpson v. Robinson, 104 La. 180, 28 So. 908.

Mr. Meyer S. Dreifus for appellee.

Monroe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff demands damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the fact that defendant, on the morning of September 13, 1908, repeatedly applied to him vile epithets and struck him, all on the public street and in the presence of third persons.

Defendant pleaded the general denial, and added a reconventional demand, which latter has since been abandoned. The suit was dismissed by the trial judge, and plaintiff has appealed.

The case, disclosed by the testimony in the record, is as follows: Defendant is about forty-five years old and weighs over 200 pounds; he is, or was, engaged in the business of putting up electrical fixtures; and, having married plaintiff's sister, took plaintiff into his shop and kept him, off and on for some twelve or thirteen years, until he was about twenty-four years of age. During that period he sold plaintiff a house, the note to Feast v. Auer, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 560.

This note is confined to the use of those gross and vile epithets which inveigh against a man's genealogy, or which impute immorality to him personally. This, of course, means that cases turning upon the use of such words as "thief," "crook," or "scoundrel" are not included.

Not many cases have been found in which the question of the application of such epithets to a man has been considered. What judicial utterances there are on the question incline to the view that there is no right of action for the use of epithets, however vile, unless it appears that there was an intention to make a charge against the plaintiff, which, if made in language in itself unobjectionable, would have been defamatory. Indeed, it has been said that one who utters contumelious epithets does so in a state of mental excitement which negatives any intention to make a defamatory charge.

Thus, in Robertson v. Edelstein, 104 Wis. 440, 80 N. W. 724, the court said generally concerning the use of the words "son of a bitch," which, in that case, were applied to a woman, that such epithets are of that unreasonable, inaccurate, and unmeaning character which are usually found in a verbal assault made with the purpose of insulting the person addressed, and without the purpose of making any specific charge, and of evincing the exasperation and contempt of the person speaking. The court continued: "The whole manner and matter of the assault must, to the ordinary hearer, negative the idea that defendant meant to charge anything specific, or had any meaning or purpose other than to give vent to his own anger and to affront and hurt the feelings of the plaintiff. Exuberance of invective and meaningless epithet has often been recognized as cogent to refute a slanderous meaning in some of the words, which, if used deliberately and alone, would clearly charge crime. It evinces a heat of passion in some measure, at least, inconsistent with definiteness of meaning and choice of expressions."

The words, "you are a God damned, lying, thieving son of a bitch," were held upon demurrer, in Reynolds v. Ross, 42 Ind. 387, to be actionable because of the presence of the word "thieving," which charged the offense of stealing. Similar words were held in Bridgman v. Armer, 57 Mo. App. 528, not to be actionable, in the absence of a showing that they were not intended as mere abuse, but as a charge that the plaintiff was a thief. Language embracing such epithet has also been held not actionable, the courts laying little or no stress upon the use of the epithet. Such a case is Curtis v. Iseman (Ky.) 127 S. W. 150, where, in addition to such epithet, the defendant said: "I'll learn you how to steal a buggy whip." The same is true of the case of Johnson v. Brown, 4 Cranch, C. C. 235, Fed. Cas. No. 7,375, where such epithet was applied to a white man, together with the words, "yellow negro, villian, and liar."

Stating that one is a loafer and a pimp was held in Flatow v. Von Bremsen, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 125, 11 N. Y. Supp. 680, not to be actionable per se.

And it was held in Baxter v. Mohr, 37 Misc. 833, 76 N. Y. Supp. 982, that to call another a dirty drunken cur was not to impute moral turpitude, which is an element of actionability per se.

It was held in Robbins v. Treadway, 2 J. J. Marsh. 540, 19 Am. Dec. 152, where the exact language employed did not appear, that opprobrious epithets were not actionable.

The Ohio court held in Melvin v. Weiant, 36 Ohio St. 184, 38 Am. Rep. 572, that words of the most gross and scandalous character, imputing to another an act of sodomy, were not actionable without a showing of special damage, sodomy not having been declared a crime in that state.

The word "whoremaster" has been held, when applied to a married man, to impute the crime of adultery, and to be actionable per se. Georgia v. Kepford, 45 Iowa, 48.

and for the price plaintiff gave a note which was to mature on September 15, 1908; but there was a verbal agreement between them that plaintiff was to pay it in instalments of $3 a week, and those payments were made at defendant's shop, so long as plaintiff worked there. Plaintiff, however, left defendant's employ about April, 1908, after which the payments were made generally at defendant's house, every Sunday. On Sunday September 6, 1908, he failed to make the payment due that day, and on Sunday September 13th, he called with $6 to make both payments. Defendant happened, at the moment (say, between 9:30 o'clock and 11:30 o'clock in the morning), to be standing at the corner, near by, talking to a friend who called his attention to the fact that plaintiff was at his gate. He walked to the gate, and plaintiff handed him the $6 folded in a receipt which was prepared for his signature. According to his own testimony (which, in that respect, does not materially differ from that of plaintiff), he said to plaintiff: "It is a fine name you have made for yourself; your note was due on the 15th, and I want you to take it up." Plaintiff replied: "That was not the agreement you made with me verbally." Defendant, by way of rejoinder, said: "That is the agreement now." Or (as he testifies): "Agreement or no agreement, I don't want to have a d— thing to do with you any more; I am done with you forever,"—which was followed by a vile epithet and a blow, from the force of which, or in the effort to escape which, plaintiff stumbled and fell, and, in attempting to recover himself, was struck again, and defendant then made towards him with a piece of a shrub or young tree which plaintiff had broken in falling, and plaintiff went to the other side of the street and got out of his way. A little later plaintiff returned to get his receipt, which defendant gave him, and plaintiff then walked off, but, as it appears, turned his head and looked back, when defendant again, as he had several times before, applied vile epithets to him, and told him not to look back. Defendant's version of the matter is that, when he told plaintiff that he wanted him to pay his note on the 15th, whether it had been previously so agreed or not, plaintiff struck at and applied an epithet to him, and that it was then that he struck him,—admitting that he struck plaintiff twice,—and that he once used an epithet attributed to him. His version is overborne by the testimony of four witnesses who saw him striking plaintiff, and heard him repeatedly using language towards plaintiff which is not generally heard in polite society, but which, on that occasion, was heard by witnesses who were as much as 175 feet distant. Several witnesses were introduced on behalf of defendant, who testified to some things that had happened while plaintiff was in defendant's employ,—going back as much as three years. Other witnesses testified that plaintiff had said things about defendant which they had repeated to him; but as defendant himself does not attempt to justify his assault and bad language by saying that those were the things which irritated him, and as plaintiff had been calling at his house and paying him $3 every Sunday for six months or more, the cause of his sudden outbreak remains unexplained.

In such cases, the injured party can choose between submitting to a wrong, resenting it by force and violence, resorting to a criminal prosecution, or, as plaintiff has done, appealing to a civil court for redress.

If, in pursuing such course, he should obtain no redress, he might very well conclude that the law expects him to redress his own grievances in his own way. Whilst, therefore, we agree with our learned brother of the district court that, in the case of an ordinary street brawl in which the parties are equally to blame, neither should be allowed to recover damages, we are decidedly of the opinion that where, as in this case, one man (and he much the heavier of the two), without provocation, assaults another upon the street, and applies to him, in a tone that can be heard more than half a square away, the vilest epithets in the English language, the injured party ought not to be denied such compensation for the wrong done him as money can afford. Plaintiff is not shown to have suffered physically from the blows received by him, but he is entitled to damages for the indignity and for the slander, and we fix the amount at $300. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that there now be judgment in favor of plaintiff, Alexander J. Carrick, and against the defendant, Jacob Joachim, in the sum of $300, with legal interest thereon from the date at which this judgment shall become final until paid, together with all costs.

Provosty, J., thinks the judgment should be for $500 at least.

ARIZONA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN CONCHIN, Appt.,
v.
EL PASO & SOUTHWESTERN RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

(— Ariz. —, 108 Pac. 260.)

Master — watchman — liability for acts.

1. A person employed to watch premises and turn over to a police officer any person whom he believes to be committing a crime against the property acts within the scope of his employment in firing at a fleeing trespasser to compel him to halt.

Same — wanton injury.

2. A watchman is guilty of wantonness which will render his master liable for the consequences of his act, in firing in the night at a technical trespasser upon the master's property, who is retreating to avoid arrest or assault, although he did not intend to hit him, but only to halt or frighten him.

Negligence — fleeing trespasser — disobeying order to halt.

3. A technical trespasser on the property of a railroad company is not guilty of contributory negligence in running when told by a watchman to stop, which will prevent his holding the railroad company liable for the injury in case he is hit by a bullet.

For the earlier cases on this question, see the note accompanying Milton v. Missouri P. R. Co. 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 282. Only the cases since decided are included here.

A master is liable for the acts of his servant employed to keep off trespassers, in assaulting another, if the acts of the servant are committed in the course of his duty to put off the trespasser, even though the assault was wanton or vindictive. *Schmidt v. The owner of an island is responsible for the result of an act of his caretaker in casting off the moorings of a vessel which had sought refuge at the wharf in a storm, although he was not expressly instructed to do so; and it is immaterial whether the act was done carelessly or wilfully, if it was not done to serve some purpose of the caretaker. Ploof v. Putnam (Vt.) 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 251, 75 Atl. 277.

A master was held liable for the acts of a servant in Johnston v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. Co. 130 Wis. 492, 110 N. W. 424, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Anything done by the watchman in the course of the employment, even though he exceeded his authority, was the act of the company, binding it in damages for its negligent performance.

where the servant in question was a watchman with authority to investigate past offenses. He assaulted and imprisoned the plaintiff for the sole purpose of obtaining information as to whether the latter had been guilty of throwing sticks at passenger cars, and the court said that the servant was performing his duty in his own way, and, although the methods employed were unlawful and unauthorized, they were within the scope of his duty, and were therefore the acts of his master.

It was held in New Ellerslie Fishing Club v. Stewart, 123 Ky. 8, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 475, 93 S. It was said in this case that when a servant begins a quarrel while acting within the scope of his agency, and immediately follows it up by a violent assault, the master will be liable, as the law under the circumstances will not undertake to say when, in the course of the assault, he ceased to act as agent, and acted upon his own responsibility. Candiff v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. 42 La. Ann. 477, 7 So. 601; Magar v. Hammond, supra.

Doe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff (here appellant) brought his action seeking to recover damages from the defendant for injuries inflicted by a watchman in its employ. In the first cause of action plaintiff, in substance, alleges that the defendant employed one Stafford as watchman of all its property at certain railroad yards on its line of road, to guard its said property from depredations, to apprehend and turn over to a peace officer for arrest all persons who he believed had committed or attempted to commit any depredation upon its said property, to ascertain the identity of, and to keep off and frighten away from said premises and property, all persons acting in a suspicious manner; and armed him with a revolver to carry out his said employment. That plaintiff, about 3 o'clock in the morning, while passing the place where Stafford was stationed as such watchman, in a peaceable manner, and without having committed or intending to commit any depredation upon its property, was fired upon by Stafford, who called to him to halt, but that plaintiff, being frightened, ran. That Stafford continued to fire towards him, and hit him in the knee, but that Stafford did not intend to hit, but only to frighten him. For a second cause of action, in addition to the foregoing matters, plaintiff alleges that Stafford was, at the time, a deputy sheriff, but does not allege that he was acting in such a capacity at the time of the acts complained of. Defendant filed general demurrers which were sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was rendered for defendant, and from said judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal. His only assignment of error is predicated ing his property, in shooting at a poacher thereon, if the act was within the general scope of the servant's employment, and was done with a view to the furtherance of the master's business, although it was wilful, wanton, or reckless. Whether or not such an act of a servant was within the scope of his employment is a question for the jury. Magar v. Hammond, 183 N. Y. 387, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1038, 76 N. E. 474.

The mere employment of a watchman to guard property does not authorize him to shoot a person who has entered the property to get warm, and who, under the watchman's order to leave the property, is running away therefrom, so as to render the employer liable for the act; but one who employs a watchman, and authorizes him to carry firearms and use them whenever in his judgment it seems necessary or advisable for him to do so, cannot be absolved from liability for such use merely because the injured person was not on, but near, the property when shot, when the watchman adjudged that he was doing or attempting wrong, and that it was necessary to fire to protect the property. Robards v. P. Bannon Sewer Pipe Co. 130 Ky. 380, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 923, 132 Am. St. Rep. 394, 113 S. W. 429.

as a special secret service agent, to look after criminal matters, such as stealing from the cars or stations, and other trouble about the station, who has no authority to make arrests, acts beyond the scope of his employment in arresting one engaged in an altercation with a switchman, and the company is not liable therefor. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Wyatt, 84 Ark. 193, 105 S. W. 72.

When a railroad watchman, as a part of his duty, questioned one who was removing freight as to his right to do so, and, being apparently satisfied, allowed the removal, no liability attaches to the railroad company for the act of the watchman in shooting the freight handler later on and at a different place, as a result of a further dispute over the freight. Hidalgo v. Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 128 S. W. 683.

See also the dictum in Kehoe v. Marshall Field & Co. 141 Ill. App. 140, to the effect that a person employed to do general detective work acts beyond the scope of his authority in arresting persons charged or suspected of committing criminal acts.

As to the liability of private persons or corporations for the acts of special police officers appointed by public authority, see the note to McKain v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 289.

The question presented by this appeal may most conveniently be determined by a consideration of the propositions advanced by appellee in support of its demurrers, and in the order stated; the same being: First. That the acts complained of were without the scope of the watchman's employment. Second. That the complaint was fatally defective in failing to negative that the plaintiff was a trespasser, the injuries having been inflicted upon the premises of the defendant, and the action based upon mere negligence. Third. That the plaintiff being a trespasser, to whom the defendant owed no duty except not to wantonly or wilfully inflict injury upon him, the complaint is defective, in that it fails to charge wanton or wilful injury, and alleges mere negligence on the part of the defendant. Fourth. That by running away instead of stopping when challenged, plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent recovery.

While plaintiff's allegations that the acts complained of were within the scope of Stafford's employment are mere conclusions and to be treated as surplusage, yet all allegations of fact contained in the complaint which are properly pleaded must, for the purpose of this case, be treated as true. It is alleged in the complaint that Stafford was employed as a watchman to protect the defendant's premises and property from depredation, to ascertain the identity of persons who might commit or attempt to commit such depredation, "to apprehend and turn over to a peace officer for arrest all persons who he had reason to believe or did believe had committed or attempted to commit any crime against the property," to keep off and frighten away from the property all persons acting in a suspicious manner, and "that said Stafford was armed by defendant with a revolver to carry out his said employment."

The words, "within the scope of his employment," as applied to the liability of a master for the wrongful acts of his servant, are probably not susceptible of any satisfactory definition of general application; each case must be determined by the particular facts and circumstances surrounding it. Before the master can be held liable for the negligence or wrongful act of his servant, it must appear that the servant was engaged at the time in performance of the duties of his employment, and if so engaged, and the wrongful act was performed in connection with such duties and in apparent furtherance of their accomplishment, the master will be liable, even though the act be in excess of the authority conferred by him, or in violation of his express directions, provided, however, that it is not done in furtherance alone of the personal desires or ends of the servant.

The intent with which an act is done affords a more reliable test as to whether it is within the scope of the servant's employment than do the methods of its accomplishment. The nature of Stafford's employment carries with it an implied authority to use force when necessary. "And even where the master owes no duty to the person injured, the authority to use force may be implied from the nature of the employment so as to render the master liable, even though the servant goes beyond the necessity of the situation and uses more force than necessary. For instance, the authority to use force is ordinarily implied where the employee is a watchman or doorkeeper." 28 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1541. In Rogahn v. Moore Mfg. & Foundry Co. 79 Wis. 573, 48 N. W. 669, the court says: "Where the servant is authorized to use force against another when necessary in executing his master's orders, or in conducting the business intrusted to him, the master commits it to him to decide what degree of force he shall use, and if, through misjudgment or violence of temper, the servant goes beyond the necessity of the occasion, and gives a right of action to another, he cannot be said, as to third persons, to have been acting beyond the line of his duty, or to have departed from his master's business." The New York court of appeals has said: "It is in general sufficient to make the master responsible that he gave to the servant an authority, or made it his duty, to act in respect to the business in which he was engaged when the wrong was committed, and that the act complained of was done in the course of his employment. The master in that case will be deemed to have consented to and authorized the act of the servant, and he will not be excused from liability, although the servant abused his authority, or was reckless in the performance of his duty, or inflicted an unnecessary injury in executing his master's orders." Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597.

Applying the foregoing tests to the facts alleged in the complaint, it seems clear that Stafford was not acting independently, but strictly within the scope of his employment.

Counsel for appellee, in his second proposition, assumes that the complaint is based upon simple negligence. If this assumption be true, the complaint is fatally defective in failing to show any right or license for plaintiff's presence upon the defendant's premises, for clearly the defendant would not be liable to a trespasser for injuries due to its mere negligence. The plaintiff, however, could, at most, have been a trespasser, to whom the defendant would be liable for wilful or wanton injury, which brings us to a consideration of appellee's third proposition.

In many cases the words "wilful" and "wanton" are treated as synonymous, and, in those cases where an attempt has been made to distinguish them, it has usually been with reference only to the facts of the particular case. An act is "wilful" where the resulting injury is intentional or the natural and probable consequence of the act. The word "wanton" is, we think, more comprehensive than "wilful." To constitute "wantonness," it is not essential that the injury should have been intentional or the probable consequence of the wrongful act; it is sufficient that the act indicates a reckless disregard of the rights of others, a reckless indifference to results, or that the injury is the likely, and not improbable, result of the wrongful act. The word "likely" is here used in the sense of something more than possible, and less than probable. "Wantonly. Done in a licentious spirit, perversely, recklessly, without regard to propriety or the rights of others; careless of consequences, and yet without settled malice." 2 Bouvier's Law Dict. 1207.

The complaint expressly negatives any intent to inflict injury, and consequently eliminates the element of wilfulness from our consideration. It only remains to consider whether the pleader has negated wantonness as well. We think he has fallen a little short of so doing. Stafford had no right to arrest the plaintiff under the circumstances alleged in the complaint. Crim. Code, chap. 3, title 5 (Rev. Stat. 1901). The injury is alleged to have been inflicted in the night while the plaintiff was, at most, a mere technical trespasser upon defendant's right of way, and was guiltless of the commission or intent to commit any crime, and while he was retreating to avoid apprehension or arrest, or, as he may well have thought, a felonious assault. In firing towards and near the plaintiff while he was running, and in the nighttime, though without intending to hit him, but only intending to try to halt or frighten him away, Stafford must have known that injury was the not improbable but likely result of his wrongful act, and displayed a reckless disregard of the rights of plaintiff and a disregard of and indifference to results constituting wantonness.

Appellee's fourth proposition is obviously without merit. There is nothing in the complaint from which a duty on the part of plaintiff to halt may be implied.

Plaintiff, in his second cause of action, alleges that Stafford was a deputy sheriff: but the facts stated do not indicate that he acted in such capacity, but clearly show that, at the time of the injury, he was acting in the capacity of watchman.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Appt.,

v.

THOMAS P. HESS et al.

(35 App. D. C. 38.)

Eminent domain — dismissal of proceedings — verdict.

A municipal corporation may dismiss proceedings to condemn land for a street after a verdict assessing damages for the land taken, if the benefits assessed did not equal the damages awarded as required by statute, so that the right of the property owner has not become complete and no process remains by which the verdict can be corrected.

Note. — Right of condemning party to dismiss condemnation proceedings after award or verdict and before confirmation or judgment.

This note is confined strictly to the question of the right to dismiss condemnation proceedings after an award or verdict has been returned, and before the confirmation of the award or the entry of judgment on the verdict. And the question as to the terms upon which such proceedings may be dismissed is not within the scope of the note.

In the absence of statutory provisions expressly regulating the stage at which the condemning party may dismiss or abandon condemnation proceedings, and where the acts authorizing such proceedings do not contemplate the passing of title before confirmation or judgment, it is generally held that prior to confirmation or judgment, the proceedings may be dismissed although there has been an award or verdict returned.

This result was reached in the following cases, where there had been no confirmation of the award or judgment on the verdict: Lamb v. Schottler, 54 Cal. 319; Denver & N. O. R. Co. v. Lamborn, 8 Colo. 380, 8 Pac. 582; Chicago v. Goodwillie, 208 Ill. 252, 70 N. E. 228; Kadish v. Chicago (Ill.) 6 N. E. 467; Hyde Park v. Dunham, 85 Ill. 569; Elkhart v. Simonton, 71 Ind. 7; Hunting v. Curtis, 10 Iowa, 152; Klopp v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 142 Iowa, 474, 119 N. W. 373; State ex rel. Hiatt v. Keokuk, 9 Iowa, 438; Hastings v. B. & M. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 316; Corbin v. Cedar Rapids, I. F. &

A PPEAL by the District of Columbia from a judgment of the Supreme Court vacating an order of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia dismissing a certain condemnation proceeding. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward H. Thomas and James Francis Smith, for appellant:

The commissioners had the right to abandon or discontinue the proceeding before the confirmation of the verdict.

Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 655, 656; O'Neill v. Hudson County, 41 N. J. L. 161; Nichols, Em. Dom. §§ 337, 338.

Mr. George C. Gertman for appellees.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from a judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia vacating an order of dismissal filed by the District after verdict and before confirmation there-

Co. 1 Phila. 262; Stevens v. Duck River Nav. Co. 1 Sneed, 237.

This rule was also applied in the following New York cases: Washington Park v. Barnes, 2 Thomp. & C. 637; Re New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 38 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 470; People ex rel. Dikeman v. But it has been held in New York that the right to dismiss after award or verdict was discretionary with the court. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. v. Thorne, 1 How. Pr. N. S. 190; Re Waverly Water Works Co. 85 N. Y. 478; Re White Plains, 65 App. Div. 417, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1026.

And where commissioners had been appointed, and they had reported, and their report had been set aside and new commissioners appointed, an application to discontinue the proceedings was refused, the court holding that it was given no power to grant such application, and that the power ought not to be exercised if it existed, since the plan first proposed had been relied upon by person purchasing lots with reference thereto. Re Beekman Street, 20 Johns. 269.

In New Jersey it is held that where lands are to be taken for public use, the public authorities have a reasonable time after the award of damages, in which to decide whether to accept the property or dismiss the proceedings. O'Neill v. Hudson County, 41 N. J. L. 161; State ex rel. Mabon v. Halsted, 39 N. J. L. 640; Re Jersey City Water Comrs. 31 N. J. L. 72, 86 Am. Dec. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

199. In the first two of these cases there was no provision for confirmation, but an opportunity to appeal was given before the vesting of title.

And in State ex rel. Rogers v. Hug, 44 Mo. 116, the city was held authorized to abandon proceedings to condemn land for a street after the assessment of damages, no provision being made for the rendition of a judgment or confirmation, it being merely declared that the property should not be taken until the damages are paid.

The right to dismiss in many cases is governed by express statutory or charter provisions.

Thus, in Brokaw v. Terre Haute, 97 Ind. 451, where a statute, on payment of costs, etc., gave a city a right to discontinue proceedings if, upon appeal, the report of the commissioners was greatly increased, it was held in that event to have power to discontinue after verdict and before judgment, although it had taken possession of the property.

And commissioners of highways were held authorized to annul proceedings for locating a road after the damages had been agreed upon by the landowners and supervisors, where the statute provided that the commissioners should revoke such proceedings if they regarded the damages as too high. People ex rel. Foos v. Highway Comrs. 88 Ill. 141.

And under a statute providing that any proceeding to condemn land might be abandoned within twenty days after the filing of the report of the commissioners, it is held that the proposed condemnation may be abandoned, although an appeal from the award of the commissioners is made. Walsh v. Board of Education, 73 N. J. L. 643, 64 Atl. 1088.

So, the charter of St. Louis permits the city in a proceeding to condemn land for a street, to discontinue at any time before the final confirmation of the report of the commissioners. St. Louis Brewing Asso. v. St. Louis, 168 Mo. 37, 67 S. W. 563.

The Missouri statute authorizing telegraph, telephone, gravel, and plank, and railroad companies to condemn land, provides that the assessment of damages may be enforced by execution unless the company, within ten days from the return of the assessment, elect to abandon the proposed appropriation. This act is construed to give the condemning party a right to abandon the proceedings within ten days from the original assessment, or, if a new of, in condemnation proceedings, overruling the motion of the District to dismiss said proceedings, and confirming said verdict.

By the act of February 27, 1907 (34 Stat. at L. 1001, chap. 2076), the commissioners of the District were authorized and directed to institute proceedings to condemn land necessary for the extension of T street from Thirty-fifth street to Wisconsin avenue, and from Wisconsin avenue to the east side of proposed Rock Creek drive, said proceedings to be in accordance with the provisions of §§ 491a to 491n, both inclusive, of an act amending the Code (34 Stat. at L. 151, chap. 2070). It was further provided "that, . . . the [total] amount found to be due and awarded as damages, . . . plus the cost and expenses of the proceeding, . . . shall be assessed by the jury as benefits."

On April 27, 1907, pursuant to the authority thus conferred, the commissioners assessment is allowed, ten days thereafter. State ex rel. Hilleman v. Fort, 180 Mo. 97, 79 S. W. 167.

Under § 1000 of the charter of New York, the board of estimate and apportionment has power to discontinue proceedings for opening streets at any time before the title passes, and it is held that proceedings may be dismissed prior to the date set by the board for the vesting of title. Re New York City, 127 App. Div. 650, 111 N. Y. Supp. 895; Simpson v. Berkowitz, 59 Misc. 160, 110 N. Y. Supp. 485.

In Re Casacaloo & M. Streets, 20 La. Ann. 497, where the statute gave persons interested the right to continue to object to the successive reports of the commissioners, until such reports were made as the court would confirm, it was held that no part of the report was binding on the city proposing to open a street until it was confirmed by the court, although the person whose land was to be taken expressed satisfaction with the price fixed by the appraisers.

Where park commissioners are given the right by statute, at any time before final confirmation of the report of appraisers in condemnation proceedings, to withdraw such proceedings upon payment of costs, the board is held entitled to notice and an opportunity to withdraw its proceedings after an order increasing the award, and it cannot be deprived of this right by the immediate confirmation by the court of the increased award. Duluth v. Lindberg, 70 Minn. 132, 72 N. W. 967.

Where a statute is express that no title shall pass until payment or deposit of the amount ordered by the commissioners, the party condemning may abandon after the assessment of damages, although it is provided that the amount assessed shall become conclusive after the expiration for the time for appeal. Stacey v. Vermont C. R. Co. 27 Vt. 38.

But it has been held that condemnation proceedings cannot be dismissed after award or verdict.

Thus, in Pollard v. Moore, 51 N. H. 188, where a proceeding was brought by mill owners to condemn land under an act passed for the encouragement of manufacturing, it was held that, after the damages had been assessed, the petitioners could not become nonsuit. The court said: "The plaintiffs in this case have undertaken to invoke the aid of a statute thus made for their benefit; have summoned the defendants into court to have their damages appraised; they have come in, and their case has been sent to a committee who have heard the same and made report; and now, because the damages have been assessed perhaps a little higher than the plaintiffs anticipated, shall they have leave to withdraw and leave the defendants without payment of their damages, or without any valid assessment of them, but to await the uncertain pleasure of the plaintiffs, to have their lands flowed without the right to object, until other proceedings shall be instituted and another assessment of damages be made? A plaintiff has the right, it is said, to become nonsuit during certain stages of the proceedings; but he has not that right after a verdict is returned in his case. . . . So, after a reference of a cause to arbitrators by rule of court, the plaintiff cannot rescind the rule or revoke the submission, nor can he become nonsuit, or discontinue his action."

And it was held in Crume v. Wilson, 104 Ind. 583, 4 N. E. 169, that after the filing of the commissioner's report and the lapse of the time for appeal, the cause was ready for judgment, and the petitioner could not have it dismissed.

So, in Beale v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 86 Pa. 509, it was held that after a railroad had made a location on land, and damages had been assessed, it was too late to interpose an exception that it had subsequently adopted a new line on the same land.

This case is distinguished in other Pennsylvania cases where the condemning party is a public corporation, on the ground that in the Beale Case the party condemning was a private corporation.

And where the statute indicates that the filing of the report of the commissioners making an award of damages shall be in effect a judgment fixing the rights of the parties, the proceeding cannot be dismissed against the protests of the landowner. Sprague v. Northern P. R. Co. 122 Wis. 509, 106 Am. St. Rep. 997, 100 N. W. 842; Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co. v. Stolze, 101 Wis. 91, 76 N. W. 1113.

And where the city charter did not provide for any confirmation, but gave a right to appeal within ten days after the report awarding damages, and it was provided that, if no appeal was taken, the common council should direct the commissioners to assess the amount as damages, the proceedings cannot be discontinued after the time for appeal has expired. People ex rel. Gaslight Co. v. Syracuse, 78 N. Y. 56.

instituted condemnation proceedings. A jury was regularly summoned, and in due course, on November 27, 1908, returned a verdict awarding $31,287.06 damages for the land taken, and assessing as benefits against the land within the assessment zone the sum of $26,806.14. No objections or exceptions were filed to this verdict, and on January 5, 1909, the District filed an order dismissing said proceeding. Thereafter, on January 9, 1909, Thomas P. Hess, who had been awarded $2,125 damages, and who had been assessed nothing on account of benefits, filed a motion to vacate and quash said order of January 5th dismissing said proceeding, which motion the court granted over the objection and exception of the District. Thereupon, on February 8th, the District formally moved the dismissal of said proceedings upon the grounds "that the entire amount of the damages awarded herein, plus the cost and expenses of the proceeding, have not been assessed as benefits, as provided for in and by the act of Congress under which this proceeding has been instituted," and "that, as no objections or exceptions have been taken to the verdict of the jury herein filed within the time prescribed by the statute, the court is without jurisdiction to order a new jury herein, and that therefore further proceedings under the aforesaid act of Congress and of the Code are impossible." This motion was overruled, and a final order was passed ratifying and confirming the verdict of the jury as a whole. This appeal followed.

A proceeding to condemn property for public use is not in the nature of a contract between the owner and the condemning party, and, until the property is actually taken and compensation is made or provided, the power of the condemning party over the matter is not exhausted. Garrison v. New York, 21 Wall. 196, 22 L. ed. 612; District of Columbia v. Prospect Hill Cemetery, 5 App. D. C. 497; Ross v. United States, 8 App. D. C. 32. Accordingly it is a rule of almost universal application that, in the absence of any statutory provision showing a legislative intent to the contrary, condemnation proceedings may be discontinued by the condemning party at any time before the right of the property owner has become complete. Manion v. Louisville, St. L. & T. R. Co. 90 Ky. 491, 14 S. W. 532; Simpson v. Kansas City, 111 Mo. 237, 20 S. W. 38; O'Neill v. Hudson County, 41 N. J. L. 161; Nichols, Em. Dom. §§ 337, 338.

In the present case the District, for reasons satisfactory to itself, failed to take advantage of § 491h of said act amending the Code, which authorized the court, within twenty-one days after verdict, to hear and determine objections or exceptions thereto and to set the same aside, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, in which event a new jury is summoned. When, therefore, the order of dismissal was filed, the proceedings had resulted in a verdict which failed to satisfy the requirements of the law. In such a situation the District was, we think, fully justified in filing its notice of abandonment.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

CATHERINE WERNER et al., Appts.,

LOUIS T. CLARK, Assignee.

(108 Md. 627, 71 Atl. 305.)

Mortgage — resale — objection — mortgagor.

The confirmation of a sale under a power contained in a mortgage does not so far deplete the interest of the mortgagor as to deprive him of the right to except to the confirmation of a resale in case the first bidder defaults, and the property is resold at his risk at an amount considerably less than the first bid.

(November 14, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree in equity of the Circuit Court for Howard

Note. — No cases other than those set out in the opinion of the principal case have been found in which the confirmation of the first sale has been relied on to deprive the former owner of the property of the right to object to confirmation of a resale made after default of purchaser of first sale.

In Watkins v. Jones, 107 Va. 6, 57 S. E. 608, where land was sold at judicial sale for $2,175, and resold for $2,100 after confirmation of the first sale, because of default of the purchaser, it was held error to refuse to confirm the second sale, though one of the defendants, a half owner of the property, offered to pay $300 more for the property. It appeared that the terms of the sale had been complied with in all respects, that confirmation of the sale was recommended by the commissioners who reported the sale to the court, and that the defendant had attended both sales. The right of the owner to object to the second confirmation, however, was not questioned in that case, but the case was disposed of on the ground that, as the price bid at the second sale was a fair one, the court should refrain from setting aside judicial sales, so as not to discourage bidders, but to inspire confidence in the stability of such sales.

Messrs. Edgar H. Ganis, and Joseph L. Donovan, for appellants.

Mr. Louis T. Clark, for appellee:

The mortgagors had no right to except to the resale, as, by the final order of ratification passed at the mortgage sale, their interest in the mortgaged property terminated.

Dorsett*, 45 Md. 462; Brundige v. Morrison, 56 Md. 407; Griffith v. Hammond, 45 Md. 85.

Pearce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court for Howard county, sitting as a court of equity, ratifying a sale of mortgaged premises made under powers of sale contained in two mortgages.

The record discloses the following facts: The property in question was the property of one Charles J. Werner, deceased. After his death, intestate, his widow and six children, on April 20, 1894, united in the execution of a mortgage upon a tract of land in Howard county, to Gabriella Mackubin, to secure a loan to them of $1,200, payable one year after date with interest. On October 6, 1902, the same parties, together with Louis Werner and Ethel Werner, united in the execution of another mortgage upon the same tract of land, and also upon another tract in Baltimore county, with the German Building Association of Howard county, a body corporate, to secure a loan to them of $1,000, payable one year after date with interest, and these two mortgages were subsequently duly assigned to the appellee, Louis T. Clark, for foreclosure, after default made thereunder. On September 10, 1907, the appellee filed copies of these two mortgages, together with a bond, as required by law, and advertised both said tracts of land for sale under the powers contained therein, but actually sold only the tract in Howard county. His report of sale, filed December 20, 1907, shows that he sold this tract on December 18, 1907, to Miss Catherine Werner for $3,850, who "elected to pay all cash on final ratification of sale, and gave satisfactory assurances of her compliance." The report also set forth that the proceeds of this sale would be more than sufficient to satisfy both mortgages, and that for this reason the appellee did not offer the other tract for sale. The usual order nisi was published, and on February 1, 1908, this sale was finally ratified and confirmed. On February 24, 1908, the appellee filed a petition alleging that the purchaser, Miss Catherine Werner, had failed to comply with the purchase and found herself unable to do so, and he prayed for an order upon her "to show cause why an order should not be passed setting aside said sale, and directing an order of resale of said property at the risk of said purchaser." On the same day, the court passed an order requiring "Catherine Werner to show cause on or before March 11, 1908, why said sale made in the above-entitled cause should not be set aside, and a resale ordered at her risk," provided a copy of said petition and order be served on her on or before February 27, 1908. She failed to show cause as required, and on March 20, 1908, in due course of law, an order was passed "that the property mentioned in this cause, and sold by the petitioner, be resold by the said petitioner, Louis T. Clark, assignee, plaintiff in the above-entitled cause, for the payment of the purchase money thereof, viz., $3,850, as reported in the report of sale filed December 20, 1907, etc., and it is further ordered that said resale be made at the risk of the said Catherine Werner." It will be observed here that this order did not, in terms, provide that said sale should be set aside as prayed in the petition, and as provided in the order to show cause. On April 24, 1908, the appellee filed a report setting forth that, in pursuance of said order of resale, he did, after due notice and advertisement, offer said property at public sale on April 21, 1908, and sold the same to John G. Rogers for $2,800, and that said sale was made at the risk of the former purchaser, Miss Catherine Werner. The usual order nisi was again published, and on May 22, 1908, the day before the expiration of this order, two of the mortgagors in each of the two mortgages, Augustus H. and Frederick A. Werner, filed ten exceptions to the ratification of this sale. On May 29, 1908, the appellee filed a motion to dismiss these exceptions, and that a day be set for the hearing, and on the same day the court set the motion down to be heard on June 4, 1908, after notice to the exceptants. The motion does not state the ground on which it was based, nor does the record disclose the ground, nor whether any hearing was had; but the appellee in his brief states that "this was upon the theory that the exceptants had no standing in court in the proceeding relating to the resale," and there could be no other rational ground for declining to hear the exceptions. On June 4, 1908, an order was passed "that motion to dismiss be sustained, and exceptants be dismissed" and on the same day the resale was finally ratified and confirmed. The appeal was taken "from the order of court dated June 4, 1908." The two orders of that date, though separately signed, cover but one transaction, and might properly have been made effective by one signing, as they were evidently concurrent in execution. The appeal will therefore be treated as taken from both orders.

The narrow question thus presented is well stated in the appellants' brief in these words: "When property has been sold under a power in a mortgage, and the purchaser fails to comply with the terms of sale, and a resale of the property is ordered and made, has the mortgagor any standing in court to except to the ratification of the resale?" It is conceded in the brief of the appellee, and could not reasonably have been denied, that Miss Catherine Werner, as the defaulting purchaser, might have excepted to the ratification of the resale, though she was one of the mortgagors; but she did not except. Therefore the concrete facts, as hereinbefore recited, are accurately embraced in the question framed by the appellants' counsel, which must be taken as implying that the excepting purchaser is not one of several mortgagors, who, if the sale to him were ratified, would acquire the interest of the other mortgagors in the property. The appellee rests his case wholly upon the proposition that the effect of the ratification of the original sale was to divest absolutely the title of the mortgagors, and to vest a complete equitable title in the defaulting purchaser, and that upon ratification alone, without more, "the mortgaged real estate became personal property, and the mortgagors' rights and interest in the former were transferred to the fund arising from the ratified mortgage sale." It has certainly never been expressly so decided in this state, and we do not think it could be so held consistently with our decisions involving this question.

Dalrymple v. Taneyhill, 4 Md. Ch. 171, decided in 1853, appears to be the earliest case decided after the passage of the act of 1841, now § 209 of art. 16 of the Code, declaring the authority of the court to compel purchasers under a decree to comply with all the terms of sale, by process of attachment or other execution suited to the case, or to direct a resale at the risk of the purchaser. In that case, land belonging to an infant had been sold under a decree for that purpose, and the sale had been ratified. The purchaser having utterly failed to comply with the terms of sale, a resale was ordered at his risk. The infant died October 4, 1852, and on the 12th of the same month the property was resold, and that sale was ratified. The controversy in the case was over the proceeds of this resale. The infant's personal representative claiming the proceeds as personal property, while her heir at law claimed them as real estate; the question being whether there had been a conversion from real to personal estate at the original sale, during the life of the infant. Chancellor Johnson held there had been no conversion, and that the proceeds of sale, though actually money, were in legal contemplation real estate, and went to the heir at law. He supported this conclusion by reference to the cases of State use of Rogers v. Krebs, 6 Harr. & J. 31; Leadenham v. Nicholson, 1 Harr. & G. 267; and Hammond v. Stier, 2 Gill & J. 81, in which, as he says: "It was held, upon great deliberation," that "the mutation of real into personal estate was complete when the sale was ratified by the court, and the purchaser has complied with the terms of it by paying the money, if the sale is for cash, or by giving bonds if the sale is on credit," and the chancellor adds: "No case can be found in which it has been held or intimated that the concurrence of all these circumstances is not necessary to effect the change." The appellee cites the case of Early v. Dorsett, 45 Md. 462, in support of his contention above; but we do not so understand that decision. Judge Miller, in the opinion in that case, expressly says: "It has been the settled law of this state since the case of Leadenham v. Nicholson, supra, that, where land is sold under a decree like the present, the mutation from realty to personalty is complete when the sale is ratified and the purchaser has complied with the terms of sale as prescribed by the decree." The decree in that case was for sale of real estate devised by will for distribution among the devisees. One of the devisees became the purchaser, and he paid the cash instalment and gave bonds with security for the credit payments as prescribed by the decree. While in possession, but before payment in full of the purchase money or obtaining a deed from the trustee, he mortgaged the land to Early. He subsequently defaulted in his payments, and the property was resold at his risk. The auditor stated several accounts distributing the proceeds of resale, in one of which accounts the original purchaser's share was applied to Early's mortgage, and in another to certain persons to whom he had subsequently assigned his share. There was no account showing any distribution of the original purchase money. The court held that, if the sum in controversy represented exclusively purchase money under the original sale, it could not be applied to the mortgage, and should be applied to the assignments, and as it did not appear from the record whether any part of the sum in controversy was the surplus proceeds of the resale, over and above what was necessary to pay principal, interest, and costs due on the original sale, and costs of resale, the case was remanded to determine that fact. The court said Early, "in respect to his mortgage, occupies substantially the same position as if he had taken a mortgage of real property, subject to a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, and the land had been afterwards sold under a bill to enforce that lien. In such case, if the property does not sell for enough, or only for enough, to pay the lien, the mortgagee gets nothing; if it sells for more, he gets the surplus." It is apparent, from the above examination of Early v. Dorsett, supra, that it does not sustain the proposition of the appellee.

Recurring again to the case of Dalrymple v. Taneyhill, the observations of the chancellor are so pertinent to the case before us that we may profitably quote further from that case. He said: "The argument pressed now is that one of the circumstances, and that a very important one, which the court of appeals say is necessary to work the mutation from real to personal estate, may be dispensed with; that the sale, and the confirmation of the sale by the court, are sufficient for the purpose, though the purchaser may have neglected to comply with the terms, either by paying the money, or giving the bonds, though the appellate court have said, when the question was, what combination of circumstances shall change the nature of real, and impress upon it the character of personal, estate, that a compliance by the purchaser with the terms is necessary. If the purchaser does not comply with the terms of sale, the thing which is the equivalent for the real estate sold does not exist, and may never exist. The land would be gone, or its nature changed, and neither money, nor security for the money to be paid for it, brought into existence. . . . If real estate is converted into personality, . . . it should be into something tangible and substantial, and the mere bid of an irresponsible man, though that bid may have been accepted by the court, cannot be permitted to have such an effect. The Acts of 1841, chap. 216, under which the proceeding for a resale was had, gives no countenance to the idea that a noncomplying purchaser is regarded as the owner of the estate sold by a trustee. It authorizes a resale of the property at his risk, but not as his property. On the contrary, the order which the court is authorized to pass by this act, and the order which was in fact passed in this case, is a revocation of the order confirming the sale, and destroys any inchoate title which the first purchaser may have acquired by the confirmation."

We cannot discover that this clear and emphatic language of the chancellor has ever been questioned or criticized in any decision of this court, nor do we think it can be said that the principle announced by him has been disapproved in any such decision. It is true that in Mealey v. Page, 41 Md. 183, 184, the court said: "The property was sold as that of the original purchaser, and at his risk, he being entitled to any excess in the proceeds of sale over and above the costs and expenses of the resale, the commissions on the amount of the proceeds thereof, and the amount of the purchase money due on former sale." But the last clause of the sentence just quoted, which we have underlined, shows conclusively that the distinguished judge who wrote that opinion did not mean to be understood as saying that the defaulting purchaser was to be regarded as the owner of the property, but that he meant that in any event the proceeds of the resale, after payment of costs and commissions properly allowable, were to be applied to the amount of the purchase money due on the former sale, without regard to whom such amount was due. In other words, that anyone interested in the property when the original sale was made, the purchaser not having fully complied with the terms of sale, still continued to be interested in the property, when resold by reason of default by the original purchaser. Or, as expressed in the passage quoted above from Early v. Dorsett, the purchaser at the original sale, after a resale for his default, occupies substantially the same position as one who purchases property subject to a vendor's lien. Or again, as expressed in the appellants' brief, upon making the first sale, there was a vendor's lien for the whole purchase money. This lien followed the property, under the resale, and inured to all the mortgagors equally, after satisfying the mortgage debt, interest, and costs. What we have said as to Mealey v. Page, supra, is equally applicable to the case of Aukam v. Zantzing, 94 Md. 421, 51 Atl. 93, which the appellee claims to be conclusive in his favor. In both these cases, the property brought more at the resale than at the original sale, and the question presented in the case before us did not arise, and was not dealt with. The vendor's lien for the original purchase money was fully satisfied out of the proceeds of the resale, and when that was done, but not until then, the original purchaser was entitled to the surplus, because the interest of the former owners of the property was then extinguished. This consideration shows why the court, in Aukam v. Zantzinger, not only held that the first purchaser was entitled to except to the resale, but also why it held that the mortgagor was not so entitled. Here the conditions are reversed, and the same reason which required the court in that case to hold that the first purchaser could except to the resale requires us to hold that the mortgagor in this case is entitled to except to this resale. There is an outstanding vendor's lien in this case for $1,050, the difference between the two sales, and this difference, after deducting costs, etc., represents the interest of the mortgagors in the property.

The case of State v. Second Nat. Bank, 84 Md. 325, 35 Atl. 889, proceeds upon the principle announced in Dalrymple v. Taneyhill. The local law of Baltimore City provided that all real estate sold at public auction in said city should be subject to a certain tax, "each and every time it should be struck off," and this court held that this provision applied only to "completed and consummated sales, and payment of purchase money." In that case the property was sold for $68,200, and this sale was confirmed by the court; but the purchaser failed to comply with the terms of sale, and the property was resold by an order of court, bringing only $55,300. The auditor allowed the tax on each sale, and on exception the court below disallowed the tax on the first sale, and on appeal this court affirmed the decision, saying that "whilst, under a judicial resale, the property is in fact again put under the hammer, it is put there, not as a new distinct independent procedure, but as a means, and solely as a means, to realize the money which the original but defaulting purchaser failed to pay. The resale takes place under the original decree, supplemented by an order, . . . and [is made] with a view to pay off the same indebtedness for the payment of which the property was sold in the first instance, and the money realized by it is always applied precisely as would have been applied the money bid at the original sale, had that money been paid by the first purchaser. The resale is simply an execution of the decree for a sale. Its very name imports that it is not such a new sale as to be a distinct proceeding." It is obvious that the above language applies as well to a sale under a power in a mortgage as to sale under a decree.

As what we have said is decisive of this case, it will be unnecessary to consider the other ground for reversal urged in argument. The sufficiency of the exceptions is, of course, not before us on this appeal.

Orders of June 4, 1908, dismissing the appellants' exceptions and ratifying the resale, reversed, with costs to the appellants above and below, and cause remanded.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

LOUIS RIEDEL, by Next Friend, et al,
Plffs. in Err.,

v.

WEST JERSEY & SEASHORE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 177 Fed. 374.)

Negligence—unsafe premises—third rail.

An electric railway company maintaining an unprotected third rail carrying a heavy current, on its right of way at a point where the right of way is securely fenced against intruders, is not liable for injury to a child who wanders through a gate maintained in the fence by an abutting property owner,

Note.—Liability of electric railway for injury to trespasser or licensee from exposed third rail.

Similar in principle to the above decision and to Sutton v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. L.) 73 Atl. 256 (mainly relied upon by the Federal court in RIEDEL v. WEST JERSEY & S. R. Co. and sufficiently set forth in that opinion), is McAllister v. Jung, 112 Ill. App. 138, in which recovery was denied for injuries sustained by a child of tender years in coming in contact with a live rail used upon an elevated railway company's structure, which he climbed for the purpose of getting a ball.

But in Anderson v. Seattle-Tacoma Interurban R. Co. 36 Wash. 387, 104 Am. St. Rep. 962, 78 Pac. 1013, recovery was allowed for injuries received by a passenger coming in contact with an unprotected third rail of which he was not warned and had no notice, while walking along the right of way after he had been wrongfully ejected from the train. The court said: "If modern transportation methods involve the use of such concealed, unprotected, dangerous, and deadly devices, where persons of common experience may be expected to come in contact with them, we believe those who use them should not escape liability, unless they exercise such a degree of care to warn and protect those who are injured as the circumstances and surroundings reasonably require."

and comes in contact with such rail, although there is nothing to distinguish the dangerous rail from the harmless ones.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gray, Buffington, and Lanning, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Rowland C. Evans and I. G. G. Foster for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. John Hampton Barnes, for defendant in error:

The defendant performed its full duty in regard to the obligation to fence.

New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Price, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1103, 86 C. C. A. 502, 159 Fed. 330.

The defendant was not negligent in failing to cover the third rail.

W. 712; Thomp. Neg. § 1025.

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this case brings up from the court below a record disclosing the following facts: Louis Riedel, who, by his father and next friend, brought suit in the court below, was a boy between seven and eight years of age, and was permanently injured by falling across the electric third rail of the West Jersey & Seashore Railroad Company, the defendant.

The day the injury occurred, he had been taken by his parents from Philadelphia, where they resided, to spend the day with some friends, the yard of whose house abutted against the line of the right of way of said defendant company, just above the village of Westfield, New Jersey. The right of way of the defendant company near this point, as well as elsewhere, was fenced with a three-strand wire fence about 4 feet high, but at the premises in question there was a picket fence dividing the same from the right of way of the defendant company, about 5 feet in height, which served as part of the line fence of said company, the wire fence coming up to and ending at each end of this picket fence. In this picket fence was a gate opening onto the defendant's right of way.

The defendant company was originally chartered as a steam railroad, but, by the revision of the act of the legislature of New Jersey concerning railroads, in 1903, the power was conferred upon it to substitute for steam any other motive power which it might deem best adapted to the economical operation of its railroad, and to use such devices and appliances for conducting and distributing power as might be required. Accordingly, at the time of the accident, and for a considerable period prior thereto, the company had installed an electric system for the operation of its road, the electricity being conveyed from the power house through what is known as a "third rail." This rail was situated between the two tracks upon which the cars traveled, but was in close proximity to the rail on one side and ran parallel therewith. It was in all respects like the rail which carried the cars, and was without cover or protection of any kind, so that, to a casual observer, there was nothing to distinguish it in appearance from the other rails. The current of electricity carried by this third rail was normally 675 volts, a charge sufficient to seriously injure or even destroy the life of anyone coming in contact therewith. This road ran entirely across the state of New Jersey, from Camden to Atlantic City, a distance of some 60 miles. At stations and road crossings, the third rail was covered, so that persons using said stations and crossings were protected therefrom; but, with these exceptions, throughout the entire length of the road, the third rail was uncovered.

On the day of the accident, the plaintiff, Louis Riedel, with two companions of about the same age, a boy and a girl, were playing together in the back part of the lot above described. What then occurred is thus stated: "Looking through the fence, they saw and were attracted by some flowers growing on the other side of the rails, and went to the gate to open it. Finding it fastened, the plaintiff's companion, as he testified, 'put a nail or a piece of wood, then pulled it out again, and it came open.' Having thus unbolted the gate, the two started to pluck the flowers. The first boy crossed the tracks in safety, but the plaintiff fell, apparently having tripped over something, and, coming in contact with the third rail, was shocked and burned by the electric current, sustaining severe and permanent injuries."

Upon these facts, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and, upon exceptions to this charge of the court, the case comes before us upon two assignments alleging error in this action of the court. The facts are simple and undisputed, and the single question for our determination is, whether or not the defendant company owed a duty to the plaintiff to use such care in guarding and protecting this third rail as would have prevented the injury which happened to him, or, as more generally put by the defendant, is a property owner who maintains on his premises a dangerous agency in the proper exercise and use of his premises, responsible to a child trespassing thereon, who is hurt by contact with such agency, if there is nothing about it to entice or attract him, and where the owner has done nothing to invite such trespasser on his premises, or has any reason to expect that he will come upon them?

The exceeding danger presented by the "third rail," which has recently come into use in the operation of important electric roads, when such rail is uncovered and exposed, justly challenges our attention. The character, however, of this dangerous and death-dealing agency must not be allowed to obscure the well-settled principles by which the duty of the owner of premises upon which such dangerous agency or instrumentality is situated, with respect thereto, is to be determined.

The plaintiff was a trespasser, and it must therefore appear, in order that he may recover from the defendant, that his case is an exception to the ordinary and well-settled rule that the owner of premises owes no duty to a trespasser, whether an infant or adult, to keep such premises in a nonhazardous condition, or to protect him against concealed dangers lurking thereon. The contention of plaintiff's counsel, urged with much ability and insistence, is that the extreme danger arising from the exposed third rail was a concealed danger, by reason of the fact that the third rail, in size and appearance, was undistinguishable from the other rails by a boy of the immature age of the plaintiff, there being no evidence that he had been informed or in any way made aware of the character of such rail. It is therefore contended that the maintenance of this instrumentality argued such a wanton recklessness as to consequences on the part of the defendant, and willingness to inflict injury, as would render it liable to the plaintiff, even though he were technically a trespasser. Of course, though the owner of premises may owe no duty to guard and protect a trespasser from dangers lurking thereon, he has no right wilfully to inflict injury on such a trespasser. It is on this ground that the so-called "spring gun" cases have been decided. Whether the conduct of such owner, in maintaining a dangerous situation or instrumentality on his land, would amount to such a wanton and reckless indifference to consequences as would imply a willingness to inflict an injury on a trespasser, must depend upon the circumstances of the case. There is a class of cases well known, in which it is held that a railroad company is liable where its servants in charge of moving trains wilfully run down a person in full view upon its tracks, even though they have given warning of their approach, and even though such person be a trespasser. Such cases serve to illustrate the proposition that one may not wilfully injure even a trespasser upon his premises. Of this class are the cases referred to by the counsel for plaintiff. Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Gruss, 200 Ill. 195, 65 N. E. 693; Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Kotoski, 199 Ill. 383, 65 N. E. 350; Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Adams, 26 Ind. 76.

But these decisions do not support the contention that the mere maintenance of a dangerous instrumentality upon one's land for ordinary and lawful purposes, and incident to its natural use in carrying on a lawful business, makes such a one a wilful tortfeasor with respect to a trespasser who has come within its danger. In the present case, there was nothing wilfully injurious in the defendant's installing upon its own premises this third rail, dangerous though it was to those who came in contact with it, for the lawful purpose of operating an electric railway system; nor can we say from that fact alone, or from any other evidence in the case, that the nonprotection of the third rail was such a wanton and reckless indifference to consequences as would legally imply wilfulness and intentional wrong, as to any injury that might be occasioned thereby, whether that injury was suffered by an infant or an adult. There is nothing in the case from which the purpose to inflict injury can be inferred, as in the "spring gun" cases, or a wilful indifference to consequences, as in the railroad cases above referred to. One's right to maintain, for a lawful purpose, a dangerous appliance or instrumentality on his own premises, is not limited or qualified by the degree in which it may be dangerous.

The precise question here involved has recently been decided by the supreme court of New Jersey, in the case of Sutton v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. (N. J. L.) 73 Atl. 256. The facts were practically the same. The action was for the death of a child thirteen years of age, who, in crossing the tracks of the defendant at a point other than a public crossing or station, came in contact with a third rail charged with electricity, and was killed. It was conceded that the decedent had no legal right to go upon defendant's premises at the point where he crossed the tracks. The court below sustained a demurrer to the declaration, and gave judgment for the defendant. The supreme court affirmed that judgment, saying: "The real distinction running through the cases seems to me to be this: Where the landowner in the development of his property, and solely for the purpose of obtaining a more beneficial user therefrom, installs upon it an appliance which will be dangerous to people coming in contact with it, he is under no obligation to trespassers to so guard it that they shall not be injured; but where he installs the appliance for the purpose of inflicting injury upon the persons or property of those who unlawfully come upon his land, he is liable when harm is inflicted by such appliances." The right of the plaintiff, therefore, depends upon whether the defendant company owes to a trespasser upon its right of way the duty of using care, either to safeguard its third rail in such a way as to prevent him from coming in contact with it, or else of giving him notice that such contact is dangerous to life and limb. The rule is settled in this state that a landowner is under no obligation to a trespasser to keep his premises in a nonhazardous state; that, as to him, the landowner's sole duty is to abstain from acts wilfully injurious. And this rule is applicable whether the trespasser is an infant or an adult. . . . In the case in hand, the defendant installed the electric third rail system for the more complete beneficial user of its property. In doing so, it acted under legislative sanction. . . . Having the lawful right to install this system for the operation of its road, it was within the protection of the rule which we have been discussing, and was under no obligation to the deceased, except to abstain from acts wilfully injurious to him. That it failed in this obligation is not suggested in the declaration."

There is nothing in the record to bring this case within the ratio decidendi of the so-called "turntable" cases, and other cases decided on the same principle, to which the plaintiff refers. In the present case, the railroad property was guarded by a statutory fence, and the gate through which the plaintiff and his companion entered upon the railroad premises was fastened by a bolt, which had been withdrawn by them. There is no evidence that there was anything to allure or entice children to go upon the railroad premises at the place where the accident occurred, and none that children had ever been in the habit of entering upon the railroad premises through this gate, or otherwise, for play or amusement, or for any other purposes. The motive of the children in attempting to cross the railroad, as testified by the children themselves, was to gather flowers growing on the other side of the railroad property. The present case, therefore, differs obviously from the cases referred to, the decisions in them being founded upon the maintenance of a dangerous appliance or object on the owner's premises which presented enticement and allurement to children, and to which they were in the habit of resorting, to the knowledge of the defendant. There was thus an implied invitation or license to the children to enter upon the premises by reason of which they were deprived of the character of trespassers; and there was imposed upon the defendants the duty of exercising reasonable care for their protection. Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745; Snare & T. Co. v. Friedman, 94 C. C. A. 369, 169 Fed. 1; Cooke v. Midland G. W. R. Co. [1909] A. C. 229, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 557.

However deplorable these cases may be, we cannot, in order to remedy them, disregard those well-settled principles which have heretofore regulated and limited the restraint imposed upon landowners in the use of their own premises. If the comparatively recent use of the third rail has developed dangers to the public at large hitherto unknown, the legislature of the state may feel called upon to exercise its undoubted police power, by imposing upon the users of these instrumentalities such precautions in their use as will measurably afford protection to those coming within their danger.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

W. M. DAVIDSON et al., Appts.,
v.
J. W. DAVIS.

(— Fla. —, 52 So. 139.)

Usury — sale — difference between cash and credit.

Usury can only attach to a loan of money or to the forbearance of a debt. On a contract to secure the price or value of work

Headnote by TAYLOR, J.

Note. — Increasing price upon sale on credit as usury.

The cases are generally uniform in holding that there may be a cash and an increased credit price, and that a bona fide sale for the latter is not usurious, irrespective of whether it is made up of the cash price plus a rate of increase which would exceed the legal rate, or whether a note is given and the increase put in the form of interest thereon.

Thus, on a sale of property the parties may make such a bargain as they can agree upon, and usury cannot be charged simply because the price is fixed at one sum if paid at one time, and at another sum if paid at another time. Primley v. Shirk, 60 Ill. App. 312, affirmed in 163 Ill. 389, 45 N. E. 247; West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; Tousey v. Robinson, 1 Met. (Ky.) 663.

And in Hogg v. Ruffner, 1 Black, 115, 17 L. ed. 38, the court, in holding that there is no loan of money or forbearance of a debt within the usury laws, when, in order to gain time for the payment of the purchase price of property, the purchaser agrees to pay a sum in excess of the cash price which has been asked for the property, says that a vendor may prefer $100 in hand to double that sum in expectancy, and a purchaser may prefer the greater price with the longer credit; and one who will not distinguish between things that differ may say with apparent truth that B pays a hundred per cent for forbearance, and may assert that such a contract is usurious; but whatever truth there may be in the premises the conclusion is manifestly erroneous.

In Ford v. Hancock, 36 Ark. 248, in holding that it was not usury for one who sells a piece of property on credit, to contract for a higher price than he would have sold it for cash, the court said: "If the intention be, in fact, to sell on credit, he has the right to fix a price greater than the cash price with legal interest added; but if the sale be really made on a cash estimate, and time be given to pay the same, and an amount is assumed to be paid greater than the cash price with legal interest would amount to, this is an agreement for forbearance that is usurious." Irvin v. Mathews, 75 Ga. 739; Bird v. Benton, 127 Ga. 371, 56 S. E. 450; Borum v. Fouts, 15 Ind. 50; Newkirk v. Burson, 21 Ind. 129; and Mit- and labor done, or to be done, or of property sold, the contracting parties may agree upon one price if cash be paid, and upon as large an addition to the cash price as may suit themselves if credit be given; and it is wholly immaterial whether the enhanced price be ascertained by the simple addition of a lumping sum to the cash price, or by a percentage thereon. In neither case is the transaction usurious. It is neither a loan nor the forbearance of a debt, but simply the contract price of work and labor done, or of property sold; and the difference between cash and credit in such cases, whether 6, 10, or 20 per cent, must be left exclusively to chell v. Griffith, 22 Mo. 515, are to the same effect.

But this is true only where there was a cash price fixed, and the usurious rate was taken upon that, and not where the interest represents the difference between the cash and credit price of the subject of the sale. Newkirk v. Burson, 28 Ind. 435; Casady v. Scallen, 15 Iowa, 93.

And the following cases hold that a contract for the sale of property on a credit of time, for a sum equal to the amount of the original cash price asked and a per cent thereon in excess of the legal rate of interest, is not usurious, where the increased rate is not intended as interest on the cash price asked: Casady v. Scallen, supra; Gruell v. Smalley, 1 Duv. 358; Bass v. Patterson, 68 Miss. 310, 24 Am. St. Rep. 279, 8 So. 849; Churchhill v. Turnage, 122 N. C. 428, 30 S. E. 122; Wheeler v. Marchbanks, 32 S. C. 594, 10 S. E. 1011; Swayne v. Riddle, 37 W. Va. 291, 16 S. E. 512.

And where a contract of sale is made upon a certain cash price, and the purchaser is unable to procure the money, and the vendor agrees to deliver the deed upon the execution of notes for an amount 15 per cent above the cash price, the transaction is not usurious. Dykes v. Bottoms, 101 Ala. 390, 13 So. 582.

And in Rushing v. Worsham, 102 Ga. 825, 30 S. E. 541, where the increase for which notes were given was 18 per cent, the same conclusion was reached.

And in Brooks v. Avery, 4 N. Y. 225, it was held that a mortgage given for lands is not rendered usurious by the fact that the purchaser, not being able to comply with the terms of the owner of the land, requiring a certain amount of cash, agrees to give a mortgage for a greater amount, in consideration of which the vendor agrees to execute a deed in case the mortgage can be disposed of in the market for the amount of cash demanded by him.

But in Thompson v. Nesbit, 2 Rich. L. 73, where the defendant was willing to give $1,000, the price asked for a share, but could not pay cash, and plaintiff was willing to give any desired time if he could have the price increased by 10 per cent per annum until paid, and a bill of sale was drawn expressing the consideration to be $1,000, and a note was given in the following words: "Three years after date I promise the contract of the parties, and no amount of difference, fairly agreed upon, can be considered illegal. The difference between the cash and the credit price on a sale of property may be put into the form of interest on a note given for the purchase price, without violating the usury law, although the per cent agreed is greater than the lawful rate of interest.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Santa Rosa County foreclosing a mortgage on certain real estate. Affirmed.

to pay . . . $1,300, to be paid at such times as I please, and to deduct 10 per cent per annum off of the amount paid at each payment,"—it was held that the contract was usurious, the decision being on the ground that the transaction was a mere artifice to avoid the usury law.

That the credit price is made up of the cash price plus interest at an illegal rate will not make the contract usurious. Brown v. Gardner, 4 Lea, 145.

And, as held in DAVIDSON v. DAVIS, the difference between the cash and the credit price on a sale of property may be put in the form of interest on a note given for the purchase price, without violating the usury law, although the per cent agreed upon is greater than the lawful rate of interest. First Nat. Bank v. Mann, 94 Tenn. 17, 27 L.R.A. 565, 27 S. W. 1015, cited in DAVIDSON v. DAVIS; Garrity v. Cripp, 4 Baxt. 86; Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 6 L.R.A. 427, 10 S. E. 375.

An advance to the usual time price for merchandise sold of 10 per cent over the cash price without interest is not usurious. Churchill v. Turnage, supra.

And in Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. pt. 1, p. 112, where goods were sold on credit, with a stipulation that, in case the purchase price was not paid at the expiration of the period of credit, a customary monthly rate above the legal interest should be paid till the debt was discharged, it was held that the contract, if a bona fide sale, was not usurious, but otherwise, if the transaction was merely colorable to cover a loan and evade the statute.

In Béete v. Bidgood, 7 Barn. & C. 453, where a contract was made for the sale of an estate at a certain price, to be paid in instalments at future dates with interest, and promissory notes were given for such sums, in holding the transaction valid, Lord Tenterden said: "The agreement was founded partly upon what was considered the present price of the estate, and partly upon what was considered its price if paid for at a future day. The only difficulty has been occasioned by calling the difference between these two prices interest; but it is our duty to look not at the form and words, but at the substance of the transaction; and as, on the one hand, we should not pay attention to the words of the contract, if the substance of it went to defeat the provision of the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. F. West for appellants.

Messrs. Daniel Campbell & Son, for appellee:

The fact that $1,687.50, the credit price, may have been the cash price plus 12½ per cent interest for a year, would not make the note usurious, as there was no loan or forbearance of a debt involved.

Hogg v. Ruffner, 1 Black, 115, 17 L. ed. 38; First Nat. Bank v. Mann, 74 Tenn. 17, 27 L.R.A. 565, 27 S. W. 1015; Reger v. O'Neal, 37 W. Va. 159, 6 L.R.A. 427, 10 S. E. 375; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 465, 478; Gar-statute of 12 Anne, chap. 16, so, on the other hand, we ought not to rely upon the words so as to defeat the contract, if in substance the transaction was legal." (In Rushing v. Worsham, supra, the Bute Case is quoted with approval, and a similar rule of construction announced.)

And a note for the purchase money of land payable in instalments of a certain amount each is valid, and cannot be defeated for usury, although it purports to draw "interest" at a rate in excess of the legal rate. Selden, J., in Cutler v. Wright, 22 N. Y. 472.

And the fact that the contract price for houses is to be paid in instalments with interest at a higher than the legal rate does not render it usurious, if the interest is a part of the contract price of the houses. Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130.

And this is true where the increased price is a reservation of a part of the product of the thing sold, to be delivered to the vendor at stated intervals, which reserved product would greatly exceed in value the legal rate of interest allowed by statute. First Nat. Bank v. Owen, 23 Iowa, 185; Gilmore v. Ferguson, 28 Iowa, 220.

But if the price is payable at any time, and the additional amount is to be paid as long as the principal sum remains due, and to cease when it is paid, it is a cover for usury, and is illegal. Hartman v. Uhlinger, 115 Pa. 270, 8 Atl. 244.

And where a price is agreed upon, but time is given the vendee to pay a part thereof, or all, and, to compensate the vendor for waiting, a rate of interest is agreed upon in excess of the amount allowed by law, the contract will be usurious, although the excessive interest may be added to and appear in the obligation as principal. However, the court here recognized the right of one to have two prices for his property,—one for a cash sale, and as much larger a one as he chooses for a sale on time, but said that the increase could not be put in the form of interest on the obligation, although it was intended as a part of the purchase price. Fisher v. Hoover, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 81, 21 S. W. 930.

As to the validity of a contract to resell at an advance property purchased, see note to Rogers v. Blouenstein, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee filed his bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage in the circuit court of Santa Rosa county, the mortgage being given to secure the payment of a note for $1,687.50, payable twelve months after date, to bear interest after maturity at the rate of 12½ per cent per annum. The defendants answered the bill, alleging that the said note was usurious in this: That the amount really due by them to the original payee in said note was the sum of $1,500, and that the excess of $187.50 over said sum of $1,500 was added to said note as interest thereon from the date of said note for one year thence next ensuing, which they aver was at the rate of 12½ per cent per annum, and was usurious. Testimony was taken, and upon the testimony the court below rendered a decree for the principal sum of $1,687.50, without any interest after maturity of said note, and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and for costs. From this decree the defendants below have taken their appeal, and assign the said decree as error.

The evidence in the case shows that there was no loan of money by the mortgagee to the mortgagors, and that no indebtedness between them existed at the time of the giving of said note and mortgage, but that, the original mortgagee being the owner of a tract of land in Santa Rosa county that the mortgagor desired to purchase, the said vendor was willing to sell the same for cash at the sum of $1,500; but the vendee not being able to pay said sum of $1,500 in cash, and desiring twelve months' time within which to make payment for said land, the vendor agreed to give him such extension of time, provided he would, at the end of said twelve months, pay him $1,687.50, instead of $1,500 (the cash price asked),—the said excess in the price agreed to be paid over the cash price asked being equivalent to interest on the cash price asked at the rate of 12½ per cent per annum.

The law is well settled that usury can only attach to a loan of money, or to the forbearance of a debt, and that, on a contract to secure the price or value of work and labor done, or to be done, or of property sold, the contracting parties may agree upon one price if cash be paid, and upon as large an addition to the cash price as may suit themselves, if credit be given; and it is wholly immaterial whether the enhanced price be ascertained by the simple addition of a lumping sum to the cash price, or by a percentage thereon. In neither case is the transaction usurious. It is neither a loan nor the forbearance of a debt, but simply the contract price of work and labor done and property sold; and the difference between cash and credit in such cases, whether 6, 10, or 20 per cent, must be left exclusively to the contract of the parties, and no amount of difference fairly agreed upon can be considered illegal. Webb, Usury, ¶ 72; West v. Belches, 5 Munf. 187; Garrity v. Cripp, 4 Baxt. 86; Brown v. Gardner, 4 Lea, 145; Hogg v. Ruffner, 1 Black, 115, 17 L. ed. 38. Or, as the rule is stated in First Nat. Bank v. Mann, 94 Tenn. 17, 27 L.R.A. 565, 27 S. W. 1015: "The difference between the cash and the credit price on a sale of property may be put into the form of interest on a note given for the purchase price, without violating the usury law, although the per cent agreed upon is greater than the lawful rate of interest." Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 6 L.R.A. 427, 10 S. E. 375; Graeme v. Adams, 23 Gratt. 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130.

Under the law as stated there was no usurious taint in the note herein sued upon, and the court below committed no error in the decree rendered, and the same is hereby affirmed, at the cost of the appellants.

GERMAN-AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

E. W. JERRILS.

(82 Kan. 320, 108 Pac. 114.)

Insurance — appraisers — failure to agree — action — condition precedent.

1. Under a fire insurance policy providing that, in the event of a disagreement as to

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

Note. — Arbitration as condition precedent to action on insurance policy.

The standard form of fire insurance policy in general use in this country provides that where the insurer and insured are unable the amount of the loss, each party shall appoint an appraiser, and the two appraisers shall select an umpire, and appraise the loss, and that no action shall be maintained on the policy until such appraisalment has been made, the insured discharges his obligation in that respect when he appoints an appraiser in good faith; and where the two appraisers fail to agree upon an umpire, and the appraisalment fails without the fault of the insured, he is not required to propose the selection of other appraisers, but may maintain an action upon the policy.

to agree as to the amount of loss, it shall be determined by arbitration, and that no action shall be maintained on the policy until an award has been made by the arbitrators; and the question often arises as to the effect of a failure to carry out this provision. This subject is exhaustively treated in the note to Graham v. German American Ins. Co. 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1055. A few later cases in point have been reported.

In Shawnee F. Ins. Co. v. Pontfield, 110 Md. 353, 132 Am. St. Rep. 449, 72 Atl. 835, it was declared to be the established rule in that state, that unless the insured was responsible for the failure of the arbitration, he was entitled to recover upon his policy, even in the absence of an award. To quote from the opinion: "It is the duty of both parties to a contract of insurance which provides, in case the insured and insurer cannot agree as to the amount of loss, for the submission of the question of loss to arbitration, to act in good faith, and to make a fair effort to carry out such provision and accomplish its object; and . . . where the failure to secure an award after submission to arbitration is due to the fault of the insured, the absence of an award is a bar to an action on the policy, where it is due to the fault of the insurance company or its appraiser, the insured may bring suit on his policy without an award."

So, in Spring Garden Ins. Co. v. Amusement Syndicate Co. 178 Fed. 519, it was held that where the appraisers appointed by the parties were unable to agree upon an umpire, and no further steps were taken by either party thereafter, the appraisalment feature of the policy was waived and abandoned, and the assured was entitled to bring an action on the policy.

And in Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Lyon, 124 Ill. App. 491, it was held that where the appraisers first appointed failed to agree upon the amount of the loss, through no fault of the assured, the assured could maintain an action on the policy without proposing the selection of new arbitrators.

And in Slepski v. German F. Ins. Co. 141 Ill. App. 614, it was held that where the failure to secure an appraisalment was not due to the fault of the appraiser selected by the insurer, who so conducted himself in the interest of the insurer that he might be regarded as its agent, the fact that no appraisalment of the loss was ever made was no defense to an action on the policy.

2. In an action upon a fire insurance policy, the petition, after alleging the issuance of the policy, the payment of the premium, and a loss by fire, alleged due performance of the conditions of the policy on the part of the insured. The answer alleged that, after the fire occurred, a disagreement arose as to the amount of the loss, and that the same had never been ascertained by appraisers, as provided by the policy. The reply was a general denial. Held, that under the

So, in Retail Merchants Asso. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Cox, 138 Ill. App. 14, it was held that it was unnecessary for the assured to make any effort to comply with the provisions as to arbitration, where the insurer denied any liability whatever under the policy.

But in Southern Home Ins. Co. v. Faulkner, 57 Fla. 194, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1098, 49 So. 542, it was held that such arbitration and award were conditions precedent to the right of the insured to an action upon such policy, and that where the insurer made prompt demand upon the insured that the amount of loss should be submitted to arbitration, and the assured declined, without any valid reason, to submit to such arbitration, no recovery could be had upon the policy.

In Coffin v. German F. Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 126 S. W. 253, where it appeared that there was an award of arbitrators following an appraisalment, which the insurer claimed was valid, and which the insured claimed was void, the trial court sustaining the latter's contention, it was held that the insurer could not insist that the insured was bound to proceed to have a valid award made before commencing suit.

In Wilson v. Central Ins. Co. 135 App. Div. 649, 119 N. Y. Supp. 955, it appeared that the policy in suit, which was one of accident insurance, and which was issued in Great Britain, provided that any dispute as to liability of the insurer should be referred to arbitrators, pursuant to a certain British act of arbitration, and that an award of such arbitrators should be a condition precedent to the enforcement of the liability of the insurer. It further appeared that the arbitration act referred to in the policy provided that the court might on application appoint an arbitrator who should have like powers to act as if he had been appointed by consent of the parties. It was held that the insured, in order to recover after repudiation of liability by the insurer, must have his rights determined by arbitrators appointed either by agreement of the parties or under said foreign statute. It was also held that a mere refusal of the insurer to agree to the arbitrators named by the insured did not waive the condition of the policy, nor excuse the insured from instituting compulsory arbitration by application to English court pleadings it was proper for the plaintiff to show that he appointed an appraiser in good faith, and that the two appraisers were unable to agree upon an umpire, for which reason no appraisal was made.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action on a fire insurance policy. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals.
28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The policy covered a stock of merchandise in the town of Elgin. The petition alleged that the stock was destroyed by fire July 31, 1907, that plaintiff had performed all the requirements and conditions of the policy on his part, and that the defendant refused to pay. The answer set up as a defense that, after the fire occurred, a disagreement arose between the insured and the company as to the amount of the loss, and that the amount had never been determined by appraisers, as provided by the policy. The reply was a general denial. On the trial the plaintiff was permitted, over the objections of the defendant, to offer evidence showing that, following the disagreement as to the amount of the loss, appraisers were appointed, the company and the insured each selecting one appraiser as provided by the terms of the policy, and that the two appraisers were unable to agree upon an umpire, for which reason no appraisal was ever made. The errors complained of are the admission of this testimony, and the giving of an instruction to the effect that, if appraisers were appointed as the policy provided, and they were unable to agree upon an umpire, the plaintiff had complied with the terms and conditions of the policy respecting appraisal, and could recover without showing an award by appraisers. The policy was of the ordinary, standard form, and the provision with respect to appraisal reads as follows: "In the event of disagreement as to the amount of loss, the same shall, as above provided, be ascertained by two competent and disinterested appraisers, the insured and this company each selecting one, and the two so chosen shall first select a competent and disinterested umpire; the appraisers together shall then estimate and appraise the loss, stating separately sound value and damage, and, failing to agree, shall submit their differences to the umpire; and the award in writing of any two shall determine the amount of such loss; the parties thereto shall pay the appraiser respectively selected by them, and shall bear equally the expenses of the appraisal and umpire, and the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required, have been received by this company, including an award by appraisers when appraisal has been required."

The plaintiff's evidence which was admitted over the objections of the defendant was in substance that, after the fire occurred, an adjuster of the company visited him, and a disagreement arose respecting the amount of the loss; that appraisers were then appointed, the company selecting Mr. Warren, and the insured selecting Mr. Meeker. When the two appraisers met for the purpose of agreeing upon an umpire, Mr. Warren suggested a Mr. Potts, who had been the first choice of the adjuster for appraiser, and also handed to Mr. Meeker a list of persons, one of whom resided at Kansas City, another at Newton, and another at Wagoner, Oklahoma. Mr. Meeker stated to him that, on account of the expense, it would be better to take someone nearer home, and suggested the names of half a dozen merchants living in towns in the same county. The appraiser for the company objected to anyone who lived in the vicinity, on account of local influence. On three separate days the appraisers met and attempted to agree upon an umpire, but, being unable to do so, the matter was dropped. On the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence two letters received from the adjuster of the company after the failure of the appraisers to agree, which stated that the company was ready to select another appraiser in place of Mr. Warren, and suggested that the plaintiff appoint someone else to take the place of Mr. Meeker. In these letters the insured was informed that the company would not waive its right to an appraisal.

There are cases holding that where there is a failure of appraisers acting in good faith to agree, it is incumbent on the parties to appoint other appraisers. Vernon Ins. & T. Co. v. Maitlen, 158 Ind. 393, 63 N. E. 755; Westenhaver Bros. v. German American Ins. Co. 113 Iowa, 726, 84 N. W. 717. On the other hand, it has been held, on what seems to be the better reasoning, that where the insured has appointed an appraiser, and without his fault the appraisers fail to agree, he may maintain an action. In Western Assur. Co. v. Decker, 39 C. C. A. 383, 98 Fed. 381, Judge Caldwell said in the opinion: "The contention of the company is that, when the arbitrators failed to agree, it was the duty of the insured to propose a new selection of arbitrators, and that, not having done so, and not having appointed an arbitrator the second time, he cannot maintain this action. The terms of the policy are satisfied when the insured, acting in good faith, appoints an appraiser. If the appraisal falls through by disagreement of the appraisers, without any fault of the insured, he has discharged his covenant, and satisfied the requirements of the policy, and may then resort to the courts to have his damages assessed." In the opinion in Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Bishop, 154 Ill. 9, 45 Am. St. Rep. 105, 39 N. E. 1102, the court, after referring to cases holding that, upon the failure of the appraisers to agree upon an umpire, it is the duty of the insured at least to propose the selection of new appraisers, said: "We are unable to subscribe to this doctrine, so far as the policy upon which the present suit has been brought is concerned. The contract here only requires the parties to choose appraisers once, and not twice." In that case it appeared that the appraiser nominated by the company insisted upon the appointment of an umpire living at a great distance from the scene of the loss, and refused without excuse to agree to any umpire named by the other appraiser, and it was said that his conduct amounted to a refusal to proceed with the appraisal, and the insured was not required to wait longer before bringing his action. The same doctrine is declared in the following cases: Hickerson v. German-American Ins. Co. 96 Tenn. 193, 32 L.R.A. 172, 33 S. W. 1041; Bishop v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 488, 29 N. E. 844; Chapman v. Rockford Ins. Co. 89 Wis. 572, 28 L.R.A. 405, 62 N. W. 422; Uhrig v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 101 N. Y. 362, 4 N. E. 745; McCullough v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 113 Mo. 606, 21 S. W. 207; Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 97 Md. 294, 99 Am. St. Rep. 445, 55 Atl. 675; Broek v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 102 Mich. 583, 26 L.R.A. 623, 47 Am. St. Rep. 562, 61 N. W. 67.

These are the principal authorities relied upon by the plaintiff in support of the judgment. It will be observed that none of them touches the precise question involved here, since we are not called upon to determine merely whether the conduct of the company or its appraiser in failing to agree upon an umpire rendered it unnecessary that any further steps be taken towards procuring an appraisal. Conceding, for the purpose of argument, that, since the appraisers had failed to agree, the plaintiff could maintain the action without showing an award, the defendant contends that the pleadings should have set up the facts which avoided the necessity of an award. The whole claim of error concerns the pleadings. The contention is that, having alleged full performance of all the conditions and requirements of the policy on his part, the plaintiff offered proof showing facts which rendered performance unnecessary, in other words, a waiver on the part of the defendant of certain conditions and requirements; that under the pleadings it was error to admit the testimony, and that, for the same reason, the instruction referred to was erroneous. In support of this contention the defendant relies upon the doctrine of Dwelling-House Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 47 Kan. 1, 27 Pac. 100. There the petition set forth the contract of insurance, payment of premium, destruction of the property by fire, and that the company had refused to pay the loss, although the plaintiffs had performed all the conditions of the policy incumbent upon them. The defendant answered, alleging a breach of the condition of the policy in regard to encumbrances. The reply was a general denial. On the trial the plaintiffs were permitted to offer proof tending to establish a waiver of the condition of the policy respecting encumbrances, and facts in the nature of an estoppel against the company urging the forfeiture. A judgment against the company was reversed. It was held that there was sufficient testimony produced by plaintiffs to warrant the instructions given by the court, if the acts of waiver and estoppel had been pleaded; but it was also held that "neither the evidence introduced, nor the instructions based thereon, are warranted under the pleadings as they exist, and, before they can be properly received, the reply must be amended." To the same effect are Western Home Ins. Co. v. Thorp, 48 Kan. 239, 28 Pac. 991; Gillett v. Burlington Ins. Co. 53 Kan. 108, 36 Pac. 52; Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Coverdale, 9 Kan. App. 651, 58 Pac. 1029.

The question resolves itself in its final analysis to this: What were the conditions of the policy which the insured was required to perform in order to entitle him to maintain the action? True, the terms of the policy contemplated that, in case a difference arose respecting the amount of the loss, it should be determined by an award of appraisers, but all the policy required the insured to do in case such a disagreement arose was to join with the company in the selection of appraisers. Of course, the insured cannot avoid the conditions of the policy by naming an appraiser who acts in bad faith, and who refuses without excuse to agree with the other appraiser. Nor, on the other hand, can the company gain any advantage where the failure to agree upon an umpire is occasioned by bad faith or misconduct of its appraiser. We agree with the plaintiff that there was and is no question of waiver in the case. While it would not be inaccurate to say that, where the failure of the appraisers to agree upon an award is caused by the bad faith of the appraiser appointed by the company, the latter would be estopped from setting up the lack of an award as a ground of forfeiture of the right to maintain the action, still the plaintiff does not rely upon either waiver or estoppel. On the contrary, he relies upon due performance of all the terms and conditions of the policy on his part. Since the policy only required him to appoint an appraiser in case a difference arose as to the amount of the loss, it follows that he has shown due performance when he shows that he has appointed an appraiser. There was no error in the admission of testimony, or in giving the instruction.

The judgment will be affirmed.

THACKER COAL & COKE COMPANY.

Appt.,

v.

NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 68 S. E. 107.)

Interstate commerce — rates — power of state court.

1. A court of equity of this state has no jurisdiction to enjoin a railroad company engaged in interstate transportation from filing with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule of its rates for transportation of coal from a point in this state to a point in another state, on the ground that such rates are unreasonable, unfair, and discriminatory.

Same — reasonableness — Interstate Commerce Commission.

2. It is the exclusive power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the first instance, to pass on the fairness and reasonableness of rates contained in the schedule of the rates fixed by an interstate carrier on articles transported in interstate commerce.

Note. — Power of state court to pass upon interstate rates.

The specific conclusion reached in the above decision, that a state court has no power to pass upon the reasonableness, fairness, or justice of interstate rates, is supported by Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. 204 U. S. 426, 51 L. ed. 553, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1075, reversing 38 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 85 S. W. 1052; Swift & Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 633, 58 Fed. 858; Sheldon v. Wabash R. Co. 105 Fed. 785; Kalispell Lumber Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. 157 Fed. 845; Northern P. R. Co. v. Pacific Coast Lumber Mfrs. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 64 W. Va. 406, 63 S. E. 323.

Indeed, the only case to disagree with this proposition of law is Halliday Mill Co. v. Louisiana & N. W. R. Co. 80 Ark.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Mingo County dissolving a temporary injunction restraining defendant from filing with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule increasing certain freight rates. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Vinson & Thompson for appellant.

Messrs. Joseph I. Doran, Theodore W. Beath, and Holt & Duncan, for appellee:

Under the interstate commerce act, as construed by the Federal courts, the Interstate Commerce Commission has exclusive jurisdiction in the first instance, to pass upon the reasonableness of an interstate rate, and no court, whether state or Federal, has original jurisdiction of that question.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Thacker Coal & Coke Company brought a suit in equity in the circuit court of Mingo county against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, to enjoin the railroad company from filing with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule of rate charges for transportation of coal from the mines of the coal company, in the state of West Virginia, to points on the lakes in the state of Ohio and other states, which schedule increased the rates over those existing; the coal company alleging that lower rates were accorded to other railroad carriers carrying coal from Pennsylvania and Ohio in competition with West Virginia coal, and that the rates proposed by such schedule were discriminatory, unjust, and unreasonable, and would entail irreparable injury and probable ruin upon the Thacker Coal Company. Upon its bill a temporary injunction was granted, and, this injunction having been dissolved, the Thacker Coal Company appeals.

The case is one purely of interstate commerce. Its solution rests upon that act of Congress known as the "interstate commerce act." 24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3153. We must follow Federal decision upon this act. We know that the great subject of interstate commerce has been committed to the power, the vast power, of Congress, by that provision of the national Constitution declaring that "the Congress shall have power . . . to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." Under this grant of power was passed the interstate commerce act, touching, controlling, and regulating, to large extent, and in material respects, commerce passing state lines. A leading feature of that act, one controlling this case, is that it establishes a commission of weighty jurisdiction, over interstate commerce, a jurisdiction to supervise, regulate, we may say, dictate, interstate com-

536, 98 S. W. 374, in which it was held that, inasmuch as the interstate commerce act, while providing that the Federal courts should have jurisdiction of actions brought under it, also provided that nothing in the act should in any way abridge or alter common-law or statutory remedies existing at the time of its passage, but that the provisions of the act were in addition to such remedies, such act did not deprive a state court of jurisdiction of an action by a shipper to recover the amount paid for freight rates, upon the ground that such rates were excessive, unreasonable, and unjust. The court commended the position of the court of civil appeals of Texas in Abilene Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 38 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 85 S. W. 1052, but, as this case has been reversed by the United States Supreme Court since the decision in the Arkansas case, the latter can hardly now be deemed of much authority.

merce, called in the act the "Interstate Commerce Commission;" and it gives carriers engaged in such commerce right to fix rates in the first instance, and requires them to do so, and to print schedules of such rates, and file the schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and requires the carrier to conform to the rates fixed in such schedule, under severe penalties for over or discriminative charge. The act, in § 13, gives any one complaining of anything done or omitted by a carrier to his injury, in contravention of the act, right to file a complaint with the Commission stating the wrong, and provides for notice to the carrier, and a full hearing of the complaint; and § 15 provides that if upon such hearing the Commission shall be of opinion that the rates demanded or collected, or any act, regulation, or practice by the carrier touching such rates, are unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of the act, the Commission shall determine what will be the just or reasonable rates to be thereafter observed, and what regulation or practice in respect to transportation is just, fair, and reasonable, to be thereafter followed, and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation. 34 Stat. at L. 589, chap. 3591, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1907, § 15, amended page 900, Supp. 1909, p. 1158. As stated, § 13 of the original interstate commerce act gives a party injured right to complain to the Commission, and § 14 gives power to investigate and make order in the premises, and § 16 as amended in 1887 gives power to the Commission to render judgment that the carrier pay the party injured damages, and in case of nonpayment the party may file a bill in the United States circuit court to enforce the order or judgment of the Commission. 24 Stat. at L. 384, chap. 104, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3165, 34 Stat. at L. 590, chap. 3591, Supp. 1907, p. 902. Section 12 gives the Commission latitudinous authority to inquire into the business of carriers, and keep itself informed of their conduct, and demand information of the carriers, and commands it to enforce all the provisions of the act, and it is given authority itself to institute legal proceedings, and call upon district attorneys to prosecute proceedings under the direction of the attorney general, for the enforcement of the act and for punishment for its violation.

In this statement of some of the provisions of this voluminous act, we see that Congress has assumed jurisdiction over interstate commerce; that it has made regulations as to it, particularly as to the matter in hand,—rates of transportation; that it has created a tribunal for testing the character and fairness of such rates, with wide powers to judge them, and with power to modify them so as to conform to right and reasonableness. We see that there is nothing more distinctly committed to the jurisdiction of this tribunal than the matter of rates,—the schedule of rates. This schedule must go at once to this Commission, the only authority to deal with it, at least in the first instance, if the act is obeyed,—a tribunal created by Congress under its exclusive power over interstate commerce, and given a subject-matter for its action. Yet a state court is asked to grant a perpetual injunction to debar a great interstate railroad from fixing rates and filing them with the Commission. A state court is asked to say that this schedule shall never reach that Commission. It does seem to me that the very statement of the proposition is its own refutation. But we are not without authority to support this position. I consider that a decision of the United States Supreme Court, in principle, does so. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. 204 U. S. 426, 51 L. ed. 553, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1075. The Abilene Company sued the railroad company for charges claimed to be unreasonable and unjust rates, though they did not exceed the rates specified in a schedule filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was held that such schedule was final until changed by the Commission. This was so, because it rested with the Commission to say, and the schedule was the rule until its action deprived the schedule of force. The court held that "the interstate commerce act was intended to afford an effective and comprehensive means for redressing wrongs resulting from unjust discriminations and undue preference, and to that end placed upon carriers the duty of publishing schedules of reasonable and uniform rates; and, consistently with the provisions of that law, a shipper cannot maintain an action at common law in a state court for excessive and unreasonable freight rates exacted on interstate shipments, where the rates charged were those which had been duly fixed by the carrier according to the act, and had not been found to be unreasonable by the Interstate Commerce Commission." This court followed the Abilene Case in Robinson v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 64 W. Va. 406, 63 S. E. 323. Its principle decides this case.

As will be suggested to the mind at once, and as pointed out in those cases, if such action could be maintained, then a jury and state court would hold one rate to be proper, and the Commission another. Which shall prevail? If the state court's rate, then of what force the act of Congress and the judgment of the Commission under it? The Federal power in a matter which nobody will deny to be within its constitutional jurisdiction would be nullified. One state one rate, another another, the Federal tribunal another, and confusion worse confounded! Just the same may be said in our case. If we stop that schedule on its way, and thus prevent any action on it by the Commission, do we not nullify the act of Congress, and render the jurisdiction of the Commission abortive? In Central Stock Yards Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 112 Fed. 823, it is held that a complaining shipper must go to the Commission for relief, as the remedy given by the act through it is exclusive. So in American Union Coal Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (C. C.) 159 Fed. 278, and Great Northern R. Co. v. Kalispell Lumber Co. 91 C. C. A. 63, 165 Fed. 25. Counsel refer to Kalispell Lumber Co. v. Great Northern R. Co. (C. C.) 157 Fed. 845. That was not a suit to enjoin the filing of a schedule, but against enforcement of one filed pending a decision by the Commission. The cases M. C. Kiser Co. v. Central R. Co. (C. C.) 158 Fed. 193, and Macon Grocery Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (C. C.) 163 Fed. 738, cannot be regarded, as they were circuit court decisions, and contrary to the decision in the same circuit in the circuit court of appeals in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Macon Grocery Co. 92 C. C. A. 114, 166 Fed. 206, above. In Jewett Bros. & Jewett v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (C. C.) 156 Fed. 160, it is held that no injunction lies, as a court cannot pass on a rate in advance of action of the Commission. This denies our right to pass on the rates involved in this case.

Counsel for the coal company say that the Abilene Case does not apply in this case; their theory being that that case was to recover damages for unfair rates imposed under established rates; that is, to recover for charges as unfair, though rates had been established by a schedule on file with the Commission, and had not yet been condemned by it; whereas, this suit is to prevent the filing of a schedule of unfair rates, to arrest these rates on their way, and thus prevent their establishment. But such injunction would be for the state court to fix rates by condemning them as unjust; that would be for the state court to exercise a jurisdiction not vested in it, to pass on rates; that would be to deny the national tribunal its functions under the interstate commerce act. Judge McCormick, in delivering the opinion in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Macon Grocery Co. 92 C. C. A. 114, 166 Fed. 217, thought that there would be less reason, if possible, for entertaining an injunction than an action to recover back charges. So I think, and for the reason that action to recover back is not to prevent establishment of rates, not stopping the Commission from action; whereas, an injunction would forestall all action by the Commission, and deprive the public and carrier of the benefit of the schedule. It would be a tedious, protracted litigation, a barrier to urgent commerce. But we are not without authority for the particular question of this case, that no injunction lies to arrest a carrier from filing its rate schedule with the Commission. The case just mentioned is one wherein the circuit court of appeals held that shippers cannot maintain a suit in equity to prevent the filing or enforcement of a schedule of rates. The case of Columbus Iron & Steel Co. v. Kanawha & M. R. Co. (C. C.) 171 Fed. 713, is a case in which the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of West Virginia denied a shipper an injunction to prevent a railroad company from filing with the Commission its schedule of rates, on the principle that it must first go before that Commission for its action. I shall only refer to the able and laborious opinion filed in that case by Judge Keller, as a strong support for the position which we hold. Judge Keller's decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals of the fourth circuit, February 14, 1910. An advance opinion written by Judge Pritchard is before me, in which he approves strongly the following conclusion enunciated in Judge Keller's opinion: "I conclude, therefore, that a proper construction of the act of February 4, 1887, forbids the exercise of jurisdiction in a case like the present, because it is inconsistent with the purposes of that act as expressed therein, and as construed and expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States in the leading cases of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. supra; Southern R. Co. v. Tift, 206 U. S. 428, 51 L. ed. 1124, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 709." And Judge Pritchard says: "This is a clear and concise statement of the question to be determined. In other words, is the relief sought by the appellant compatible with the act to regulate commerce? Does the interstate commerce act, . . . as it now stands, contemplate that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have, primarily, exclusive jurisdiction over matters pertaining to fixing rates, and determining as to whether the rates filed by the railroads are fair and just? From an examination of the interstate commerce act it is apparent that the carrier alone can initiate the proposed rate. A rate thus proposed, after having been filed in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the term of thirty days, becomes effective, and at that time the Interstate Commerce Commission assumes complete jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It has been repeatedly held that the fixing of rates is a legislative, and not a judicial, function, and, in this instance, Congress has provided that the carrier shall, in the first instance, establish the rate. In the case of Southern P. Co. v. Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. 42 C. C. A. 12, 101 Fed. 779, the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit passed upon this question. The 4th section of the syllabus in that case reads as follows: 'It is not within the legitimate province of a court of equity, in a controversy between interstate carriers and shippers, to interpose and fix a maximum freight rate, either upon an independent consideration of what is a reasonable charge, or by relation to some other rate then or theretofore in force, and thereupon enjoin the carrier from demanding more than the rate so established, inasmuch as such an order effectually deprives an interstate carrier of the right to fix its rates in the first instance, and to change the same, which power, as it seems, is conceded to the carrier by the interstate commerce act.' [178 Fed. 261.] The judge then made an extensive extract from the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. United States (decided by the Supreme Court January 10, 1910) 215 U. S. 481, 54 L. ed. 292, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 164, as supporting the decisions.

The circuit court of appeals on the same date, in two other cases, held the same. Houston Coal & Coke Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 178 Fed. 266, and Powhatan Coal & Coke Co. v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 178 Fed. 266. I here refer to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. United States (decided by the Supreme Court of the United States January 10, 1910), supra, holding the same doctrine. Great reliance is placed by counsel for the coal company upon the case of Southern R. Co. v. Tift, supra. We find in its syllabus that, "although an action at law for damages to recover unreasonable railroad rates which have been exacted in accordance with the schedule of rates as filed is forbidden by the interstate commerce act (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co. 204 U. S. 426, 51 L. ed. 553, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350), the circuit court may entertain jurisdiction of a bill in equity to restrain the filing or enforcement of a schedule of unreasonable rates, or a change to unjust or unreasonable rates." The question presented in this case was not before the court, and the matter contained in that syllabus was not decided, and the proposition is erroneous. The opinion said, after referring to the Abilene Case: 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"We are not required to say, however, that because an action at law for damages to recover unreasonable rates which have been exacted in accordance with the schedule of rates as filed is forbidden by the interstate commerce act, a suit in equity is also forbidden, to prevent a filing or enforcement . . . of unreasonable rates, or a change to unjust or unreasonable rates." That was no express decision that an injunction would lie to prevent the filing of the schedule. It was not necessary to decide it in the case. It will be seen in Judge Keller's opinion in the Columbus Coal Company Case, supra, that he regards this Tift Case as supporting the proposition that an injunction will not lie to arrest the filing of a schedule with the Commission. I so regard the Tift Case when properly construed. The force attributed to the Tift Case cannot be sustained in view of the comment upon it by the United States Supreme Court in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. United States (January 10, 1910), supra, the opinion saying: "Nor is there anything in the contention that the decision in Southern R. Co. v. Tift, supra, qualifies the ruling in the Abilene Case, and is an authority supporting the right to resort to the courts in advance of action by the Commission, for relief against unreasonable rates or unjust discriminatory practices which, from their nature, primarily require action by the Commission." I would also refer to the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois C. R. Co. (decided by the United States Supreme Court January 10, 1910) 215 U. S. 452, 54 L. ed. 280, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 155, as supporting our position. It is useless to prolong this opinion by further reference to these cases, as they are accessible to all.

Brief of counsel relies upon the claim of unlawful combination between the Norfolk & Western Company and other railroads, as contrary to the Sherman anti-trust law; but we do not think that that act will sustain this injunction bill. It seems that a person injured by a conspiracy contrary to that act may recover damages; but he cannot have an injunction, as that is a remedy to be used only by the government. Minnesota v. Northern Securities Co. 194 U. S. 48, 48 L. ed. 870, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 598. This principle will be sustained by Southern Indiana Exp. Co. v. United States Exp. Co. (C. C.) 88 Fed. 659, affirmed by the circuit court of appeals, 35 C. C. A. 172, 92 Fed. 1022. See also Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miami S. S. Co. 30 C. C. A. 142, 52 U. S. App. 732, 86 Fed. 407, and Greer, M. & Co. v. Stoller (C. C.) 77 Fed. 1.

Decree affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

J. B. SMITHWICK

v.

W. H. WHITLEY, Appt.

(152 N. C. 368, 67 S. E. 914.)

Usury — unearned interest.

Exacting payment of the legal interest which will accrue, prior to the maturity of the debt, as a condition to accepting payment of the principal and releasing purchase-money notes secured by mortgage on real estate, does not constitute usury.

(April 20, 1910.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged usury practised on plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Small, MacLean, & McMullan for appellant.

Messrs. Ward & Grimes, for appellee:

The charging of interest until maturity constituted usury.

Taylor v. Parker, 137 N. C. 418, 49 S. E. 921; Moore v. Cameron, 93 N. C. 51; State v. Voight, 90 N. C. 741; Burwell v.

Burgwyn, 100 N. C. 339, 6 S. E. 409; Gore v. Lewis, 109 N. C. 539, 13 S. E. 909; Miller v. Life Ins. Co. 118 N. C. 612, 54 Am. St. Rep. 741, 24 S. E. 484.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff testified that the ten notes secured by mortgage and dated December 30, 1900, were given for the purchase money of a tract of land purchased by plaintiff from defendant, and bore 6 per cent interest from date. Each note was in sum of $46.99, and one matured January 1st each year. On December 3, 1905, the notes due January 1, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905 were due and unpaid. The remaining notes were not due. The plaintiff then sold the land to Tilman Paul, and on December 5, 1905, they both went to Whitley to pay the purchase-money debt and have the notes and mortgage surrendered and canceled. The defendant refused to accept payment for the notes not due, and refused to surrender the mortgage unless plaintiff paid the notes not yet due in full. In order to procure the surrender of his notes and mortgage, plaintiff paid the entire debt in full, including the $44.62 called in the record "unearned interest" on the notes not due. Whereupon defendant surrendered the notes and mortgage.

Note. — Usury: exacting payment of interest for full term upon payment of debt before maturity.

The case of Savannah Sav. Bank v. Logan, 99 Ga. 291, 25 S. E. 692, is sufficiently set out in the foregoing opinion.

It was said in Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 458, that a case of paying a debt before it was due, and therefore no usury, was involved where a note was given for the aggregate amount of several notes one of which was not due, and the former was discounted at the highest rate, with the result that interest was twice charged upon the undue note for the time it still had to run.

Other cases have been found in which the general question of accelerating the maturity of an obligation is involved, the difference between those and the foregoing cases being that in those cases provision for the acceleration of maturity was made at the time the debt was contracted. This difference would seem to go to the intention of the parties, which is the true test of usury.

It was held in Kilpatrick v. Germania L. Ins. Co. 95 App. Div. 287, 88 N. Y. Supp. 628, that a stipulation in a bond and mortgage for $80,000, that the obligor should have the privilege of paying the principal sum, with accrued interest, before the maturity of the debt, upon payment in addition thereto of the sum of $1,000, did not constitute a corrupt and usurious agreement, but merely provided an indemnity to the mortgagee for the relinquishment of the investment.

And it was held in Kornegay v. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. 91 Miss. 551, 44 So. 783, that the objection of usury could not prevail where the by-laws of a building association provided that a borrower could pay the debt before maturity, but only at annual periods from the date of the contract, and a borrower whose bond and mortgage had such provision incorporated into them expressly agreed, before the maturity of the debt and between annual periods, that, if the company would then accept payment, she would pay on the basis of 10 per cent at the end of the next annual period after date of payment.

In McCrary v. Woodard, 122 Ga. 793, 50 S. E. 941, it was held that there was no usury where, before the maturity of some of several notes which were payable at different times, and each of which included interest to its maturity, an action was brought on all of them, under a stipulation that if any of them should not be paid at maturity, all should become due, but the judgment was not rendered until after the maturity of the last note. The court said, however, that if the judgment had been rendered before the maturity of one or more of the notes, the debtor would have been entitled to a reduction in an amount representing the interest unearned at the time of the rendition of the judgment. In answer-

Our statute entitled "Penalty for Usury" (Revisal 1905, § 1951), prohibits "the taking, receiving, reserving, or charging a greater rate of interest than 6 per centum per annum, either before or after the interest may accrue, when knowingly done." In this respect it is similar to many of the usury statutes of this country. While usury laws differ in some respects, there are certain principles which are universal in their application to all. The object of the law is to save borrowers from oppression, and to prevent extortion on them when money is loaned or credit is otherwise extended. Therefore it is universally held that, "in order that a transaction shall fall within the prohibition of the statutes against usury, it is essential that it should be a contract for the forbearance of an existing indebtedness or a loan of money." See 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 464, § 4, and note 5, where a large number of cases are cited in support of the text. Struthers v. Drexel, 122 U. S. 487, 30 L. ed. 1216, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1293. There is no exception to this universal rule that there must be an extension of credit, and an illegal compensation for it knowingly taken, in order to constitute usury. This is recognized in the earliest cases on the subject up to the present time.

In Spurrier v. Mayoss, 1 Ves. Jr. 527, in 1792, Lord Commissioner Eyre said: "Usury is taking more than the law allows upon a loan, or, as I read it, for forbearance of a debt." Berkley v. Walmsley, 5 Esp. 11;

Barclay v. Walmsley, 4 East, 55. In this last case Lord Ellenborough said: "To constitute usury, there must either be a direct loan and a taking of more than legal interest for the forbearance of repayment. . . . Here [there] was no loan or forbearance, only a mere anticipation of the payment of a debt by the party before the time when by law he could be called upon for it." Webb on Usury lays it down as universally held that usury cannot be established unless it is shown that a loan of money or its equivalent was contemplated by the parties. Section 20, citing an array of cases. To same effect is Tyler on Usury, p. 92: "Where there is no right to demand payment, there can be no forbearance, and, if no forbearance, no usury." Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Cranch, C. C. 206, Fed. Cas. No. 8,434; Lesley v. Johnson, 41 Barb. 359. In 47 American Edition of Century Digest, title Usury, are to be found innumerable cases sustaining this proposition, and that "anticipation of payment by paying a debt in full before due is not usury." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 465, says: "The payment of an indebtedness by the debtor before maturity is not a loan or forbearance." It is essential to constitute usury that the lender shall at all events be entitled to demand repayment of the money loaned. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, supra, citing many cases in notes; 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1483. Where the transaction shows it is not for the loan of money or goods, nor for the forbearance of an existing debt, ing the objection that such an agreement as here presented constituted usury, because the whole sum, with interest, might have become due upon default in payment of any note, the court in Goodale v. Wallace, 19 S. D. 405, 117 Am. St. Rep. 962, 103 N. W. 651, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 545, said that such stipulation imposed a penalty which the mortgagors could avoid by prompt payment of the notes when due.

In Moore v. Cameron, 93 N. C. 51, where the debtor gave his bond for a sum for five years, and other bonds for the instalments of interest, and there was a provision that, upon default in payment of any bond, those remaining should become due, the court said that it preferred to construe the agreement so as not to ascribe to the parties an intention to violate the usury laws, and held that it was intended that upon such default the obligee should be entitled to collect the principal sum with accrued interest, and that the remaining bonds should be surrendered.

So, it was held in Dugan v. Lewis, 70 Tex. 246, 12 L.R.A. 93, 23 Am. St. Rep. 332, 14 S. W. 1024, that a stipulation in a deed of trust to secure notes and interest coupons, that, in default of any payment, the whole sum of money secured should become due at the lender's option, was to be construed as a penalty, and should not be enforced except upon the cancellation of the unearned interest notes, and that it therefore did not make the contract usurious.

On the other hand it was said in Seymour Opera House Co. v. Thurston, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 417, 45 S. W. 815: "Where the right to declare the debt due in case of default on the part of the maker of the note is contained in the contract, the time of maturity should not be reckoned only to the day on which the maturity was afterwards declared, as contended for by appellant, but to the day fixed in the written contract in good faith for the maturity, with grace added, unless it is waived. This rule may sometimes result in requiring the maker to pay more for the use of money than the rate fixed and limited by law would permit, but it would be on account of the subsequent default of the maker, for which the holder of the note ought not to be held responsible, unless such provision was made as a device to cover usury."

As to inclusion of days of grace in computing interest as usury, see the note to Sullins v. Farmers' Exch. Bank, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 839.

it cannot be usurious. Stockwell v. Holmes, 33 N. Y. 53.

The identical question presented by this appeal has been determined by the supreme court of Georgia as follows (Savannah Sav. Bank v. Logan, 99 Ga. 291, 25 S. E. 692): "Where a debt, including both principal and interest, and due by instalments, is paid according to the terms of the contract, is free from usury, the transaction is not rendered usurious by the voluntary payment of the debt in full before some of the instalments matured, although as a result the creditor would receive in the aggregate a sum amounting to more than the principal and the maximum legal rate of interest." In reference to this question, Webb says (§ 29): "The test of usury in a contract is whether it would, if [fully] performed, result in securing a greater rate of profit on the subject-matter than is allowed by law,"—citing a number of cases.

Tested by these principles, the defendant cannot be held to have taken usury for either a loan or a forbearance. Lord Ellenborough said in a similar case, supra: "The defendant's conduct may not be liberal or praiseworthy, but it is not usury." It is not claimed that the original transaction when the defendant sold the land to plaintiff was usurious, or that defendant would have received more than 6 per cent interest had the notes run to maturity. It is admitted that the defendant was not required by law to accept payment of the unmatured notes before maturity, or to surrender the mortgage. If defendant had a good investment, he had the right to hold on to it, and, if plaintiff desired to be released from his lawful and binding contract to pay interest until maturity of the debt, defendant had a right to exact payment of the $44 as compensation for such release. Defendant had as much right to sell his solvent debt at a premium to the plaintiff as to anyone else. The defendant was called upon to surrender a perfectly good investment, untainted with usury, and not for an extension of credit or forbearance on an obligation the debtor could not meet. The transaction, as stated by plaintiff, is the very reverse of a loan, an extension of credit or a forbearance, without which there can be no usury. It put an end to credit, instead of giving it.

There is no case in our Reports sustaining the contention of the plaintiff. In Taylor v. Parker, 137 N. C. 418, 49 S. E. 921, cited by plaintiff, there was a bonus of $35 paid for further extension of the debt. It was the reverse of the transaction under consideration. We are of opinion that his 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Honor erred in rendering judgment against defendant.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

J. H. HUDSON et al.

v.

V. J. McARTHUR et al., Impleaded, etc.,
Appts.

(152 N. C. 445, 67 S. E. 995.)

Officer — failure to settle account — liability to sureties.

1. Failure of county commissioners to effect a proper settlement with a tax collector, and require him to exhibit the necessary receipts for one term before entering upon the duties of a succeeding one, is not the cause of injury to persons signing his bond for the succeeding term, through losses occasioned by his embezzlement during such term and afterwards, so as to give the sureties a cause of action against the commissioners for their negligence.

Same — embezzlement — negligence — liability.

2. The failure of county commissioners to effect a settlement with the tax collector, and require him to exhibit the necessary receipts for one year before placing the duplicates of the next year in his hands, as required under penalty by statute, does not render them liable to the sureties on his bond, who are compelled to make good money which he collects and fails to account for under the new duplicates.

(Brown and Walker, JJ., dissent.)

Note. — Liability of public officer to sureties of another public officer for loss sustained by them through former's neglect to require proper settlement of accounts.

The little authority disclosed upon this question is in harmony with HUDSON v. McARTHUR.

In Held v. Bagwell, 58 Iowa, 139, 12 N. W. 226, it was held that the fact that county supervisors failed to require one re-elected county treasurer to produce and account for the funds and property in his hands at the expiration of his previous term, and the approval of his bond, in violation of law, without any accounting by him, did not render the commissioners individually liable to the sureties on the treasurer's bond. The court said: "The defendant, as a public officer, was charged with the duty of approving the bond of the treasurer. This was a duty to be discharged for the benefit of the public. He was required, in approving the bond, to act

A PPEAL by defendants, V. J. McArthur et al., from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sampson County overruling as to them a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover the sum paid on a certain surety bond, which losses were alleged to have been caused by the negligent performance by them of certain of their duties as county commissioners. Reversed.

Statement by Manning, J.:

The action was originally brought by J. H. Hudson, "on behalf of himself and all other bondsmen of A. W. Aman, who will come in and aid in the prosecution." Later, by an order made at February term, 1908, Levett Warren, J. H. Turlington, and C. H. Fisher were made parties plaintiff, and A. W. Aman was made a party defendant. V. J. McArthur, A. T. Herring, and George Highsmith composed the board of commissioners of Sampson county, and George E. Butler was the county attorney. A. W. Aman, the other defendant, was the sheriff of the county and acting treasurer. The plaintiffs were the sureties on his official bond. They alleged that Aman, while sheriff, embezzled the county funds, and each of the plaintiffs was compelled to pay $418.50, except J. H. Turlington, who paid $94 additional. The particular breaches of duty by the defendant commissioners, for which the plaintiffs seek in this action to recover from them, as individuals, the several sums paid by them as sureties on the sheriff's bond, are thus stated in the complaint:

"(a) The plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief aver, that the defendant commissioners negligently failed to require of said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, the settlements required by statute in February, May, and September, for the years A. D. 1905 and 1906, respectively.

"(b) The plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief aver, that the said defendants, V. J. McArthur, A. T. Herring, and George Highsmith, the board of county commissioners, as aforesaid, of Sampson county, were required to demand of the said sheriff and treasurer, A. W. Aman, the first Monday in December, 1904, before they allowed him to re-enter the duties of his said office, his receipts in full for the taxes which he had collected, and which he should have collected, for Sampson county for previous years, as set out in Revisal 1905, § 2812, and that they failed to do so, but, on the contrary, allowed said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, to re-enter upon the duties of his said office, and to renew his said bond, before he had produced before the said board the receipt in full for taxes which he had, or should have, collected.

"(c) That said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, failed to collect and settle the taxes of said county, placed in his hands to collect, for the year 1905, or produce his receipts for the same, before he received his tax list from the said board for the interest of the county to the end that the public money of the county would be secured to its treasury. He was not required to look after the interest of the sureties upon the bond, or to protect them from liability which they might incur by signing the bond of an unfaithful public officer. If the defendant approved the bond when the treasurer was in default, he violated his duty to the public. The plaintiff has no remedy against defendant for losses sustained by reason of this violation of public duty, for the reason he violated no duty he owed to plaintiff. . . . The allegations that defendant's act in approving the bond was done 'wilfully' and 'maliciously,' and 'to oppress' plaintiff, do not show that it was done in the violation of a duty owed by defendant to plaintiff. In the absence of such an allegation, the plaintiff's petition fails to present a cause of action against defendant."

It has been held in actions on the bonds of tax collectors and county treasurers that the county commissioners, as the representatives of the county, owed no duty to inform sureties on the bonds of the former officers that such officers were in default at the time of the execution of the bond. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Frownfelter v. State, 66 Md. 80, 5 Atl. 410; Cawley v. People, 95 Ill. 249. The question of the commissioners' individual liability, however, was not decided.

It has been held that it is not the duty of a county treasurer to examine the accounts of a tax collector, and report to the one intending to become surety for the latter, and that, if he does so, he is the agent of the surety, and the latter is not relieved from liability by reason of false answers made in the report. Com. use of Montgomery Ct. v. American Bonding & T. Co. 205 Pa. 372, 54 Atl. 1034. It is, however, implied in this case that the treasurer would be liable for the damage caused to the surety by his false answers. The court said: "The treasurer was not bound to answer the questions at all. When Godschall did undertake to answer them, he was bound as a man of veracity to tell the truth; a public officer may not be bound to give information or answer questions, but when as a man he voluntarily does so, the moral obligation on him as a man to tell the truth remains in full force. In his answers to the questions he did not tell the truth; Loper was a defaulter for every year he had been collector."

to collect the taxes for the year 1906, and the said defendant board permitted said Aman to receive and collect the taxes for the year 1906 for said county before the said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, had settled the taxes for the previous year, or had produced his receipts for the same, as provided by § 5241 of the Revisal of 1905 of North Carolina; and the said board of commissioners and the defendants V. J. McArthur, A. T. Herring, and George Highsmith as members thereof, failed and neglected to appoint a tax collector as provided for by said § 5241 of the Revisal of 1905 of North Carolina, and permitted said A. W. Aman to receive the tax list for said Sampson county for the year 1906, and to collect the taxes for said county for that year, without requiring him to perform his duties as aforesaid, as required by law; and failed and neglected to appoint a tax collector, as set out above.

"(7) That some time prior to the first Monday in September, 1906, one O. F. Herring, one of the sureties on said Aman's bond with these plaintiffs, warned the defendants V. J. McArthur, A. T. Herring, and George Highsmith, the board of county commissioners, through their chairman, V. J. McArthur, not to turn over the tax books for Sampson county for the year 1906 to said A. W. Aman, until a full and complete settlement was had by said commissioners with said defendant, A. W. Aman, for all arrears of taxes; that he had heard that A. W. Aman was financially embarrassed and behind in his accounts with the county, and that, as one of the bondsmen, he objected to the tax books of said county for the year 1906 being turned over to said A. W. Aman before a full settlement was had.

"(8) That, notwithstanding said warning, the defendant commissioners negligently failed to make a proper or full settlement with said A. W. Aman on the first Monday in September, 1906, and carelessly and negligently, and contrary to their duty as required of them by law, as the plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief aver, turned over the tax books of Sampson county for the year 1906 to said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, and allowed him to collect said taxes without requiring of him a full settlement for the taxes of the previous year, and when he was at that time behind in his accounts with the said county, as the plaintiffs are informed and believe. Plaintiffs allege, upon information and belief, that, at the said meeting of the board of commissioners of the defendants V. J. McArthur, A. T. Herring, and George Highsmith, the first Monday in September, 1906, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) to settle with the said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, the said defendant commissioners ascertained the amounts that said A. W. Aman was behind and was due the county, and did not require him to exhibit the money received from the collection of taxes, but looked at the tax books in his hands then uncollected, and received those uncollected tax receipts then in said Aman's hands, in settlement of the balances said Aman was then due the county as sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, and left those said uncollected tax receipts for previous years in the hands of said A. W. Aman, sheriff and treasurer as aforesaid, and upon that kind of alleged settlement, which the plaintiffs say was negligent and careless, turned over to said Aman for collection the tax books for Sampson county for the next succeeding year, to wit, the year 1906."

The defendant commissioners and Butler demurred to the complaint upon various grounds, and the demurrer was sustained as to Butler, from which there was no appeal. It was overruled as to the commissioners, and they appealed.

Messrs. Falson & Wright for appellees.

Manning, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Passing the question as to the misjoinder of the parties plaintiff, and the joinder of defendant Aman as a party defendant,—the plaintiffs having each a separate, and not a joint, cause of action against the defendant commissioners, if they have any cause of action at all, and the cause of action against Aman being distinct from, and arising from, totally different facts from that alleged against the defendant commissioners,—we proceed to consider if the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of any one, or all, of the plaintiffs against the defendant commissioners. The argument addressed to us in support of his Honor's ruling is rested upon §§ 2812, 5241, 5250, Revisal 1905,—that these sections impose mandatory duties upon the boards of county commissioners, and that defendants violated these duties in the manner of making the settlement with Aman, the sheriff, and these violations of duty directly caused the loss to plaintiffs, to recover which they have brought this action against the defendants. The liability of the board of commissioners for a failure to comply in good faith with §§ 2812, 2813, Revisal 1905, is declared by § 2814, Revisal 1905, to be "for all loss sustained in the collection of taxes, on motion to be made by the solicitor of the district." The evident purpose of the section is to further protect and safeguard the public revenue, and to further assure its honest collection and application, by subjecting the commissioners to liability if they fail to require the proper bonds from the collecting officer, and this is further enforced and somewhat extended by § 313, Revisal 1905, which provides that "every commissioner who approves an official bond which he knows to be, or which by reasonable diligence he could have discovered to have been, insufficient in the penal sum, or in the security thereof, shall be liable as if he were a surety thereto, and may be sued accordingly by any person having a cause of action on said bond." The bond of the defaulting sheriff in the present case was not deficient either in the penal sum, or in the security thereof; the plaintiffs, as his sureties, have made good his default, and paid the money to the proper authorities. The obligation of the bond has been met, and the bond has been discharged. This action is not on the bond. If any one of the defendants permitted the defendant Aman, on the first Monday of December, 1902, or on the first Monday of December, 1904, these being the first Mondays in December next after his election, and he being a former sheriff, to give his bonds, or re-enter upon the duties of his office, until he had produced before the board the receipt in full of every such officer for taxes which he had or should have collected, then such commissioner, under § 3590, Revisal 1905, was guilty of a misdemeanor, and also liable to the penalty of $200 for each offense, "to be paid to any person who shall sue for the same." Bray v. Barnard, 109 N. C. 44, 13 S. E. 729; State ex rel. Lee v. Dunn, 73 N. C. 595. If the defendants failed to require such receipts on the first Monday in December, 1904, the plaintiffs were not undamaged in the particulars alleged, for they only became sureties on the bond then given, and the default of their principal, for which they allege they were compelled to answer on that bond, occurred afterwards in his failure to honestly account for the taxes for the fiscal years of 1905 and 1906. So that, if the commissioners failed to observe the requirements of § 2812, Revisal 1905, such failure did not injure plaintiffs in the manner alleged by them, though such failure might have subjected them to indictment, and to an action for the penalty prescribed by the statute.

Coming now to the consideration of §§ 5241, 5250, Revisal 1905, and the particulars in which it is alleged these sections were violated by the defendant commissioners in their settlement September 1, 1906, with Sheriff Aman, we quote the pertinent provisions of them: Section 5241 provides: "Provided, the sheriff or tax collector shall not collect the taxes for any years until he shall have settled in full with the state and county for the taxes of the previous year (if he was sheriff or tax collector), and given the bond required by law; and if upon examination, the commissioners are not satisfied with the solvency of the surety to said bonds, they may require new bonds to be given. Before receiving the tax duplicate, he shall produce the receipts of the state and county, if he was the sheriff or tax collector for the previous year, to the clerk of the board of commissioners, and in the event the sheriff fails to produce the aforesaid receipts or give the required bond, the board of commissioners shall appoint a tax collector, who shall give bond," etc. And § 5250, Revisal 1905, provides: "Provided, further, that it shall be unlawful for any sheriff or tax collector, in accounting with the board of county commissioners for either the state or county taxes, to exhibit or present in said county any money not actually derived from the collection of taxes, and any such sheriff or tax collector so offending shall forfeit a penalty of $500, one half of which shall belong to any person who shall sue for the same, and the other half to the county in which the sheriff resides." It is alleged as a fact, and the demurrer admits the fact, that the settlement by the county commissioners with Sheriff Aman in September, 1906, was not made in the manner directed by these two sections. It is contended that the statutes are mandatory, and the acts of the county commissioners were ministerial, leaving in them the exercise of no discretion, and that the delivery of the tax duplicates to the sheriff enabled him to embezzle the funds, to the injury of the plaintiffs, and therefore the defendants are liable. If we concede the mandatory character of the statutes, and the ministerial character of the acts to be done by the commissioners, involving the exercise of no discretion, we do not think the injury to plaintiffs complained of necessarily or by direct connection follows.

which case the doctrine stated by Judge Cooley in Raynsford v. Phelps, 43 Mich. 342, 38 Am. Rep. 189, 5 N. W. 403, is disapproved as not in harmony with the weight of authority and reason), the supreme court of Indiana says: "It is not enough in any case for a plaintiff who seeks to recover for an injury caused by the negligence of another, to show simply injury and negligence; he must also show that there was a breach of duty owing to him. This general rule applies with peculiar force to persons who sue for injuries caused by official misconduct. It is not every person who sustains an injury from the negligence of a public officer that can maintain an action on the officer's bond. In general, a public officer is liable only to the person to whom the particular duty is owing, and the ruling question in all cases of the kind is as to whether the plaintiff shows the breach of a particular duty owing to him. It is not sufficient to show a general public duty, or a duty to some other person directly interested. Judge Cooley says: 'But the sheriff can only be liable to the person to whom the particular duty was owing; the party to whom he is bound by the duty of his office.'" In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, 3d ed. § 174, it is said: "It is a general rule that, whenever an action is brought for a breach of duty imposed by statute, the party bringing it must show that he has an interest in the performance of the duty, and that the duty was imposed for his benefit." In this connection the same learned writers, at § 166, observe: "In speaking of the liability of nonjudicial public officers to a civil action by private persons, it will be found convenient, if not indeed necessary to a proper understanding of the decided cases, to make a distinction between those officers whose duties are of a general public nature, and who act for the profit of the public at large, and that other class of officers who are appointed to act, not for the public in general, but for such individuals as may have occasion to employ them for a specific fee paid." It is clear, at least, that the county commissioners belong to the first of the two classes,— "officers whose duties are of a general public nature, and who act for the profit of the public at large."

The above authorities state the doctrine upon which plaintiffs must depend to maintain this action as strongly in their favor as the decided cases and text writers warrant; but, even so stated, we do not think the action can be maintained against the defendant commissioners. The acts complained of were public acts, done by the commissioners in their corporate capacity. The clear purpose of these statutory requirements was to impose duties for the benefit and protection of the public revenue, to provide more vigilant measures for its safety for the public good and benefit. They prescribe public duties to be discharged by the commissioners. The protection of the plaintiffs, as sureties upon the sheriff's bond, is clearly not within the purview of the statutes; the taking of a bond with approved security was itself to further assure the public. To make good the default of the sheriff was the express obligation of the bond signed by the plaintiffs; it was the guaranty of his honesty and fidelity. By the statutes, to enforce promptness, accuracy, and completeness of settlements, penalties are imposed both upon the commissioners and the sheriff. The commissioners are made liable also to indictment. These liabilities are imposed by express statutes. The legislature has not yet deemed it wise or proper to impose the additional liability upon the commissioners contended for by plaintiffs, and, in the absence of express statutory enactment, or of some well-settled principle of law constraining us to so hold, we do not think the commissioners are liable to the plaintiffs. In addition, we do not think the injury suffered by plaintiffs, and the loss sustained by them, was the necessary, direct, or immediate result of the defendants' acts. They do not stand in the relation of cause and effect; the turning over the tax books was simply a condition, the injury was a post hoc, but not an ergo propter hoc. The direct and immediate and only cause of the loss sustained by plaintiffs was the dishonesty and embezzlement of the sheriff, their principal, whose honesty and fidelity was the express obligation of their undertaking. The defendant commissioners could have done all they did, and yet no injury to the plaintiffs resulted; they could have observed the statutes to their very letter, and the loss to the plaintiffs have been the same. The sheriff could have embezzled the county funds with or without a strict settlement. There is therefore no causal connection between the acts alleged and the loss sustained. In addition to the authorities cited, the following sustain the conclusion we have reached: 2 Abbott. Mun. Corp. §§ 672, 673; McConnell v. Dewey, 5 Neb. 385; School Dist. No. 80 v. Burress, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 554, 89 N. W. 609; Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 598, 599; Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. School Dist. 79 Mo. App. 665; Bassett v. Fish, 75 N. Y. 303; Heeney v. Sprague, 11 R. I. 456, 23 Am. Rep. 502; 1 Sutherland, Damages, 56; Nelson County v. Northote, 6 Dak. 378, 6 L.R.A. 230, 43 N. W. 897. In its final analysis, to sustain the contentions of the plaintiffs would 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

be to make the members of the board of county commissioners liable to the sureties on the official bonds of the sheriffs and other officers, whose performance of duty they are required by statutes to supervise, if the commissioners fail to discharge their statutory duties in the manner prescribed by law, and this to be held regardless of whether a particular duty was owing to the particular person complaining, and whether there was any causal connection between the violation of the statute and the injury complained of. We cannot so hold.

In our opinion, the demurrer filed by the defendant commissioners should have been sustained, and the order of his Honor overruling it is reversed.

Brown, J., dissenting:

In discussing this question it must be borne in mind that every allegation of the complaint is admitted in manner and form as stated. Among other allegations the plaintiffs aver that after they had become sureties on the official bonds of the sheriff, the defendants knowingly and illegally permitted the tax books to be delivered to the sheriff in direct violation of the statute of the state. Revisal 1905, vol. 2, § 5241. And plaintiffs aver that, in addition to the tax lists of 1905, those of 1906 were delivered to the sheriff, while they were his bondsmen, in violation of the same law. They further aver that prior to September, 1906, before those lists had been placed in Sheriff Aman's hands for collection, the defendants were notified by plaintiffs not to turn over the tax books for the year 1906 to Aman, until a full settlement was had by the commissioners with Aman for all arrears of taxes; that Aman was financially embarrassed and behind in his accounts with the county, and that the bondsmen objected to the tax books of the county for the year 1906 being turned over before a full settlement was had; that, notwithstanding said warning, the defendant commissioners negligently failed to make a proper or full settlement with Aman on the first Monday in September, 1906, and negligently, and contrary to their duty as required of them by law, delivered the tax books of Sampson county for the year 1906 to Aman, and allowed him to collect said taxes, without requiring of him a full settlement for the taxes of the previous year, and when he was at that time behind in his accounts with the said county. The plaintiffs further aver that, in consequence of such violation of law, they have been compelled to pay considerable sums of money recovered of them by legal process on said tax bonds.

The statute declares in express terms that the sheriff shall not be permitted to collect the taxes for any years until he shall have settled in full with the state and county for the taxes of the previous year. A pretended and fraudulent settlement, such as is alleged in the complaint to have taken place, will not meet the demands of the law. The complaint expressly charges a wilful violation of the statute by the defendants, and upon demurrer that fact is admitted. The statute is mandatory, and expressly forbids the very act the defendants are charged with committing. In my opinion this intentional violation of a positive statute forbidding the act renders the defendants not only liable to penalty and indictment, but also to such damages as may be directly sustained by those bondsmen of the sheriff who had previously assumed such obligation and must per force bear the loss. The board of commissioners possesses quasi judicial, legislative, and administrative powers. A wilful or negligent disregard of any of their duties of whatever character by its members subjects the culpable individual to the pains and penalties of the statute (Revisal 1905, § 3590); but personal liability for damages will not generally be incurred in the absence of malice, unless the wrongful act be purely ministerial in its nature. The wrongful and negligent acts complained of involve no exercise of judgment and discretion. Official action is judicial only when it is the result of judgment and discretion. A judicial inquiry is one which investigates, declares, and carries out existing law, and when performed in good faith, however erroneously done, the officer is immune so far as legal liability is concerned. Official action is ministerial when it is the result of performing a duty imposed by law, the details of which are defined and prescribed with such certainty that nothing is left to the judgment or discretion of the officer. Therefore a wilful violation of a statute prohibiting the doing of an act can never be seriously regarded as a judicial function. It is plain that, if the allegations of the complaint be true, the defendants, in delivering the tax lists to the sheriff, were not performing a quasi judicial function, and cannot be clothed with the immunity of a judicial officer. They were given no discretion in the matter, but were expressly forbidden by the statute to turn over the lists, unless the sheriff had settled in full for the previous year.

It is alleged that the defendants in performing this purely ministerial duty were guilty of gross negligence and violation of law. A ministerial officer is not liable for performing a duty imposed by statute, if done with due care. But he is answerable in damages for nonfeasance, misfeasance, or malfeasance. He is liable in a civil action for a failure or refusal to perform his duty, as well as for its negligent or illegal performance. Ferguson v. Kinnoull, 9 Clark & F. 251; Brassey v. MacLean, L. R. 6 P. C. 398; Dow v. Humbert, 91 U. S. 294, 23 L. ed. 368; Throop, Pub. Off. § 726; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 664, and cases cited in notes.

A public official owes to every individual the duty of performing his official acts with reasonable care, and he is consequently liable to any individual having a special and direct interest, who is injured in person or in property by reason of his negligence in performing a ministerial act. This subject is discussed elaborately by Judge Cooley in Raynsford v. Phelps, 43 Mich. 342, 38 Am. Rep. 189, 5 N. W. 403, who says: "It is immaterial that the duty is one primarily imposed on public grounds, and therefore primarily a duty owing to the public; the right of action springs from the fact that the private individual receives a special and peculiar injury from the neglect in performance, which it was in part the purpose of the law to protect him against. It is also immaterial that a failure in performance is made by the law a penal offense." This principle was settled in Great Britain as far back as the reports of Blackstone (Rowning v. Goodchild, 2 W. Bl. 906), wherein it is held that a public officer charged with ministerial duties to perform, in which a private individual has a special interest, is liable to such individual for any injury sustained by him in consequence of the failure to perform such duties. This decision has been approved in this country in the case cited from Michigan. Teall v. Felton, 1 N. Y. 537, 49 Am. Dec. 352, Id. 12 How. 284, 13 L. ed. 990; Lincoln v. Hapgood, 11 Mass. 350; Hayes v. Porter, 22 Me. 371; Jeffries v. Ankeny, 11 Ohio, 372; Brown v. Lester, 21 Miss. 392. The principle is undoubtedly sound, and is not unfamiliar learning in this state. With us it has long been held that a ministerial officer is personally liable for the nonperformance of every duty prescribed by statute, to the party injured, and to the extent of the damage received, and he is also liable criminally to the public. Dunn v. Stone, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law Repos. 261); Hathaway v. Hinton, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 247; Holt v. McLean, 75 N. C. 347; Moretz v. Ray, 75 N. C. 170.

The plaintiffs in this case had assumed heavy obligations for the sheriff on his official bonds, and had a direct and personal interest that those officials to whom he was directly accountable should obey the law prescribed for the protection of sureties, as well as the public generally. The defendants were vested in this matter with no discretionary powers. They acted in defiance of the law, and disobeyed the express words of the statute by placing the tax lists in his hands when the sheriff had not fully settled the taxes for the previous year.

But it is said that, although the defendants may have committed a tort in violating the statute, it is not the proximate cause of plaintiffs' loss. It is generally held that the proximate cause of an injury is one that produces the result, and without which it would not occur, and one from which any man of ordinary prudence could foresee that such result was probable under all of the facts as they existed. This is the idea so well expressed by Mr. Justice Hoke in the often cited case of Ramsbottom v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 41, 50 S. E. 448, in support of which he cites recognized authority. Tested by this definition it is apparent that the wrongful act of the defendants was the proximate cause of plaintiffs' loss.

(1) If the defendants had obeyed the statute and refused to deliver the tax lists of 1906 to the sheriff, unless he settled in full with money collected from taxes for the year 1905, it is impossible that the sheriff could have embezzled the taxes for 1906. That is a self-evident proposition, and need not be discussed.

(2) A man of ordinary prudence could easily foresee that such result was probable under all the facts as they existed. As alleged in the complaint, the defendants had been notified by the sheriff's bondsmen that the sheriff was a defaulter, and had embezzled the tax money of 1905, and they were notified not to place the lists of 1906 in his hands until the law was complied with and a full and complete settlement made for the previous year. A person of ordinary prudence, having the knowledge of the defendants, could easily foresee that if the sheriff had embezzled the taxes for 1905, he would probably embezzle those of 1906. Suppose a merchant forbids his bookkeeper to send money to the bank by a certain messenger because he suspect his honesty, the bookkeeper violates instructions, and the messenger embezzles the money, is not the disobedience of the bookkeeper the direct or proximate cause of the merchant's loss, and can it be maintained that the bookkeeper would not be liable in consequence of his act?

I am of opinion that the duty imposed by the statute was mandatory; that a violation of it was necessarily a ministerial act; that it was the proximate cause of plaintiffs' loss; and that they had such direct interest that they can maintain an action for the culpable negligence of defendants.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice Walker concurs in this opinion.

TOWN OF COLTON, Resp.,
v.

SOUTH DAKOTA CENTRAL LAND COMPANY et al., Appts.

Municipal corporation — nuisance — cattle yards — right to prohibit.

A municipal corporation having authority to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and abate the same, may prevent the maintenance of ordinary railway cattle yards in its residence district.

(April 5, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Minnehaha County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of certain stock yards which were alleged to constitute a nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert F. Riemer, with Mr. S. H. Wright, for appellants:

Nothing can be made a public nuisance by the declaration of a municipal ordinance that it is a public nuisance, if it is not so in fact.

Boyd v. Frankfort, 117 Ky. 199, 111 Am. St. Rep. 240, 77 S. W. 669; Laugel v. Bushnell, 197 Ill. 20, 58 L.R.A. 266, 63 N. E. 1088.

The term police power is not so broad and extensive that a state or a municipality has authority to declare that a thing con-

Note. — Power of municipal corporation to prevent stock yards within city limits.

A careful search discloses but scant authority on this question, no other case having been found directly presenting the point as to whether the power ordinarily vested in municipal corporations of declaring what shall constitute a nuisance, and abating the same, will authorize the municipality to prohibit stock yards within its limits, regardless of the condition in which they are kept. In the reported case the court considered that the trustees of the town, in anticipating the annoying and injurious effects ordinarily produced by such yards, and passing an ordinance against them, were well within their statutory power to declare and abate nuisance.

Messrs. Bates & Parlliman and J. E. McMahon, for respondent:

The state, in the valid exercise of the police power, has the right to define a nuisance, and adopt such measures as may be necessary to prevent, remove, and abate any public nuisance; and can also authorize and empower the proper authorities of any town or city to do the same.

Haney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action the decision of the learned circuit court was substantially as follows:

(1) That plaintiff is, and at all of the times herein mentioned was, a municipal corporation organized and existing as an incorporated town under and by virtue of the laws of the state of South Dakota.

(2) That the defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company and the Farmers' Elevator Company of Colton each is, and at all of the times herein mentioned was, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of South Dakota.

(3) That on January 15, 1907, the board of trustees of said town established an ordinance containing these provisions:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, firm, or corporation to keep or maintain within the district hereinafter described, in the town of Colton, any pen, building, yard, shed, or inclosure wherein any cattle, sheep, or swine are collected, kept, or fed, by the owner, lessee, or occupant of any property therein.

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, firm, or corporation to collect, keep, or feed any cattle, sheep, or swine within any pen, building, yard, shed, or inclosure within said district.

"Sec. 3. Said district shall comprise all that part of the town of Colton within the following boundaries, to wit: Bounded on the east by a line 780 feet east of Iowa

Kan. App. 569, 47 Pac. 988, an ordinance passed by the city authorities defining as a punishable nuisance the keeping of any yard or pen for cattle, swine, or other animals, in such a manner as to become offensive to any person residing in the vicinity, or annoying to the public, was held a valid enactment under a legislative grant of power to the city "to prevent and remove nuisances." The contention that the city had no power to enact the ordinance in question was based upon the fact that while cities of both the first and second class were granted the right to prevent and remove nuisances, only those of the first class (Burlington being of the second class) were allowed to regulate stock yards. Upon this point the court said: "The legal principle claimed will be admitted, but the application is not correct. Under these statutes, a city of either the first or second class has the power to prevent and remove nuisances. This will include everything that comes within the legal definition of a public nuisance. A city of the first class also has the power to suppress hogpens or to regulate them, although they may not be legally a nuisance. A city of the second class has no such power." This view, while opposed to the holding in COLTON v. SOUTH DAKOTA CENTRAL LAND CO., would probably be considered as binding only where there were such statutes as in the Burlington Case.

avenue, on the south by a line 158 feet south of Sixth street, on the west by a line 450 feet west of Glenn avenue, and on the north by a line 680 feet north of First street.

"Sec. 4. Any person, persons, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not to exceed fifty dollars ($50), and each and every day that any such pens, buildings, yards, sheds, or inclosures shall be kept or maintained, or that any cattle, sheep, or swine shall be collected, kept, or fed therein, within said district, shall be deemed a separate and distinct offense.

"Sec. 5. The keeping or maintenance within the district aforesaid, of any such pens, buildings, yards, sheds, or inclosures, or the collecting, keeping, or feeding of any cattle, sheep, or swine therein, shall constitute, and is hereby declared, to be a nuisance."

(4) That prior to January 15, 1907, the said defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company located, built, and erected on land belonging to said South Dakota Central Land Company, and adjacent to the railroad tracks of the defendant South Dakota Central Railway Company, certain pens, yards, buildings, and sheds, at the corner of Sherman avenue and Sixth street, within said town of Colton, for general stock-yard purposes, and for the purpose of collecting, keeping, and feeding cattle, sheep, and swine therein by the patrons of said defendant South Dakota Central Railway Company, and all persons who desired to ship stock over said defendant's railroad, which said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds are located within the said town of Colton and within the district or territory described in § 3 of said ordinance set out in finding No. 3; and that, ever since the building and erection of said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds, and until the commencement of this action, the said defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company kept and maintained said pens, yards, buildings, and sheds for the purposes aforesaid.

(5) That after the passage of said ordinance, and until the commencement of this action, the defendants Farmers' Elevator Company of Colton, L. L. Willard, John C. Smith, and various other persons, used and occupied said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds, and collected, kept, and fed cattle and swine within the same, with the full knowledge and consent of the said defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company.

(6) That the said defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company intend to keep and maintain said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds for general stock-yard purposes in connection with the business of the said South Dakota Central Railway Company, and wherein cattle, sheep, and swine are to be collected, kept, and fed by the patrons of said South Dakota Central Railway Company and by persons who desire to ship cattle, sheep, and swine over its railroad.

(7) That said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds are located within from 450 to 600 feet of the principal business portion of said town of Colton, and are located about 180 feet from the nearest residence in said town. From the foregoing findings of fact, the court now makes and finds the following conclusions of law: (1) That the keeping and maintenance of said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds by the said defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company, for the purposes set out in the fourth and fifth findings of fact, constitutes and is a public nuisance. (2) That the collecting, keeping, and feeding of cattle, sheep, and swine in said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds, as set forth in the foregoing findings of fact, constitutes and is a public nuisance. (3) That the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment against the defendants South Dakota Central Land Company and South Dakota Central Railway Company, perpetually enjoining said defendants from keeping, maintaining, using, or permitting to be used the said pens, buildings, yards, and sheds for the collecting, keeping, or feeding of cattle, sheep, or swine therein, and for costs.

The only question, if any, properly presented by the record, is whether an incorporated town is authorized to prohibit the erection and maintaining of such cattle, sheep, and swine pens as are described in the circuit court decision, within the defined district, regardless of the condition in which such pens may be maintained; in other words, whether the ordinary railway cattle yard in an incorporated town is prima facie a nuisance when located in the residence district. Among the powers expressly conferred by the statute upon the board of trustees of an incorporated town are these: "To declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to prevent, abate, and remove the same, and take such other measures for the preservation of the public health as they shall deem necessary." Rev. Pol. Code, § 1438. Where a municipal corporation is thus clothed with express power to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, its decision, if reviewable by the courts, should be sustained, unless palpably unreasonable. As applicable to this action, a nuisance consists in unlawfully doing an act, or omitting to perform a duty, which act or omission either annoys, injures, or endangers the comfort, repose, health, or safety of others. A public nuisance is one which affects at the same time any considerable number of persons, although the extent of the nuisance or injury inflicted upon the individuals may be unequal. Rev. Civ. Code, §§ 2393, 2394. Within the broad grant of power conferred by the statute, the trustees of the plaintiff town were entitled and required to exercise a sound and sane discretion; to be guided by their knowledge and experience as men; to consider the condition in which railway stock pens or yards usually are maintained; to anticipate the annoying, injurious, and dangerous effects ordinarily produced by such places; to consider the rights of all concerned; and to determine whether, in the usual course of affairs, such pens or yards would constitute a nuisance if located within the district defined by the ordinance. It should be presumed that this important duty was properly and faithfully performed. The phrase "nuisance per se" is misleading. It often has been inappropriately employed. Strictly speaking, no act or omission is a nuisance regardless of surrounding conditions. No one can create a nuisance in the absence of someone affected by the former's act or omission. A slaughterhouse that would annoy no one if situated in an uninhabited gulch might be an intolerable menace to health when located in the residence sections of a city or town. The circumstances may be such as to render the most exquisite music both annoying and injurious. "Since there must be some place where every lawful business or erection may be lawfully located or carried on, the better rule would seem to be that a lawful business or erection is never a nuisance per se, but may become a nuisance by reason of extraneous circumstances, such as being located in an inappropriate place, or being conducted or kept in an improper manner. It may be said, however, that some lawful businesses and erections are prima facie nuisances in certain localities." 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 684. The business of keeping, feeding, shipping, and dealing in cattle, sheep, and swine is in itself entirely legitimate. It required such pens or yards as are described in the circuit court decision. It involves substantial property rights which should not be capriciously ignored. Nevertheless, as everyone "must so use his own rights as not to infringe upon the rights of others" (Rev. Civ. Code, § 2413),

and as the business in question is one which as usually conducted causes a large amount of manure, offal, garbage, and other offensive substances to accumulate where it is conducted, and causes noxious, annoying, and injurious smells which taint the atmosphere in the vicinity where it is carried on, to the annoyance, injury, and discomfort of persons residing or transacting business in the neighborhood of its location, this court cannot say that an ordinance which excludes such business from defined districts, instead of attempting to preserve the public health by regulation within such districts, is so clearly unreasonable as to demand its annulment; on the contrary, the inappropriateness of an urban residence district as a location for an ordinary railway stock yard is too apparent for argument. No function of civil government is more deserving of serious consideration than is the conservation of the public health. The subject of sanitation in cities and towns is everywhere receiving earnest and thoughtful attention. Pure air and pure water are coming to be universally recognized as matters of paramount importance,—matters to which the selfishness of commerce should be compelled to make reasonable concessions.

So we conclude that the ordinance involved is not invalid, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN M. G. BROWN, Appt.,

v.

ROBERT L. BROWN et al.

(— W. Va. —, 67 S. E. 596.)

Partition — right to — remainderman.

One of several remaindermen in land after a life estate cannot have partition during the continuance of the life estate, even though he has acquired that life estate, unless he waives that life estate.

(March 15, 1910.)

Headnote by BRANNON, J.

Note — Right to partition among remaindermen pending life estate.

In absence of statute.

In the absence of statutory provisions authorizing it, remaindermen cannot maintain an action for the partition of land during the existence of the life estate, when the life estate extends to all the premises involved. Culver v. Culver, 2 Root, 278; Berry v. Lewis, 118 Ky. 652, 82 S. W. 252, 84 S. W. 526; Savage v. Savage, 19 Or. 112, 20 Am. St.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit court for Monongalia County in defendants' favor in a suit to compel partition of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moreland, Moreland, & Guy and Cox & Baker for appellant.

Messrs. Donley & Hatfield, for appellees:

A remainderman cannot maintain a suit for partition until the expiration of the life or other precedent estate upon which the estate in remainder is supported, unless the life tenant or other exclusive occupying tenant appears and consents to the partition.

Bice v. Nixon, 34 W. Va. 107, 11 S. E. 1004; Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. 66; Seibel v. Rapp, 85 Va. 28, 6 S. E. 478.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John J. Brown died in August, 1905, having made a will by which he devised real estate in the city of Morgantown to his wife, Mary Ellen Brown, during her life, with remainder to his children, John M. G. Brown, Robert L. Brown, Margaret A. Stoetzer, and three infant grandchildren, children of a dead son, Zalmon Kent Brown. The widow conveyed her life estate to one of said devisees, John M. G. Brown, and he brought a suit in the circuit court of Monongalia county to compel a partition of the land among those entitled. The court dismissed the bill, and John M. G. Brown appeals.

Has John M. G. Brown right to enforce partition? He owns an undivided fourth in remainder subject to the life estate under the will, and he owns that life estate. He cannot maintain a suit for partition by virtue of his remainder. Nor can he have partition unless entitled to immediate possession. A remainderman is not so entitled. This court has decided that a reversioner or remainderman cannot compel partition during the continuance of a particular estate. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. 56; Croston v. Male, 56 W. Va. 205, 107 Am. St. Rep. 918, 49 S. E. 136. That is abundantly established by the authorities there given. If any further authorities were needed, a pile of them will be found in 113 Am. St. Rep. 55, note. But the plaintiff has the life estate of his mother in addition to his undivided fourth in remainder as devisee. Does that life estate give him any additional right that he can add to his estate in remainder? Surely not, because a life tenant cannot compel a partition among remaindermen. A life tenant has not a par-

Rep. 795, 23 Pac. 890; Pabst Brewing Co. v. Melms, 105 Wis. 441, 75 Am. St. Rep. 919, 81 N. W. 882. The reason was that in the absence of statute only one in possession or entitled to present possession could maintain partition.

This is the rule where the life estate is created by will. Schori v. Stephens, 62 Ind. 441; Coon v. Bean, 69 Ind. 474; Lawson v. Bonner, 88 Miss. 235, 117 Am. St. Rep. 738, 40 So. 488; Striker v. So, it applies where the life estate is an estate by the curtesy. Barrett v. Byrne, 21 D. C. 274; Hughes v. Hughes, 30 Hun, 349; Mersereau v. Camp, 42 Misc. 253, 86 N. Y. Supp. 568; Wolfe's Estate, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 340; Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 356, 15 S. E. 56.

The rule also applies to that portion of a deceased husband's lands which has been assigned to the wife for life as and for her dower. Wilkinson v. Stuart, 74 Ala. 198; Hamby v. Hamby (Ala.) 51 So. 732; Moore 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But the rule is otherwise where dower has been assigned, not by metes and bounds, but by giving to the widow one third of the net profits, thus leaving possession and seizure of all the lands in the plaintiffs. Hassell v. Mizell, 41 N. C. (6 Ired. Eq.) 392.

Under statute.

Under statute in Illinois the joint owners of a vested remainder may compel partition among themselves, leaving the life-estate intact, the remainder to be sold and the proceeds divided. Scoville v. Hilliard, 48 Ill. 453; Drake v. Merkle, 153 Ill. 318, 38 N. E. 654; Miller v. Lanning, 211 Ill. 620, 71 N. E. 1115; Deadman v. Yantis, 230 Ill. 243, 120 Am. St. Rep. 291, 82 N. E. 592; Garwood v. Garwood, 244 Ill. 580, 91 N. E. 672.

However, under this statute no partition can be had by the remaindermen until after the death of the life tenant, where the life estate was created by a will which provided for a division of the estate after the decease of the life tenant. Dee v. Dee, 212 Ill. 338, 72 N. E. 420.

Nor are remaindermen entitled to partition, subject to the life estate, where such estate was created by a deed which vested title of interest in estates in remainder, not a cotenant with remaindermen, and nobody can have partition unless he have title to the thing to be partitioned. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1146. A life tenant owning with one or more others a life estate can have that estate divided between himself and co-owners of the life estate; but what colorable right has he to demand a partition among the remaindermen? He already has possession and right to enjoy the estate during his life, and could get no more by partition. It is well settled on authority and the nature of things that a tenant for life has no power to maintain suit for partition against remaindermen entitled in fee subject to the life estate. The well-considered case of Seiders v. Giles, 141 Pa. 93, 21 Atl. 514; 30 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 181, 200. We find in 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1155, this: Where a married woman dies seised with an undivided interest in land leaving her husband entitled to curtesy, he becomes a life tenant of an undivided moiety, and may maintain partition against his wife's cotenant. "Where, however, the wife was seised of the entire tract, the tenant by the curtesy becomes a life tenant of the entire tract, and hence is not a cotenant with the remaindermen, and has no such estate as will support partition." Also, page 1153. Freeman on Partition, § 455, says that "a tenant for life or for years could, both at law and in equity, compel partition. [Of course, he means between himself and cotenant of the mere life estate.] He could not compel the reversioner to join with him; nor could he occasion a compulsory partition which would be binding after the termination of his estate." The plaintiff in this case, neither upon his title as remainderman nor on his title as owner of the life estate, could compel partition. His mother could not compel partition on the strength of her life estate, and her conveyance to the plaintiff of her life estate added nothing to his estate to enable him to compel partition. We acknowledge that the case of Otley v. McAlpine, 2 Gratt. 340, seems to be the other way, as it allowed a tenant by the curtesy who acquired an undivided interest in the remainder to enforce partition. If that case is reported properly, it is against all authority and reason. The court does not give any reason for the holding, or cite a particle of authority, and the opinion is wholly a short and unsatisfactory one. A life tenant cannot have partition unless he waives his life estate, and thus gets it out of the way, destroys it, and lets the remainder-

the remainder in the survivor or survivors of a class, since the present rights or interests of the respective parties cannot be determined because one or more of them may die without issue before the termination of the life estate. Seymour v. Bowles, 172 Ill. 521, 60 N. E. 122.

Under the Minnesota statute remaindermen may have partition, but the judgment and partition cannot affect the life tenant. Cook v. Webb, 19 Minn. 173, Gil. 129; Snalley v. Isaacson, 40 Minn. 450, 42 N. W. 352; Hanson v. Ingwaldson, 77 Minn. 533, 77 Am. St. Rep. 692, 80 N. W. 702.

Under statute in Missouri a vested estate in remainder may be partitioned, leaving the unexpired life estate intact. Preston v. Brant, 96 Mo. 552, 10 S. W. 78; Atkinson v. Brady, 114 Mo. 200, 35 Am. St. Rep. 744, 21 S. W. 480; Hayes v. McReynolds, 144 Mo. 348, 46 S. W. 161.

This is the rule fixed by statute in New Jersey. Smith v. Gaines, 38 N. J. Eq. 65.

In New York, by statute, the joint owners of a vested estate in remainder may maintain an action for the partition of such estate subject to the life estate; in such an action the entire estate cannot be sold, merely the remainder is sold and the proceeds divided. Garvey v. Union Trust Co. 29 App. Div. 513, 52 N. Y. Supp. 260; Prior v. Hall, 13 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 83.

The right of remaindermen to partition was affirmed in Howell v. Mills, 7 Lans. 193, and McGlone v. Goodwin, 3 Daly, 185, under a statute which impliedly provided that a constructive possession of the plaintiff in such an action should be sufficient.

In Chism v. Keith, 1 Hun, 589, without setting out the statute, it was said that partition among joint owners of a vested remainder was a matter of right, although the life tenant was still alive and in possession.

Partition among remaindermen is permitted by statute in North Carolina, but neither the remainder nor the life estate must be contingent on any uncertainty. Gillespie v. Allison, 117 N. C. 512, 23 S. E. 438.

Under the Oregon statute a remainderman cannot maintain partition unless he holds, and is in possession of, a vested remainder as a tenant in common with the defendants. Sterling v. Sterling, 43 Or. 200, 72 Pac. 741.

Under a statute in Tennessee remaindermen may have partition, and with the consent of the life tenant the entire estate may be sold. Bierce v. James, 87 Tenn. 538, 11 S. W. 788.

But where the remainder interests are not fixed or ascertainable, but are contingent, partition cannot be had. Muldoon v. Trehitt (Tenn.) 38 S. W. 109; Smith v. Smith (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 198.

An amendment to this statute, which purported to give the life tenant the right to partition and sell the land of the remainderman without the assent of the latter, was held unconstitutional in McConnell v. Bell, 121 Tenn. 198, 130 Am. St. Rep. 770, 114 S. W. 203.

men at once come in. Had the plaintiff done this, he could as remainderman have sustained his case; but he did not do so. When he does that, he removes the particular estate out of the way of the remainder. The case of Bice v. Nixon, 34 W. Va. 107, 11 S. E. 1004, makes that waiver a condition precedent to enable a life tenant to have partition. The case thus decides that a life tenant cannot otherwise have partition. The remaindermen could not ask partition pending the life estate. That is settled, and can the life tenant demand it against the remainder? The right ought to be mutual.

For these reasons we affirm the decree.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

JOSEPH P. WULLER, by Next Friend,
v.

CHUSE GROCERY COMPANY, Appt.

(241 Ill. 398, 89 N. E. 796.)

Infant — stock subscription — rescission.

1. An infant who has paid for and received stock for which he subscribed in a corporation may, during minority, rescind the contract and recover the money paid, upon tendering back the stock which still remains in his possession.

Same — cancellation of certificate.

2. The return to a corporation of stock which has been purchased by an infant is effected upon his rescission of his contract, by the cancellation of the certificate which was issued to him.

(October 26, 1909.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Appellate Court, Fourth District,

Note. — Right of infant to rescind sale of corporate stock.

WULLER v. CHUSE GROCERY Co., holding that an infant who has paid for and received corporate stock may, during minority, rescind the contract and recover the money paid therefor, upon tendering back the stock remaining in his hands, is supported by the authorities.

Thus, in Hamilton v. Vaughan-Sherrin Electrical Engineering Co. [1894] 3 Ch. 589, it was held that an infant who had derived no advantage or benefit from the purchase of company stock might repudiate her contract during infancy, and recover back the money paid by her for the stock, since, as she had derived no benefit from the transaction, the consideration had wholly failed.

In North Western R. Co. v. McMichael, 5 Exch. 114, in discussing the rights and liabilities of an infant owner of railway shares, the court said: "An infant is not absolutely bound, but is in the same position as an infant acquiring real estate or any other permanent interest; he is not deprived of the right which the law gives every infant, of waiving and disagreeing to a purchase which he has made; and if he waives it, the estate acquired by the purchase is at an end, and with it his liability to pay calls, though the avoidance may not have taken place till the call was due."

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. D. Turner and L. D. Turner, Jr., for appellant:

If an infant performs the conditions prescribed in the certificate, he, the same as an adult, becomes entitled to the benefits thereby secured, and cannot recover back the trusts and acknowledgments he may have already paid.

Chicago Mut. Life Indemnity Assn. v. Hunt, 127 Ill. 257, 2 L.R.A. 549, 20 N. E. 55; 1 Parsons, Contr. 332; 1 Rohrer, Railroads, p. 185, 186, § 21.

He cannot disaffirm while a minor, nor can he repudiate the contract of subscription whilst in his minority, to such an extent as will bind him when he comes of age.

1 Rohrer, Railroads, § 21, p. 186; Birkenhead, L. & C. Junction R. Co. v. Pilcher, 5 Exch. 121.

An infant can bind himself by fraud; and if an infant had applied for the shares with the intention of keeping them if the company succeeded, and repudiating them on the ground of infancy if it should not succeed, he would be fixed with the same liabilities as if he had been of age when he applied for them.

Thompson, Liability of Stockholders, § 232, p. 209; Re Huntenberg, 163 Fed. 768; Marion Trust Co. v. Blish (Ind. App.) 79 N. E. 415; Page v. Morse, 128 Mass. 99.

There is a great practical difference between protecting an infant defendant against his improvident promises to pay, on the one hand, and, on the other, en-

ly bound, but is in the same position as an infant acquiring real estate or any other permanent interest; he is not deprived of the right which the law gives every infant, of waiving and disagreeing to a purchase which he has made; and if he waives it, the estate acquired by the purchase is at an end, and with it his liability to pay calls, though the avoidance may not have taken place till the call was due."

In Newry & E. R. Co. v. Coombe, 3 Exch. 565, it was held that an infant who has contracted and subscribed for shares of railway stock may, during infancy, repudiate such contract and subscription, so as to relieve him from liability for calls, at least where he has not enjoyed any profits from the contract and subscription.

In Indianapolis Chair Mfg. Co. v. Wilcox, 59 Ind. 429, cited in WULLER v. CHUSE GROCERY Co., an infant who had purchased of his employer, an incorporated company, certain shares of its capital stock, to be paid for couraging him to act as the aggressor in demolishing completed transactions; and public policy and the best interests of minors themselves have recognized this distinction.

Rice v. Butler, 160 N. Y. 578, 47 L.R.A. 303, 73 Am. St. Rep. 703, 55 N. E. 275.

The infant can call on his partner for an accounting and a share of the profits, but the adult partner has a right to insist that the assets of the firm be applied to the debts, and the infant's right to rescind is subordinate to this equity of the adult.

Messrs. Dill & Pfingsten, Schaefer, Farmer, & Kruger, for appellee:

An infant's personal contracts, whether executed or executory, may be disaffirmed by him either before or after his majority.

Lawson, Contr. § 147; Moore, Civil Justice, 3d ed. § 122; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 288, 298; Story, Contr. § 107; 1 Addison, Contr. p. 251; Cook, Corp. § 67; Beach, Priv. Corp. § 138; Craig v. Van Beber, 100 Mo. 584, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569, 13 S. W. 906; Indianapolis Chair Mfg. Co. v. Wilcox, 59 Ind. 429; Bennett v. McLaughlin, 13 Ill. App. 349; Morton v. Steward, 5 Ill. App. 533; Mead v. Stegall, 77 Ill. App. 679.

An infant is incompetent to purchase shares of stock, and he may disaffirm while still an infant, and is then not liable on calls.

1 Cook, Corp. 5th ed. § 318; Newry & E. R. Co. v. Coombe, 3 Exch. 565; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 138.

An infant who has subscribed for and paid money on stock may repudiate and recover back the money so paid, if no benefit has been received.

by the crediting of a certain portion of his weekly wages on a promissory note which he had executed to the employer therefor, was held entitled, during minority, to avoid the contract and recover the amount which he had deducted from his wages and credited on the note, the father having relinquished to the infant all claim to his services, although before rescission of the contract one dividend had been declared on the stock.

And in White v. New Bedford Cotton Waste Corp. 178 Mass. 20, 59 N. E. 642, also cited in WULLER v. CHUSE GROCERY CO., it was held that an infant could rescind a purchase of corporate stock and recover the amount which he had paid therefor, although he could not put the other party to the contract in statu quo, because he had surrendered his certificate of stock to another corporation which had taken over the affairs and property of the defendant corporation, and had accepted shares thereof in lieu of

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee filed a bill for relief against the appellant, and the circuit court decreed the payment of $1,500 by the appellant to the appellee, and the cancellation of a certificate for fifteen shares of the capital stock of appellant held by the appellee. This decree having been affirmed by the appellate court, an appeal is prosecuted to reverse the judgment of the latter court.

The appellee was a minor when the bill was filed and when the cause was heard. In May, 1905, the appellant corporation was organized to carry on a mercantile business, with a capital stock of $4,500, of which the appellee subscribed and paid for fifteen shares of $100 each. He acted as secretary and treasurer of the corporation, and was a salesman and bookkeeper thereof at $12 a week during the first year, and at $15 a week thereafter until after he began this suit in December, 1908. Having become dissatisfied with the conduct of the business, appellee filed a bill charging mismanagement thereof, repudiating, on account of his minority, his contract for said stock, and refusing to be bound thereby, offering to return the certificate for said stock, and praying for an accounting, the appointment of a receiver, and general relief.

The position of the appellant is that an infant, having advanced money upon a contract voidable because of his infancy, cannot rescind the contract and recover the money, and that he cannot elect to avoid the contract during his infancy. The contract of an infant is, in general, voidable by him, and gains no additional force from the fact that he is engaged in business for himself, or is emancipated. The exercise of his right to disaffirm his contract may operate injuriously and unjustly against the shares for which he had subscribed and paid in the defendant corporation.

An infant's subscription for stock is voidable either during infancy or within a reasonable time thereafter. Re Nassau Phosphate Co. L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 610; Baker's Case, L. R. 7 Ch. 115.

And in Robinson v. Weeks, 56 Me. 102, it was held that money paid by an infant for capital stock of a corporation could be recovered back by him, where the purchase had been rescinded within a reasonable time after he attained his majority.

The following cases hold that a transfer of stock to or by, or a contract of, an infant for the purchase of shares of corporate stock, is voidable, but not absolutely void: Lumsden's Case, L. R. 4 Ch. 31; Smith v. Nashville & D. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 221, 18 S. W. 546.

But in Mann's Case, L. R. 3 Ch. 459, note, a transfer of corporate stock to an infant was held to be a mere nullity.

the other party; but the right exists for the protection of the infant against his own improvidence, and may be exercised entirely in his discretion. The fact that the contract has been executed is immaterial. There is no distinction between executed and executory contracts, so far as the right of disaffirmance is concerned.

The appellant has cited the case of Chicago Mut. Life Indemnity Assn. v. Hunt, 127 Ill. 257, 277, 2 L.R.A. 549, 20 N. E. 55, 60, in which the court, in determining the right of the association to admit minors to membership, used the following language: "If an infant performs the conditions prescribed in the certificate, he, the same as an adult, becomes entitled to the benefits thereby secured. If he fails to perform, his membership ceases, and that is all. We do not assent to the view that, as a further consequence of his disability, he may recover back the dues and assessments he may have already paid. 'If an infant advances money on a voidable contract, which he afterwards rescinds, he cannot recover this money back, because it is lost to him by his own act, and the privilege of infancy does not extend so far as to restore this money, unless it was obtained by fraud.' 1 Parsons, Contr. 322." This language of the court used in argument was not essential to the decision, and the quotation from Parsons is at variance with authority and the doctrine now accepted. If the fact that the payment of money upon his contract was voluntary precluded its recovery, the right to avoid the contract would be no protection to an infant against his inexperience and the wiles of swindlers and cheats. Such voluntary payment may be recovered upon the avoidance of the contract. Shurtleff v. Millard, 12 R. I. 272, 34 Am. Rep. 640; Robinson v. Weeks, 56 Me. 102; Ruchizky v. De Haven, 97 Pa. 202.

The consideration, or such part of it as remains in the possession or control of the minor, must be returned; but if he has lost or expended it, so that he cannot restore it, he is not obliged to make restitution. Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 584, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569, 13 S. W. 906; Reynolds v. McCurry, 609 Ill. 356. Contracts concerning personal property and executory agreements may be avoided by the infant, either during or after his minority. Childs v. Dobbins, 55 Iowa, 205, 7 N. W. 496; Chapin v. Shafer, 49 N. Y. 407; Robinson v. Weeks, supra. The shares of capital stock of a corporation are personal property, the same as promissory notes or bonds. Cooper v. Corbin, 105 Ill. 224. An infant's purchase of such stock is voidable, and he may, at his election, avoid it, and recover the purchase money. Indianapolis Chair Mfg. Co. v. Wil- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cox, 59 Ind. 429; White v. New Bedford Cotton Waste Corp. 178 Mass. 20, 59 N. E. 642. The appellee, having offered to return the stock which he had received under the contract, was entitled to the return of the purchase money he had paid.

The certificate of stock held by the appellee was merely the evidence of his rights as a stockholder. The contract by which he became a stockholder having been avoided, the decree properly provided for the cancellation of the certificate, which amounted, in effect, to the surrender of the stock by appellee, and its restoration to appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT:

TOLEDO RAILWAYS & LIGHT COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

ELLEN J. MASON.

(81 Ohio St. 463, 91 N. E. 292.)

New trial — inadequate damages.

1. In an action to recover damages for personal injuries, a new trial may be granted on the ground of the inadequacy of the damages found by the jury, when it appears upon the facts proved that the jury must have omitted to take into consideration some of the elements of damage properly involved in the plaintiff's claim.

Appeal — inadequate damages — reversal.

2. On error in the circuit court to the overruling of a motion for a new trial on the ground of the inadequacy of the damages found by the jury in an action for personal injuries, the circuit court may reverse the judgment of the court of common pleas and grant a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence.

(February 23, 1910.)

Headnotes by the COURT.

Note. — Review by appellate court of ruling of the trial court on motion to grant a new trial in action for bodily injuries on ground of inadequacy of damages awarded.

Upon the general question as to inadequacy of damages as a ground for setting aside a verdict, see note to Benton v. Collins, 47 L.R.A. 33.

The general rule, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, that a motion for a new trial is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and is not reviewable unless the record shows a clear abuse of such discretion, applies to orders granting or refusing to grant a motion for new trial made upon the ground of inadequate damages.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor for a less sum than was demanded in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Summers, Ch. J.:

The defendant in error, Ellen J. Mason, sued the plaintiff in error to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her in alighting from a street car, operated by plaintiff in error, on which she was a passenger. She avers that she was seriously and permanently injured, and prays for $10,000 as damages. The defendant admits that she was a passenger, and that she was, to some extent, injured. The plaintiff testified that she was sixty-two years of age; that prior to her injuries she was continuously employed in nursing, and earned from $10 to $14 per week; that she was confined to her bed for three weeks after the accident, and that for two months she was unable to do anything, and that she had earned but $10 in the year following the accident; and that her eyesight and her heart are affected. The jury returned a verdict for $25.05. The plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, that "the verdict is so inadequate and insufficient as to show bias and prejudice on the part of the jury," that the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence, and that the Affirming order granting new trial.

In Lee v. Publishers George Knapp & Co. 137 Mo. 385, 38 S. W. 1107, it was held that the supreme court would not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in awarding a new trial because the verdict was inadequate as the result of prejudice, partiality, or misapprehension of the evidence, unless it plainly appeared that such discretion was arbitrarily or unreasonably exercised.

To the same effect are Chouquette v. Southern Electric R. Co. 152 Mo. 257, 53 S. W. 897; and Loevenhart v. Lindell R. Co. 190 Mo. 342, 88 S. W. 757.

In Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, 122 Iowa, 50, 97 N. W. 96, the supreme court said that it interferes reluctantly with the action of the lower court in ruling on motions for a new trial on the ground of the inadequacy of the damages awarded, and especially where a new trial has been granted.

In Noble v. Kansas City, 222 Mo. 121, 120 S. W. 779, the court held that it is peculiarly within the discretion of the trial court to pass upon the weight of the evidence when considered in connection with a motion for a new trial on the ground that the damages awarded were inadequate; and when the record fails to show that the trial court has abused its discretion, the appellate court should not substitute its discretion for that of the trial court.

In Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115, it was held that the trial court has discretionary power in a personal injury case to set aside the verdict rendered, and order a new trial of its own motion, if it deems the award insufficient, and that such action will not be interfered with on appeal except in a case of clear abuse of such discretion. In that case the defendant asked for a writ of mandamus to compel the trial judge to vacate the order granting a new trial of his own motion.

In Clements v. Fitt, 63 Ga. 158, it was held that the first grant of a new trial on the ground that the verdict was inadequate and 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

decidedly against the weight of the evidence, in the opinion of the presiding judge, would not be reversed by the supreme court unless it appeared that the trial judge had abused the discretion with which the law invested him.

And in the following cases the appellate courts have affirmed the order of the trial court which set aside the verdict for inadequacy of the damages awarded and granted a new trial: Hubbard v. Mason City, 64 Iowa, 245, 20 N. W. 172; Ward v. Marshalltown Light, P. & R. Co. 132 Iowa, 578, 108 N. W. 323; Haven v. Missouri R. Co. 155 Mo. 216, 55 S. W. 1035; Richardson v. Missouri Fire Brick Co. 122 Mo. App. 529, 99 S. W. 778; Bartlett v. Helmbacher Forge & Rolling Mills Co. (Mo. App.) 122 S. W. 351; Ford v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 98 Minn. 96, 107 N. W. 817, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 902; Kelly v. Rochester, 38 N. Y. S. 797, 15 N. Y. Supp. 29; Brown v. Foster, 1 App. Div. 578, 37 N. Y. Supp. 502; De la Torre v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 48 App. Div. 126, 62 N. Y. Supp. 601; Morris v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 51 App. Div. 512, 64 N. Y. Supp. 878; McCormick v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 25 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 61 S. W. 983; Barrette v. Carr, 75 Vt. 425, 56 Atl. 93; Emmons v. Sheldon, 26 Wis. 648.

In North Carolina it is held that the discretion of the trial court in setting aside a verdict for inadequacy of damages is not reviewable on appeal. Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 83, 47 L.R.A. 33, 34 S. E. 242. The court said that the power to correct prejudiced and grossly unfair verdicts must be vested somewhere, and that it is best that such power be confided to the judges who preside over the trials.

Affirming decision of lower court refusing new trial.

In Woodward v. Consolidated Traction Co. 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 576, it was said that the power of the appellate court to review the discretionary act of the trial court in refusing to grant a new trial because of the alleged inadequacy of the verdict was verdict is contrary to law. The trial court overruled the motion, and entered judgment on the verdict. The plaintiff prosecuted error in the circuit court, and that court reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial, on the ground that the trial court erred in not granting a new trial on the ground that the verdict was so inadequate that it was not sustained by sufficient evidence. Error is prosecuted in this court.

Messrs. Smith & Baker for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Stephen Brophy, for defendant in error:

A verdict for a grossly inadequate amount stands upon no higher ground in exceptional in character, and only to be exercised in very clear cases of wrong or injustice, which the court below should have remedied; that the appellate court would not reverse unless it clearly appeared that the verdict was wholly inadequate, that the result was clear injustice, and that the jury was influenced by partiality, passion, or prejudice, or by some plain misconception of the law or the evidence.

To the same effect are Donoghue v. Consolidated Traction Co. 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 582; Leahy v. Davis, 121 Mo. 227, 25 S. W. 941; Dowd v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. 132 Mo. 579, 34 S. W. 493; Nagle v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (R. I.) 76 Atl. 118.

In Harper v. Black Diamond Coal Co. 142 Ill. App. 594, the court said that while the damages awarded the plaintiff in that case for the injuries sustained were apparently small, and less than are usually awarded by a jury to a plaintiff injured under like circumstances, it would not be disturbed on review, in the absence of any indication that the jury in rendering such verdict were influenced by passion, by prejudice, or by errors of law. To the same effect is Harby v. Florida East Coast Hotel Co. (Fla.) 52 So. 193.

In Lovett v. Chicago, 35 Ill. App. 570, it was held that the refusal of the trial court to grant a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was inadequate will not be disturbed by the appellate court merely on the strength of the inconsistency of the verdict. The court said the evidence in that case would have warranted a much larger verdict, but as the trial judge evidently thought the plaintiff had been awarded all he was entitled to on the merits of the case, the judgment would be affirmed.

To the same effect is O'Malley v. Chicago City R. Co. 33 Ill. App. 354. And see Hackett v. Pratt, 52 Ill. App. 346.

So, also, in the following cases, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial because of the smallness of the damages awarded was affirmed by the appellate court after a review of the evidence: Hackett v. Pratt, supra; Hamilton v. Pittsburgh, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Kinser v. Soap Creek Coal Co. 85 Iowa, 26, 51 N. W. 1151, it was held that the appellate court will not review the order of the trial court refusing to grant a new trial for inadequacy of damages, where the record does not purport to contain all of the evidence in the cause.

In North Carolina it is held that the refusal of the trial court to set aside the verdict and award a new trial upon the ground that the damages awarded are inadequate is not reviewable on appeal. Burns v. Ashboro & M. R. Co. 125 N. C. 304, 34 S. E. 495.

And in Jung v. Keuffel, 144 N. Y. 381, 39 N. E. 340, it was held by the court of appeals that a motion for a new trial was a matter addressed to the discretion of the courts below, and was not reviewable in that court on appeal, although the verdict might appear grossly inadequate.

In Benjamin v. Stewart, 61 Cal. 605, it was pointed out by the court that the whole matter of granting a new trial in that state was statutory, and that a new trial could not be granted on the ground of inadequacy of damages awarded, unless upon the statutory ground, for "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." The court also said that in such case the statement must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient, and that as in the case before the court no

Mr. Orville S. Brumback also for defendant in error.

Summers, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It seems to have been assumed in some cases that at common law, in an action for damages sounding in tort, a court might set aside the verdict of a jury when it was so excessive that it appeared to have been influenced by passion or prejudice, but that it was powerless to disturb one that was inadequate. The fact was, however, and the doctrine now generally accepted is, that specifications had been made, the question would not be considered by the appellate court.

Reversing order of trial court granting a new trial.

In Jenkins v. Hawkins, 98 Tenn. 545, 41 S. W. 1028, it was held that where the objection to the verdict for damages was as to the amount, and not the fact of the verdict, the supreme court would not sustain the action of the lower court in setting it aside as being insufficient and against the evidence, unless upon its own independent investigation of the facts it should conclude that the jury acted from passion, prejudice, partiality, or corruption.

In Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Higgins, 85 Tenn. 620, 4 S. W. 47, it was held error for the trial judge to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial in an action for damages for death of plaintiff's husband on the ground that the amount awarded ($500) was insufficient and inadequate. After reviewing the evidence the supreme court said that the facts did not make a strong case for the plaintiff, and that the verdict of the jury for $500 did not evince passion, prejudice, or corruption, authorizing the trial court to set it aside.

In Edwards v. Missouri R. Co. 82 Mo. App. 478, the court on appeal reversed the order of the trial court for setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial, because it said the order could not be sustained either upon the ground that it was against the evidence or that the amount of the damages was too small, without sanctioning an invasion by the court of the province of the jury, which, the court said, they were not at liberty to do.

And in Flanders v. Meath, 27 Ga. 358, the order of the trial court granting the motion for a new trial because of the inadequacy of the damages awarded was reversed on appeal. The record in the case, however, disclosed facts going to show that the conduct of the plaintiff was such as to have been the proximate cause of the injury, and for that reason the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything whatever. Under those conditions, the court said that the plaintiff was not in a condition to complain for getting more than he was entitled to.

In Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. O'Neill, 68 Kan. 252, 74 Pac. 1105, the trial court granted a new trial, and assigned as the reason that the verdict did not equal the amount of the actual pecuniary injury to the plaintiff as shown by the evidence; but the supreme court held that the amount of pecuniary injury was not clearly shown by the evidence, and reversed the judgment and ordered that judgment be entered upon the verdict. The decision in that case was influenced by the statute which provided that a new trial should not be granted where the damages were equal to the actual pecuniary injury sustained.

Reversal for refusal to grant new trial.

In Taylor v. Howser, 12 Bush, 465, it was said that where the action of the jury was such as to demonstrate that as to the damages the proof was disregarded, and the law of the case as embodied in the instructions of the court disobeyed, then a new trial may and ought to be granted. In that case it was held reversible error for the court below to overrule a motion for a new trial where the jury found a verdict for one cent, and the actual pecuniary damages resulting directly from the wrong were such as could be measured, and the proof was clear and conclusive.

In Milliken v. New York, 82 App. Div. 471, 81 N. Y. Supp. 866, the order of the trial court denying a motion for a new trial was reversed although the verdict was for a substantial amount. In that case the trial court agreed that the verdict was inadequate and illogical, but suggested that the verdict was the result of a compromise, and, though illogical, it was of the opinion that the verdict should stand and that the litigation should be ended. The court on appeal said that denial of the plaintiff's motion for a new trial operated to the prejudice of both litigants by perpetuating the verdict of a jury is subject to the supervision of the court, whether too large or too small. A leading case is Phillips v. London & S. W. R. Co. (1879) L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 78, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 447. That was a suit for personal injuries. On the trial before Field, J., and a special jury the jury gave the plaintiff £7,000. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was granted by the Queen's bench division on the ground that the amount of damages given by the jury was so small as to show that they must have left out of consideration some of the circumstances which ought to have been taken into account. The defendants appealed. James, L. J., in the court of appeal said (85): "We agree that judges have no right to overrule the verdict of a jury as to the amount of damages merely because they take a different view, and think that if they had been the jury they would have given more or would have given less, still the verdicts of juries as to the amount of damages are subject, and must for the sake of justice be subject, to the supervision of a court of first instance, and, if necessary, of a court of appeal in this way; that is to say, if in the judgment of the court the damages are unreasonably large or unreasonably small, then the court is bound to send the matter for reconsideration by another jury." He also says that they are of the opinion that the damages were unreasonably small, on the grounds and reasons stated by the chief justice in the Queen's bench division. The case (Phillips v. South Western R. Co.) in the Queen's bench division is reported in (1879) L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 406. On page 408 Cockburn, Ch. J., says: "It was contended on behalf of the defendants that, even assuming the damages to be inadequate, the court ought not on that account to set aside the verdict and direct a new trial, inadequacy of damages not being a sufficient ground for granting a new trial in an action of tort, unless there has been misdirection or misconduct in the jury, or miscalculation, in support of which position the cases of Rendall v. Hayward, 5 Bing. N. C. 424, and Forsdike v. Stone, L. R. 3 C. P. 607, were relied on. But in both those cases the action was for slander, in which, as was observed by the judges in the latter case, the jury may consider not only what the plaintiff ought to receive, but what the defendant ought to pay. We think the rule contended for has no application in a case of personal injury, and that it is perfectly competent to us, if we think the damages unreasonably small, to order a new trial at the instance of the plaintiff. There can be no doubt of the power of the court to grant a new trial where in such an action the damages are excessive. There can be no reason why the same principle should not apply where they are insufficient to a result which was strictly just to neither of them.

So, also, in the following cases the appellate court, after a review of the evidence, reversed the order of the trial court for refusing to grant a new trial because of the smallness of the damages awarded: Anglin v. Columbus, 128 Ga. 469, 57 S. E. 780; Kilmer v. Parrish, 144 Ill. App. 270; Henderson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 52 Minn. 479, 55 N. W. 53; Moseley v. Jamison, 68 Miss. 336, 8 So. 744; Fischer v. St. Louis, 189 Mo. 567, 105 Am. St. Rep. 380, 88 S. W. 82; Robbins v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Bosw. 1; Meyer v. Hart, 23 App. Div. 131, 48 N. Y. Supp. 904; Saperstone v. Rochester R. Co. 25 App. Div. 285, 49 N. Y. Supp. 486; Tourtlotte v. Westchester Electric R. Co. 120 App. Div. 417, 105 N. Y. Supp. 50; Michalke v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 164; May v. Hahn, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 365, 54 S. W. 416, s. c. subsequent appeal (Tex. Civ. App.) 64 S. W. 942; Burns v. Merchants' & P. Oil Co. 26 Tex. Civ. App. 223, 63 S. W. 1061; Whitney v. Milwaukee, 65 Wis. 409, 27 N. W. 39.

Miscellaneous.

In Bradwell v. Pittsburgh & W. E. Pass. R. Co. 139 Pa. 404, 20 Atl. 1046, it was held that a new trial cannot be refused on condition that the defendant pay a sum fixed by the court, for the reason that the plaintiff has a right to have his damages assessed by a jury.

But in Marsh v. Minneapolis Brewing Co. 92 Minn. 182, 99 N. W. 630, where the verdict was for $50, it was held that a condition that the defendant may avoid a new trial by payment of a sum fixed by the court—$175 in that case—was not prejudicial to the defendant and within the reasonable discretion of the trial court.

To the same effect is Ford v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 98 Minn. 96, 107 N. W. 817, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 902, where it was said that such orders are discretionary with the trial court, and will not be set aside unless it affirmatively appears that they constitute an abuse of discretion.

In Scheen v. Poland, 34 La. Ann. 1107, the supreme court on appeal awarded exemplary damages in case of assault and battery.

And in Sullivan v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 39 La. Ann. 800, 4 Am. St. Rep. 239, 2 So. 586, the amount of the damages was increased by the supreme court on appeal.

In Richardson v. Zuntz, 26 La. Ann. 313, the appellate court reversed the order of the lower court which denied a new trial, where the verdict had been rendered for the defendant, and ordered that the plaintiff recover from the defendant $500 as damages, and that defendant pay the costs in both courts.

meet the justice of the case." The case was tried the second time before Lord Coleridge, Ch. J., and a jury, and resulted in verdict and judgment for £16,000, which was affirmed both in the Queen's bench division and in the court of appeal (1879) L. R. 5 C. P. Div. 280. The statement of the law by James, L. J. (1879) L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 78-85, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 447, is cited with approval by Lord Davy in Watt v. Watt [1905] A. C. 115-121, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 672.

The following American cases may be cited as taking the same view: Fischer v. St. Louis, 189 Mo. 567, 107 Am. St. Rep. 380, 88 S. W. 82; Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 83, 47 L.R.A. 33, 34 S. E. 242; Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, 122 Iowa, 50, 97 N. W. 96; Miller v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 58 N. J. L. 428, 33 Atl. 950; Ellsworth v. Fairbury, 41 Neb. 881, 60 N. W. 336; McDonald v. Walter, 40 N. Y. 551; Henderson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 52 Minn. 479, 55 N. W. 53; Robinson v. Waupaca, 77 Wis. 544, 46 N. W. 809; Whitney v. Milwaukee, 65 Wis. 409, 27 N. W. 39.

Among the grounds for a new trial enumerated in § 5305, Rev. Stat., are these: "(4) Excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. (5) Error in the assessment of the amount of recovery, whether too large or too small, when the action is upon a contract, or for the injury or detention of property. (6) That the verdict, report, or decision is not sustained by sufficient evidence, or is contrary to law." And prior to its repeal in 1898 (93 Ohio Laws, p. 217), § 5306, Rev. Stat., provided: "A new trial shall not be granted on account of the smallness of damages, in an action for an injury to the person or reputation, nor in any other action where the damages equal the actual pecuniary injury sustained." Counsel for plaintiff in error concede that the repeal of the section restores to the trial court its common-law power to set aside a verdict on the ground that it is inadequate, but contend that it is discretionary with the trial court, and that the circuit court, the reviewing court, has not power to reverse the judgment of the trial court overruling a motion for a new trial on that ground, and, upon such ground, grant a new trial, and that to hold that it may is to add to the cases specified in subdivision 5, § 5305. There are cases holding that it is discretionary (Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 110 Mich. 173, 68 N. W. 115; Benton v. Collins, supra); but in Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, supra, under Code provisions substantially identical with those of this state, and where there had been a repeal of a similar provision that "a new trial shall not be granted on account of the smallness of damages, in an action for an injury to the person or reputation, where the damages equal the actual pecuniary injury sustained," it is held: "(1) At common law the court had the same power to grant a new trial where the verdict was inadequate as where it was excessive, and the provisions of the Code supersede the common-law rules only so far as the same are inconsistent. (2) Code, § 3755, when liberally construed, as it should be, authorizes a new trial where the verdict is inadequate, notwithstanding the omission from the present Code of the provision contained in § 2839 of the Code 1873. (3) Where the trial judge finds that the jury failed to allow the amount of damages shown by the uncontradicted testimony, he may set the verdict aside as in conflict with the evidence, and grant a new trial."

In the well-considered opinion by McClain, J., in answer to the contention in that case that the repeal had taken away all power to grant new trials on the ground of inadequacy of the verdict, excepting in actions upon contract, or for the injury or detention of property, he said it was more reasonable to infer that the repeal "indicates an intention to abolish the limitation found in that section on the right to grant new trials for inadequacy of damages, and that the legislature understood that, after this section was omitted, the general power to set aside verdicts because not supported by the evidence would extend to verdicts which were inadequate, as well as those which are not only partially, but entirely, contrary to the evidence." He also said that the power to set aside a verdict that is manifestly inadequate under the evidence is expressly given by the sixth subdivision, "that the verdict, report, or decision is not sustained by sufficient evidence, or is contrary to law."

The limitation in subdivision 5, § 5305, was made probably in view of the denial of a new trial on account of the smallness of the damages, in an action for injury to a person or reputation; and, conceding that the repeal of § 5306, whatever may have been the supposition of the legislature, cannot under any known rule of construction be held to add actions for an injury to the person or reputation to the actions enumerated in subdivision 5, § 5305, yet in view of the repeal of original § 5306, § 5305 must be construed as not depriving the court of power to grant new trials in the actions mentioned in original § 5306 when the verdict is inadequate.

The granting of a new trial on the ground that the damages are inadequate is held discretionary in the trial court, and not reviewable, in Benton v. Collins, and in Ft. Wayne & B. I. R. Co. v. Wayne Circuit Judge, supra, discretionary, but reviewable in case of abuse of discretion. Jung v. Keuffel, 144 N. Y. 381, 39 N. E. 340, does not hold that the matter is not reviewable, but that it is reviewable in the general term of the supreme court, and not in the court of appeals. In most of the cases cited the matter is reviewed, and in Fischer v. St. Louis, and in Miller v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. supra, a new trial was granted in the supreme court.

But while we hold that a new trial may be granted on the ground that the verdict is inadequate, yet attention should be given to the circumstances under which it is held proper that it should be granted.

The present case falls clearly within the principles applied in Phillips v. London & S. W. R. Co. (1879) L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 78, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 447, and Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, 122 Iowa, 50, 97 N. W. 96. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover, then the amount assessed did not cover the time actually lost, and the judgment is affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM M. BONNET, Plff. in Err.,
v.
EMMA E. FOOTE.

(47 Colo. 282, 107 Pac. 252.)

Physician — malpractice — fractured thigh.

1. A surgeon is guilty of malpractice in treating as a mere bruise a fracture of the neck of the femur, where, when patient is placed on his back, his foot lies over on one side, without power on his part to control it.

Evidence — fractured bone — remote examination.

2. Evidence of the result of an examination of a hip, made five years after defendant was called upon to treat it, is admissible in an action against him for malpractice in failing to discover that it was fractured, in corroboration of evidence that its condition immediately after the injury tended to show a fracture.

Same — photograph — remoteness.

3. That a sciagraph of an injured hip was taken five years after the injury does not render it inadmissible in evidence upon the question of the character of the injury.

Same — damages — fractured bone — shortened limb.

4. Evidence of the shortening of the leg is admissible upon the question of damages in an action against a surgeon for negligent failure properly to diagnose a fracture of the neck of the femur, where there is sufficient evidence in the case to establish the negligence.

(February 7, 1910.)

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malpractice. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George W. Taylor and H. L. Noble for plaintiff in error.

Gabbert, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant in error commenced suit against plaintiff in error to recover damages for the alleged malpractice of the latter. In her complaint plaintiff alleged that while walk-

Note. — Liability of physician or surgeon for failure to diagnose fracture or dislocation.

The terms "physician" and "surgeon" herein are used interchangeably, the courts making apparently no attempt, so far as this point is concerned, to distinguish their respective liabilities.

In Champion v. Kieth, 17 Okla. 204, 87 Pac. 846, a judgment for plaintiff in an action against a physician and surgeon for failure to diagnose a fracture of the neck of the femur was reversed as not sustained by the evidence, it being shown that the defendant was a reputable surgeon, possessing the ordinary skill and ability required, that he took the precaution of calling in an assistant of perhaps even greater skill, and that their examination was very thorough, that all precautions and appliances at their command were used, and there being evidence that a fracture of the neck of the femur is sometimes impossible to detect and distinguish from a dislocation.

It was held in English v. Free, 205 Pa. 624, 55 Atl. 777, that a physician was not liable for failing to diagnose correctly a dislocation of the hip joint, where it appeared that the defendant was a skilful surgeon in good repute, that he gave attention to the case, and called in to aid him two other competent surgeons, and the testimony of all the reputable physicians called agreed that the injury was such that it was very difficult and sometimes impossible to detect its exact character.

A physician and surgeon who makes three examinations with the X-ray of an injured wrist to ascertain whether the wrist is fractured uses reasonable skill and care, and is not liable for failure to detect the fracture through negligence in not taking an X-ray photograph to make certain his diagnosis. Wells v. Ferry-Baker Lumber Co. (Wash.) post, —, 107 Pac. 869.

Where an injured arm was so swollen that ing on Sixteenth street, in the city of Denver, she slipped and fell on the pavement, and injured her right hip; that she employed the defendant, a physician and surgeon, to treat the injury; that he examined her, and announced that she had only sustained a severe bruise, which time and keeping quiet would heal; that he called and treated her twice a day for about two weeks, and thereafter once a day for about one month, and after this period occasionally for about two months. She then alleges that the injury she received from her fall was a fracture of the neck of the right femur, with a displacement of the outer fragment, which eventually caused a shortening of the right limb from 2 to 3 inches. The negligence charged is (1) neglect and inattention of defendant in his examination of the plaintiff; (2) failing to set the bones in proper position and to keep them in place; (3) failing to use proper appliances at the proper time. The trial on the issues made by the answer of the defendant to this complaint and the replication of plaintiff resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $1,500. The defendant brings the case here for review on error.

The first question we shall consider is the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the negligence of the defendant as charged. The testimony is not voluminous, and, so far as material to that question, is substantially as follows: Plaintiff fell upon the sidewalk in the evening. She was at once removed to her room, and requested that the defendant be called. He arrived within a few minutes, found that she was suffering severe pain, and told her he was afraid she had suffered a fracture, and advised her that he would not make an examination until morning. The next morning he called, and examined her hip by feeling it with his hands, and concluded that the injury was a severe bruise, and not a fracture. It further appears from the testimony that he continued to treat her for the periods as alleged in her complaint as for a bruise, and not a fracture; that he made frequent examinations of the injured limb, and measurements for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it was shortening, but at no time regarded the injury as anything more the complete extent of the injury could not be discovered by a careful and skilful examination, and a subsequent examination was prevented by the patient, the attending surgeon was not liable for failure to discover a fracture. Gedney v. Kingsley, 41 N. Y. S. R. 794, 16 N. Y. Supp. 792.

It was said in James v. Crockett, 34 N. B. 540, that it does not follow that a physician was negligent because he was unable to discover a dislocation; and it appearing that the defendant, against whom negligence was charged, gave the patient careful attention, made more than one careful examination, and, not content with his own diagnosis, called in another physician for consultation, a nonsuit was affirmed.

Where the discovery of a fracture is a matter of extreme difficulty, and a surgeon uses ordinary skill and diligence in his examination, negligence may not be imputed to him for failing to detect the fracture. Stamper v. Rhindress, 41 N. S. 45 (fracture of rim of hip joint).

It has been held that a physician is not liable for erroneously diagnosing a dislocation as a fracture, unless treatment improper for a dislocation followed; and in the case of a dislocated clavicle, that if the treatment was such as reasonable skill and care exacted for the cure of a dislocated clavicle, a physician was not liable, regardless of what his diagnosis may have been. Tomer v. Aiken, 126 Iowa, 114, 101 N. W. 769.

And so in Fowler v. Sergeant, 1 Grant, Cas. 355, where the plaintiff had suffered a fracture of the neck of the thigh bone, and the testimony established that such a fracture was difficult of detection and cure, it was held that the physician was not chargeable for his ignorance if he prescribed for it rightly, and it appeared that the treatment given by the defendant was the proper remedy for the conditions then existing.

But a physician is answerable in damages for failing to discover a dislocation of the shoulder and fracture of an arm when he had a reasonable opportunity to make an examination, and the dislocation and fracture could have been ascertained by the exercise of ordinary care. Manser v. Collins, 69 Kan. 290, 76 Pac. 851.

And a physician is guilty of negligence for which there may be a recovery where he omits to reduce a swelling, and thus fails to discover that the real nature of an injury is a broken patella instead of a rupture of the ligaments. Pike v. Honsinger, 155 N. Y. 201, 63 Am. St. Rep. 655, 49 N. E. 760.

So, one who suffers injury through the failure of his physician to discover and reduce a dislocation which could have been readily discovered is entitled to recover damages resulting from the physician's negligence. Burton v. Neill, 140 Iowa, 141, 118 N. W. 302.

In Burk v. Foster, 114 Ky. 20, 59 L.R.A. 277, 69 S. W. 1096, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 304, where the physician failed to discover a dislocated shoulder, the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant, said that the patient was entitled to an ordinarily careful and thorough examination of his injuries, such as the circumstances attending their infliction, the condition of the patient, and the surgeon's opportunities for proper examination, suggested and allowed.

than a severe bruise. Plaintiff was confined to her bed for about four weeks. At the end of that time she was able to sit up a short time each day, gradually increasing it. In a few weeks she was able to walk with crutches, and about four months after her injury was sufficiently recovered so that she was able to go to Santa Fé, where she remained for several months. She used crutches or a crutch and cane for about eighteen months after her injury. After that period she used a cane only. She suffered more or less pain for something like two years, at the end of which time it passed away, but occasionally would return. It appears from the testimony that the injured limb was shortened, that it is not as strong as before the injury, and that plaintiff cannot use it with the same degree of facility she could before it was injured.

A physician and surgeon called on behalf of the plaintiff testified that about five years after her injury he made an examination of her right limb, and found from such examination, aided by an X-ray photograph of her right hip, that she had sustained a fracture of the neck of the femur of the right limb. He also stated that, in case of a fracture of the neck of the femur, it is often difficult to ascertain whether there is a fracture or not. He further stated that a severe bruise in the vicinity of the neck of the femur would produce practically the same pain as a fracture. He also detailed the method usually adopted by surgeons for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not, when the hip is injured, a fracture exists. It appears from the testimony that the defendant did not adopt this method or do anything more in the way of examining the injured limb than already stated.

During the course of his examination the witness was asked:

Q. Doctor, if a patient with an injured hip lie on the back and her foot turns over to one side, what is the indication?

A. Might be a fracture; might be a dislocation.

Q. It would be one or the other?

A. One or the other.

Q. The indication would be that it was either a dislocation or fracture?

A. Yes; that is, if there was inability to put it back again in place.

Plaintiff was recalled as a witness, and asked:

Q. You may state to the jury what position your foot—the right foot—assumed after this injury, when you were lying there on your back?

A. It laid over on the side.

Q. Did Dr. Bonnet ever see it lying over on the side?

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A. Yes, sir. He said he did not like it, although he could not understand why it did that.

Q. Did he straighten it?

A. He straightened it up, and it fell back again.

Q. Did you have any control over it to keep it up from falling back.

A. None whatever.

The defendant did not testify, and there was no testimony offered on his behalf controverting the facts and testimony as above narrated. From these facts and evidence it is clear that the injury to plaintiff's hip was a fracture instead of a mere bruise, and the question to determine is whether or not it appears that defendant was guilty of negligence in diagnosing and treating her injury.

In the absence of a special contract, the law implies that a surgeon employed to treat an injury contracts with his patient, first, that he possesses that reasonable degree of learning and skill which is ordinarily possessed by others of the profession; second, that he will use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in the exercise of skill and the application of his knowledge to accomplish the purpose for which he is employed; and, third, that he will use his best judgment in the application of his skill in deciding upon the nature of the injury and the best mode of treatment. Burnham v. Jackson, 1 Colo. App. 237, 28 Pac. 250; Leighton v. Sargent, 27 N. H. 460, 59 Am. Dec. 388; Winner v. Lathrop, 67 Hun, 511, 22 N. Y. Supp. 516; Carpenter v. Blake, 10 Hun, 358. He is not responsible for want of success unless it results from a failure to exercise ordinary care or from want of ordinary skill. Burnham v. Jackson and Leighton v. Sargent, supra; Williams v. Poppleton, 3 Or. 139. And if he possesses ordinary skill, and exercises ordinary care in applying it, he is not responsible for a mistake of judgment. Fisher v. Niccolls, 2 Ill. App. 484; Heath v. Glisan, 3 Or. 64; Langford v. Jones, 18 Or. 307, 22 Pac. 1064.

Applying these well-settled principles of law governing the liability of surgeons, it is at once apparent from the facts that the failure of the defendant to properly diagnose and treat the injury to plaintiff's hip was inexcusable. That the bone was fractured cannot be doubted. The evidence of such fracture was plain from the fact that plaintiff's foot lay over on one side, to which the attention of defendant was directed; so that one of two conclusions is inevitable: Either defendant did not possess that degree of learning and skill which the law requires of surgeons, or, if he did, he failed to exercise ordinary care in applying it.

It is urged that the court erred in admitting the evidence of the doctor above referred to, for the reason that his examination of the plaintiff was made some five years after the injury, and that the condition of the injured limb at that time was not competent to prove that it was the result of the defendant's treatment, or failure to properly diagnose her injury. Unskillfulness cannot be established by proof of the result of treatment alone. Improper treatment must be shown by other evidence. Sims v. Parker, 41 Ill. App. 284. This rule is satisfied in the case at bar. There was other testimony with respect to the condition of the limb shortly after the injury and during the period the defendant was treating it, which at least tended to prove that the bone had been fractured, and the evidence of the doctor to the effect that from his examination he found that it had been fractured was competent as tending to corroborate the testimony on the part of plaintiff that its condition immediately after the injury was such as would be caused by a fracture. In this connection we notice the claim that the court erred in admitting the photograph of the injured limb, the "sciagraph," as it is termed, for the reason that it was taken several years after the accident. That it was taken long after the injury would be proper to consider in determining the weight which should be given it; but that would not affect its competency.

It is next claimed that the court erred in admitting testimony of the shortness of the injured limb. A surgeon is only required to restore an injured limb to that degree of perfection which would result from the exercise of that degree of skill in treating the injury which is ordinarily possessed by members of the profession. As previously stated, a surgeon is not responsible for want of success unless it is the result of a failure to exercise ordinary care. Neither is he responsible for a mistake of judgment if he possesses ordinary skill, and uses reasonable care in exercising it. The fact that an injured limb is defective after the patient has recovered is proper to consider in an action for malpractice, although it is not prima facie evidence of negligence of the surgeon treating it (Piles v. Hughes, 10 Iowa, 579), or, as some authorities state in substance, the mere fact that an injured limb is imperfectly healed does not of itself establish that the surgeon treating it was guilty of negligence (Wood v. Barker, 49 Mich. 295, 13 N. W. 597). However, neither of these rules of law, in the circumstances of this case, rendered the evidence 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under consideration incompetent. The claim of the plaintiff, and as the evidence establishes, was that the defendant did not treat her for a fractured bone, but for a severe bruise, and that he improperly diagnosed her injury. The bone was fractured. From the evidence it appears that defendant should have discovered this fact. So that the result which would follow his failure to properly diagnose and treat the injury was competent for the purpose of establishing the damages sustained.

It is also urged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which should preclude a recovery. We fail to find that the record discloses any act on the part of the plaintiff which contributed to her injury or retarded the healing of her injured limb.

Error is also assigned upon the refusal of the court to give instructions requested. Those requested were substantially embraced in the instructions given by the court. It is not error to refuse instructions embraced in those given.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Note. — Action of public authorities under police power as defense to carrier for delay or non-delivery of freight.

This question was discussed in the note accompanying the case of Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Tirelli Bros. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 731, and but one other case in addition to SOUTHERN EXP. Co. v. SOTILLE BROS. has since been reported.

In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Neil, 65 Misc. 179, 119 N. Y. Supp. 676, the question arose in an action by a carrier to recover transportation charges upon a shipment of cattle. A counterclaim interposed for damages suffered through the delay of sued in conformity to a law authorizing such seizures by such officials in enumerated instances, which law provides for the keeping of such liquors for thirty days before they shall be destroyed or become forfeited to the state, and authorizes the bringing of an action by any person to recover the same, and the carrier notifies the consignor, or the consignor has actual notice, of such seizure in time to bring an action to recover the goods under the provision of such law, the carrier is relieved from liability to the consignor for nondelivery to the consignee, even though such law may be unconstitutional, it never having been judicially declared so.

(February 18, 1910.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Richmond County to review a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the value of certain goods which had been seized under process of law while in defendant's possession for transportation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William K. Miller, for plaintiff in error:

The carrier is not required to resist a seizure, and the carrier may submit thereto without incurring liability.

Holden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Sotille Brothers (hereinafter called the plaintiffs) brought suit in the superior court of Richmond county against the Southern Express Company for the value of certain cases and casks of liquor alleged to have been delivered to it by the plaintiffs at Augusta, Georgia, for shipment from that point to named consignees at Charleston and Middendorf, South Carolina. It was alleged 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the liquors were ordered by the consignees for their personal use. To the petition a general demurrer was filed, and to an order overruling the same the defendant excepted. A copy of portions of the law of South Carolina known as the "dispensary law," approved February 16, 1907, was attached to the petition. It made it unlawful for any common carrier or its agents or servants or any person to carry or transport liquors for unlawful use to any county or place where the sale of liquor was prohibited. The act prohibited the sale of liquors in that state, except in a dispensary. The law set forth as an exhibit with the petition was in part an inspection law. The 1st section declared certain liquors which had not been tested "as hereinafter provided" to be contraband. The only provision appearing in the record before us which could relate to inspection is set out in these words: "Sec. 8. It shall be the duty of the board to cause an analysis of the liquors to be made," etc. Hence we cannot say from the record before us whether or not the law in question did, or did not, by its terms attempt to subject liquors under the conditions dealt with in the present case to any inspection. The law invoked being statutory law of a sister state, we take no judicial cognizance thereof, but can only deal with it as pleaded. No contention is made by counsel that there was no provision requiring the inspection of liquors under the circumstances presented by this case. One of the provisions contained therein was as follows: "All alcoholic liquors in possession of any person for unlawful use shall be seized without warrant; and if no action to recover same is begun within thirty days from such seizure, or if such action be begun and the judgment of the court be adverse to the plaintiff, then such liquors shall be forfeited to the county in which the same is seized, if there be a dispensary in said county, and disposed of as the county dispensary board may deem best; but if there be no dispensary therein, such liquors shall be destroyed publicly by the sheriff of the county." This law also provided that upon affidavit made, stating that contraband liquor was being "unlawfully concealed, kept, or stored in any place, search warrant may be issued by any magistrate of the county, empowering any officer or person who may be deputized to enter the said place," and to search the premises for the purpose of seizing the contraband liquors, "which said liquor, when so seized, shall be disposed of as hereinbefore provided for the disposition of unlawful liquors." To the petition was attached a copy of the warrant and the affidavit upon which it issued. under which the shipments to Charleston were seized. The affidavit prayed "that such contraband liquors may be brought before this court, and such action taken concerning the same as is authorized by law." The magistrate before whom the affidavit was made issued a warrant commanding the officer, "with necessary and proper assistance, to enter" upon the designated premises of the defendant "and parties unknown," and to bring the liquors found "and deposit the same with the sheriff, which said articles are there to remain, to be disposed of as required by the provisions of the dispensary laws." The petition alleges: "After seizure the whiskeys were deposited by the officer with the tribunal pointed out by the laws of South Carolina, to be disposed of as provided by law," and the liquors shipped to Middendorf, South Carolina, were seized "under a similar warrant" by the sheriff, who destroyed the same. The presumption is that, in obedience to the mandate of the warrant, the sheriff carried the liquors seized at Middendorf before the court, and, if they were destroyed after the expiration of thirty days, it was because no action to recover the same was begun within thirty days from the seizure, or, if begun, the judgment of the court was adverse to the party bringing the action, and there was no dispensary in the county in which Middendorf was situated. The seizure of the liquors at Charleston was made on September 12th, and the defendant between September 12th and 15th notified the plaintiffs of such seizure, but they did nothing except to demand the value of the shipments from the defendant. It is not expressly alleged that the plaintiffs had notice of the seizure made at Middendorf, but, under all the allegations of the petition, we think a proper construction thereof is that the plaintiffs had notice of this seizure. The liquors seized in each instance were in the warehouse of the Southern Express Company at the place of destination.

The plaintiffs contend that any law providing for the warrant under which the seizures were made, before the interstate shipment of liquors was actually delivered to the consignees, was unconstitutional, because of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and for other reasons, and that the loss of the liquors by reason of a seizure under such law did not relieve the defendant from liability to the plaintiffs for failure to deliver to the consignees. One of the contentions of the defendant is that, even if such law is unconstitutional, the liquors were seized by officers designated by the law under process issued in conformity to the law, and, as the consignors had notice of the seizures in time to assert their claim to the goods before they were destroyed in the county in which Middendorf is situated, and before they were destroyed or forfeited in the county in which Charleston is situated, that there can be no recovery by the plaintiffs. It was held by this court in the case of Southern R. Co. v. Heymann, 118 Ga. 616, 45 S. E. 491: "Intoxicating liquors which have been shipped from Augusta, Georgia, to persons in Charleston, South Carolina, and which have reached Charleston and been placed in a freight warehouse of the railroad company in that city, to await the call of the consignees, have 'arrived' in the state of South Carolina within the meaning of the act of Congress of August 8, 1890 [chapter 728, 26 Stat. at L. 313, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177], known as the Wilson act." It was further held: "A railroad company is not liable for loss of property intrusted to it for shipment, occasioned by seizure of the property by an officer of the law under a prima facie valid authority." The decision in this case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 51 L. ed. 178, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130. On page 277 of 203 U. S., that court said: "The conclusion that the court below erred in declining to follow the prior rulings of this court construing the Wilson act disposes of the entire controversy arising on the record before us, for the following reasons: In its answer filed in the trial court the railroad company substantially defended alone upon the ground that the seizure was rightful. And the supreme court of Georgia treated the liability of the defendant as depending solely upon the validity of the seizure. . . . Moreover, in this court, counsel in their brief on behalf of the defendant in error rely exclusively upon the correctness of the construction given to the Wilson act by the court below, and do not urge, in the event such construction be not sustained, that it was exempt for any reason whatever from liability." It was only the ruling made in the supreme court of this state first above quoted that was passed on and reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its ruling in the Heyman Case, therefore, does not cover the questions to be decided in this case.

It is provided by our statute, and it was also the common law, that, in case of loss of goods intrusted to a common carrier for transportation, the presumption of law is against him, and no excuse avails him unless it was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state. This rule, however, is recognized by all the authorities as being subject to certain limitations. In Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. v. Wilcox, 48 Ga. 432, 437, it was declared that the liability of a common carrier was at an end "if the owner of the goods himself receives them short of the place of destination, or if they are not delivered by the fault of the owner, or that they have been taken from the carrier by title paramount, and, lastly, that they have been taken from him by legal process. He has not lost the goods, they have not been stolen or been destroyed; but his undertaking as a carrier has been determined." It has been held that, where the property was taken from the carrier under a process in favor of a third person who claimed title thereto, proof of paramount title in such third person discharged the carrier from liability for failure to deliver to the consignee, whether or not the consignor or consignee had notice of such seizure. Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (C. C.) 16 Fed. 57; Hutchinson, Carr. § 749; Van Zile, Bailm. & Carr. 2d ed. § 62. It is likewise true that a seizure of the property in the hands of the carrier by duly constituted authorities, under a valid process issued under a valid police law under which the property was liable to seizure, would relieve the carrier from any liability for failure to deliver to the consignee. When property is seized under process valid on its face, in favor of one claiming title thereto, the carrier is liable to the consignee for failure to deliver, unless he can show paramount title in such third person, or unless he can show notice of such seizure to the consignor. In the case of Savannah, G. & N. A. R. Co. v. Wilcox, supra, it was held: "It is not the duty of a common carrier to keep his doors locked and to refuse entrance to a sheriff who comes to seize property in the possession of the carrier, if the sheriff have legal process. When goods delivered to a common carrier for transportation were seized by legal process and taken out of his possession by the sheriff, and the carrier forthwith gave notice to the consignor and consignee, and they made no reply and took no further notice of the proceedings, held, that the carrier had a right to presume that they had abandoned the property, as subject to the legal process which had seized it." In the case of Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co. supra, it was ruled: "However the law may be elsewhere, the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States is that a seizure under legal process is a defense to the carrier in an action for nondelivery. But the mere seizure under valid process is not enough to excuse the carrier, for he must give immediate notice to the consignee. Failing this, he becomes liable as in any other case 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of delivery to another person than his own bailee, and assumes the burden of showing that the party seizing the goods under the process has the paramount title, unless he can show that the consignee had actual knowledge from other sources in due time, to be equivalent to that notice he would have received if the carrier had not been negligent in this regard."

In the present case, the shipments had arrived at destination, and had been stored in the warehouse of the carrier. Notice of the Charleston shipments had been mailed to the consignees. The arrival of the Mid-dendorf shipment was known to the consignee. The warrants under which the goods were seized were issued upon affidavits duly made before the proper officers, and the affidavit and the warrant conformed to the law under which the former was made and the latter was issued. The law provided for the storage of the property seized with the sheriff of the county for thirty days, within which any person claiming to own the same had a right to bring suit and recover. The consignors knew of the seizure, and, if they had brought suit within the thirty days named, they could have recovered the goods, if the seizure was unlawful because of the fact that the law under which the seizure was made was unconstitutional. The consignor did nothing except demand the value of the shipments from the express company.

The seizures were made over the protest of the carrier, which "in no way brought about or connived at the seizures," and the goods were forcibly taken from it. The law provided that the police officers executing the warrant had authority to summon assistance for that purpose, and the agent of the express company, under the law, was liable to a fine for resisting the officers in the execution of the warrant. Conceding, without deciding, that the law under which the warrants were issued is unconstitutional, we think under the facts above recited, which appear in the petition, that the carrier had a right to presume that the consignor had abandoned the property as subject to the process which seized it, and that the carrier was not liable to them for its failure to do more than it did. In the case of Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Tirelli, 93 Miss. 797, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 731, 48 So. 962, it was held: "A carrier is not liable for failure to deliver to the consignee a car load of fruit which it is forbidden by the municipal authorities to deliver, where the police department is at hand to enforce the order, although the fruit was not within the operation of an ordinance quarantining against shipments from certain ports." In the concluding part of the opinion, after quoting from the decision of another court, it was said: "It is no answer to this language to say that no ordinance of the city prohibited the importation of bananas from Mobile. This is true; but the company is not bound to maintain an armed force to resist and overpower the marshaled hosts of the city police, acting under instructions from the executive department of the city government." In the present case the law under which the warrants were issued and the seizure made became effective February 17, 1907, and we know of no decision of any court holding this particular law to be unconstitutional. In the case of McAlister v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Mo. 351, the fifth headnote is as follows: "It seems that a bailee will not be held liable in damages for permitting the property of his bailor to be taken out of his custody upon a writ issued under a statute which is subsequently decided to be unconstitutional. He is not bound to know that it is unconstitutional." The status of an unconstitutional law is ably discussed by Mr. Dowling in an article appearing in 55 Cent. L. J. 25, in the concluding part of which he advances very cogent reasons why the burden of determining whether or not a law is unconstitutional should not be imposed upon an officer executing judicial process based on such law. In 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 463, the following text is employed: "Where the carrier surrenders the goods under legal process, he should, to relieve himself from liability, at once notify the owner of the fact." In the case of American Exp. Co. v. Mullins, 212 U. S. 311, 53 L. ed. 525, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 381, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 536, it was ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States: "The duty of the carrier to safely carry and promptly deliver to the consignee the goods intrusted to it does not require it to forcibly resist judicial proceedings in the courts of the state into or through which the goods are carried. While the carrier may appear and contest the validity of a seizure, under judicial process, of goods in its custody, if it seasonably notify the owner and call upon him to defend, it is relieved from further responsibility; and in absence of fraud or connivance on its part, it may plead the judgment rendered against it as a bar in an action brought by the owner." On page 313 of 212 U. S., Justice Brewer said: "The company carried the goods [liquors] to Kansas in obedience to the terms of the shipment. On arrival in that state they were taken by judicial process out of its possession and destroyed; the process being issued in a proceeding in the nature of one in rem. Undoubtedly it was authorized to 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) appear in the Kansas court and contest for the rightfulness of its possession, but it might also notify the owner of the property and call upon him to carry on the litigation." The proceedings in the case we are considering were in the nature of proceedings in rem. On the general subject of liability of a carrier in cases where shipments in his charge are seized under judicial process, see the following authorities: Stiles v. Davis, 1 Black, 101, 17 L. ed. 33; 4 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 1461, 1537; 1 Hutchinson, Carr. § 327; 2 Hutchinson, Carr. §§ 738 et seq.; Moore, Carr. 233; Van Zile, Bailm. & Carr. 2d ed. § 62; 5 *Thomp. LUE HENDERSON, Admr., etc., of Vinson Henderson, Deceased, Appt.,

DONIPHAN LUMBER COMPANY.

Navigable water — negligent use — log jam.

The placing of loose logs in a stream in such quantities that they form a jam which is likely to be broken at any time by the rising water, without taking any precautions to prevent injury by their movement to persons navigating the river, or to warn them of danger, may be found to be negligence which will render the owner of the logs liable for the death of one drowned by the overturning of his boat through the moving of the logs.

(April 4, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for White County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rachels & Robinson, for appellant:

A river of sufficient size to float logs in large quantities is a public highway, governed by the same rule as highways on land.

Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Brooks, 39 Ark. 408, 43 Am. Rep. 277; Page v. Mille Laes Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 493, 55 N. W. 608, 1119; Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 81 Am. Dec. 569; Thompson v. Androscogin River Improv. Co. 54 N. H. 545; Bucki v. Cone, 25 Fla. 1, 6 So. 160; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 454, 91 Am. Dec. 58; Olson v. Merrill, 42 Wis. 203, U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5251, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3522.

The placing of so many logs upon the waters of the river as to occupy the whole surface of the water from bank to bank constituted an unlawful obstruction to navigation.

North Shore Boom & Driving Co. v. Nicomen Boom Co. 212 U. S. 406, 53 L. ed. 574, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 355.

Persons running logs in a navigable river, who negligently cause same to accumulate in vast packs, and rush down such river, destroying shipping in their path, are liable for the damage so done to shipping.

his rights, is entitled to claim from others due observance of the fundamental principle of navigation, that the craft having the best facilities for its own management is charged with the corresponding duty to employ those facilities so as to avoid collision and injury. The Athabasca, 45 Fed. 651.

In Heerman v. Beef Slough Mfg. Boom. Log Driving, & Transp. Co. 8 Biss. 334, 1 Fed. 145, it was said that there is nothing peculiar about steamboat navigation that should give it any preference or superiority over other forms of commerce upon a stream adapted in a greater or less degree to both.

In The City of Erie v. Canfield, 27 Mich. 482, it was said that it was just and reasonable and conducive to the best interests of commerce that the right of navigating a river more valuable for floatage than for any other navigation should be exercised with due regard to the necessity for booming facilities, and the former is not so far paramount as to render the latter a nuisance whenever it encroaches upon waters navigable by the large vessels which enter the stream.

However, in Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 629, it was held that the mere fact that a stream is more useful for floating logs than for any other one business, or for all others combined, does not authorize the floaters to increase its facility for that purpose, if thereby they exclude other users; and that therefore a boom across a stream is a nuisance if, at times, it interferes with the use of the stream by those who have the right to navigate it, although the principal use of the stream may be for floating logs, and the boom may greatly facilitate the logging business.

Log owners maintaining a boom across a navigable stream for an unreasonable period are therefore liable in damages to the owner of a tug which was unable to pass. Gifford v. McArthur, 55 Mich. 535, 22 N. W. 28.

So, in Enos v. Hamilton, 24 Wis. 658, one obstructing a navigable stream by means of booms for six weeks was held liable to the owner of a tannery who, because thereof, was unable to ply his scows on the stream, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) and secure the bark needed in the operation of his tannery. This was reaffirmed in 27 Wis. 256.

To the same effect is Drake v. Sault Ste. Marie Pulp & Paper Co. 25 Ont. App. Rep. 251, where a boom was kept at the mouth of a river during a whole summer, to the injury of one who used such river to gain access to a lake, for the purpose of fishing and getting supplies for himself and neighbors.

In Smart v. Aroostook Lumber Co. 103 Me. 37, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1083, 68 Atl. 527, it was held that a lumber company, although it has monopolized the commercial business on a navigable river and its tributaries, cannot fill the channel with logs for an unreasonable time, so as to prevent persons from using the stream in the summer months for floating boats and transporting goods to their cottages on its banks, or so as to stop sportsmen from passing up and down the stream.

So, it has been held that a pier erected in the Mississippi river as part of a boom for logs, with no other authority than that arising from the ownership of the adjacent shore, is an unlawful structure, and that the owner will be liable for the sinking of a boat which runs against it in the dark. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. 21 Wall. 389, 22 L. ed. 619.

So, it has been held that a person throwing a boom across a stream in order to catch logs coming down will be liable for the injury caused thereby to the owner of a steamboat which is prevented by the boom from reaching its destination. Crandell v. Mooney, 23 U. C. C. P. 212. In this case the relative rights of logs and vessels were not involved, as the boom was stretched in mere anticipation, no logs having reached it at the time of the injury.

In Pierreville Steam Mills Co. v. Martineau, 20 Lower Can. Jur. 225, the owner of a boom was also held liable for damages caused to a navigating vessel, although, in accordance with a statute which authorized the construction of booms in such a way as not to obstruct the river, and which re-

Messrs. S. Brundidge, Jr., and H. Neelly, for appellee:

Before the defendant can be held liable for the accident, the complaint must allege such a state of facts as shows that the putting of its logs into the river not only caused the injury, but that such injury was the natural and probable consequence thereof.

Co. v. Koepp*, 64 Kan. 735, 68 Pac. 608.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action at law instituted by the administratrix of the estate of Vinson Henderson, deceased, to recover damages sustained by the widow and next of kin of said decedent by reason of his death, which is alleged to have resulted from drowning in Little Red river on account of the overturning and sinking of a ferryboat on which he was a passenger. It is alleged that the boat was overturned by loose floating logs which had been placed in the river by defendant, and that the accident quired the submission of the plan and site to the governor in council, the latter had actually approved of the plan and site. It appeared, however, that the boom actually did form an obstruction to the navigation of the river.

Custom cannot give log owners the right to place booms across a navigable stream so as completely to obstruct persons entitled to the free use thereof. Gifford v. McArthur, supra.

While all persons have an equal right to a reasonable use of navigable streams, as they have in a public highway, the legislature may determine the manner in which this reasonable use may be exercised, and prevent by legislation the obstruction of a navigable stream by floating loose logs upon it in such a way as to destroy its use to the public for the purpose of navigation. Evans v. Com. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 29, 7 S. W. 925; Harrigan v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 129 Mass. 580, 37 Am. Rep. 387.

The mere floating of logs is not within the meaning of the provisions of a river and harbor appropriation act prohibiting the obstruction of a navigable stream. United States v. Marthinson, 58 Fed. 765; United States v. Burns, 54 Fed. 351.

In Heerman v. Beef Slough Mfg. Boom. Log Driving, & Transp. Co. 8 Bias. 334, 1 Fed. 145, it was held that an owner of steamboats plying on a river wholly within the territory of a single state cannot complain of booms and piers placed in such river with the consent of the legislature, for the purpose of aiding in the floatage of logs 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) therein, although they hinder the steamboat navigation of the river.

However, in United States v. Bellingham Bay Boom Co. 176 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 437, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 343, reversing 26 C. C. A. 547, 48 U. S. App. 443, 81 Fed. 658, it was held that a log boom which completely blocks up the channel of a navigable river, leaving no space for the free passage of boats and vessels, although it has what is known as a "trip," which may be opened for the passage of vessels, is not authorized by a statute providing that a boom shall be so constructed as to allow a free passage between it and the opposite shore for all vessels, or for ordinary purposes of navigation; and such boom is therefore not exempted from the prohibition in the river and harbor act of 1890, § 10, of obstructions to navigation not affirmatively authorized by law.

While, as appears from the above cases, the rights of one using a stream for the floatage of logs or for booming purposes must be exercised with due regard to the existence and preservation of the rights of those navigating vessels thereon; it will appear from the following cases that the converse is equally true:

Thus, in John Spry Lumber Co. v. The C. H. Green, 76 Mich. 320, 43 N. W. 576, it was held that the owner of a storage boom may recover from the owner of a boat which, through negligent management, strikes and breaks the boom, and permits the logs to escape. To the same effect is Castner v. The Dr. Franklin, 1 Minn. 73, Gil. 51.

resulted from defendant's negligence in "placing logs loose in said river in such quantities and in such manner, and with such lack of aftercare and oversight, as that the ordinary action of the current in said river caused them to occupy exclusively the surface thereof, and to accumulate in jams, and completely occupy the river from bank to bank." The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, on the alleged ground that it stated no cause of action, and plaintiff appealed.

The complaint is unnecessarily long, and contains many repetitions and immaterial statements. The court should have required plaintiff to recast the complaint so as to make it conform to the statute, which directs that it shall contain "a statement in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action." Kirby's Dig. § 6091, subd. 3. The question now before us for decision is whether or not the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendant. Purged of its surplusage, the complaint sets forth, in substance, the following state of facts: That defendant on and immediately prior to November 29, 1908, was engaged in the business of transporting logs in large quantities down Little Red river, by placing them loose in the water and floating or driving them downstream; and that in so doing on the occasion specified it placed loose logs in the river in such quantities that the ordinary action of the current caused them to accumulate in large jams, and completely occupy the river from bank to bank, to the exclusion of all other navigation; that this occurred at a point in the river above a road crossing where there was being operated a public ferry, known as Faulkner's Ferry, which was located just below a bend in the river, so that persons operating the ferryboat could not foresee the approach of dangerous objects above the bend; that defendant was negligent in permitting the loose logs to accumulate in such quantities, and in failing to exercise ordinary care to protect persons and property rightfully on the river from the danger thus created; that the defendant set no watch over the pile or jam of logs, and took no steps to warn other persons of the danger, although it knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the jam was likely to be broken at any time by the ordinary current of the river, and rush down upon and injure other property in the river, and persons navigating the

In Lallande v. The C. D. Jr. Newberry, Adm. 501, Fed. Cas. No. 8,000, it was held that the master of a steamboat who desires to enter a bayou, the mouth of which is obstructed by a raft driven therein from the river by the force of the wind, is not justified in cutting loose the raft as an obstruction to navigation, whereby most of the logs are carried away and lost, when the raft has occupied such position but a short time, and the one in charge is endeavoring to obtain the services of a boat to take it in tow.

In The Mary, 123 Fed. 609, it was held that a vessel coming down a stream has no right to run against and destroy as a nuisance a raft which has become accidentally grounded, until those in charge of the raft have been given a reasonable time to remove it. The court in this case said that, even assuming that those in charge of the raft did not exercise proper skill and reasonable diligence and despatch to remove the obstruction, and the raft thereby became a nuisance which the vessel had the right to remove, the master failed to use ordinary care to avoid unnecessary injury to the raft, since, instead of running over the raft and destroying it, a line could have been fastened to it, and the raft thus pulled away, or, if that was unsuccessful, it could have been cut open and removed sufficiently to make a passage.

In McCord v. The Tiber, 6 Biss. 409, Fed. Cas. No. 8,715, a vessel was held liable for personal injuries to a pilot of a passing raft, occasioned by a line stretched from the vessel, which was aground, to the shore.

8 L.R.A. (N.S.).

But when a raft put up in such shape as to be difficult to handle is floated down a river, and permitted in a narrow part of such river to crowd so near the shore that a vessel coming up, to which warning was not given, had not sufficient room to pass in safety, the vessel is not liable for driving through the raft and scattering its contents. The Athabasca, 45 Fed. 651.

So, in Brace v. Union Forwarding Co. 32 U. C. Q. B. 43, it was held that one who uses a government boom for the purpose of running logs into a private boom, in such a way as to interfere with the passage of a steamboat, will not be entitled to recover for injury in case the steamer fouls and breaks the boom, causing the logs to escape and be lost.

The general question of right to use stream for floating logs is discussed in a note to Carlson v. St. Louis River Dam & Improv. Co. 41 L.R.A. 371. Cases dealing with the liability for injuries caused by floating logs may also be found in a note to Crookston Waterworks, Power, & Light Co. v. Sprague, 64 L.R.A. 983.

The right to construct log booms is discussed in a note to Miller v. Hare, 39 L.R.A. 491.

A note to Trullinger v. Howe, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 545, discusses the question of relative rights and duties between those maintaining a dam in a floatable stream, and those using the stream for floating logs and timber therein.

river at points below the jam; that defendant knew that the river was rising at that time, and that it would render the jam of logs more dangerous to other navigation, and took no steps to avoid the danger and prevent injury; that defendant knew that below said jam there was the public ferryboat customarily plying the river back and forth from bank to bank, at frequent intervals, and knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the great mass of logs accumulated above the ferry was rushing down, and had almost reached the ferrying place, and took no steps to warn those operating the ferry of the approaching danger; that on account of such negligence, the ferryboat on which Henderson was a passenger was struck amid stream and overturned by the downrushing mass of logs, and Henderson was drowned.

We are of the opinion that the complaint stated a cause of action, and that the demurrer should have been overruled. Mr. Farnham in his work on Waters & Water Rights, vol. 1, § 27, says that "the rules which govern the use of a body of water for purposes of navigation are similar to those governing the use of highways in general," and that all who use a stream or body of water for purposes of navigation must do so in such a way as not to unreasonably interfere with the rights of others. What constitutes reasonable use depends on the circumstances of each particular case. The same author in another place (§ 33) says: "A person attempting to exercise his right to navigate a public body of water must exercise due care not to injure the property of other persons which may be found upon the water or along the shores." And on the subject of floating logs on navigable waters, he makes the following statement of the law (§ 34): "The floating of logs being one of the uses to which navigable water ways may be put, there is no liability for the result of a careful and reasonable exercise of such use. . . . In the presence of concurrent rights, one to float timber, and the other to have property free from injury by the displacement of water and contact with floating timber, the former must be exercised with ordinary care that injury should not be done to the latter." By way of illustration of the above-announced rule, the author says (§ 31): "A slow-sailing tow may not occupy unreasonably the entire channel of the river, and thus impede its navigation by all other vessels. A leviathan may not rush through the water with a speed that will overwhelm in its surges all the craft ordinarily to be found on a river. . . . The navigator of a public river must conduct his craft with ordinary care and caution, and with the same circumspection and in that careful, prudent manner which would seem to be dictated by common sense, and with due regard to the rights, property, and lives of others." The Kentucky court of appeals, in a case involving the question of liability for damage caused by floating logs in a stream, said: "Those lawfully using the stream as a highway for transporting their commodities to market must do so with care, and due regard for those whose rights are at least of equal dignity with their own. In this way all may fully enjoy the benefits offered by this highway of nature." James v. Carter, 96 Ky. 378, 29 S. W. 19. See also Sullivan v. Jernigan, 21 Fla. 264; The Athabasca (D. C.) 45 Fed. 651; Gulf Red Cedar Co. v. Walker, 132 Ala. 553, 31 So. 374; Outtersen v. Gould, 77 Hun, 429, 28 N. Y. Supp. 798; Field v. Apple River Log Driving Co. 67 Wis. 569, 31 N. W. 17.

Now, applying the principles above stated to the facts set forth above in the complaint, we think a cause of liability for damages is made out. Little Red river is a navigable stream, used mainly for floating logs. Defendant and others had the right to use it for that purpose, even without rafting the logs; but in doing so they must exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring others who rightfully use the river for purposes of navigation. Those who use the river must take notice of defendant's use in floating logs in the usual way, and must exercise care to avoid contact with the logs. The question whether defendant made use of the stream in a careful manner,—that is to say, free from negligence under the circumstances of the case,—and whether the injured party exercised care under the circumstances for his own safety, are questions for a jury to pass on. According to the allegations of the complaint, defendant placed a large quantity of the logs in the river, and, without protection or warning to others, allowed them to accumulate in a great mass or jam, under circumstances which it should have known would, in the ordinary course of events, result in injury to others, when it was broken by the rising waters and carried down the stream, filling it from bank to bank. If these facts are proved, the question should be submitted to a jury to determine whether or not it constituted negligence under the circumstances. The fact that Congress, which possesses the power, or the Secretary of War, to whom Congress has delegated the power, has not prescribed regulations for floating loose timber on streams in which that is the principal method of navigation, does not leave entirely unrestricted the rights of one using such navigable stream. One so using it must exercise care in so doing, even where no regulations are prescribed governing the use.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

M. E. LEWIS et al.

v.

JAMES H. BRADY, Governor, et al.

(17 Idaho, 251, 104 Pac. 900.)

State debt — constitutional limitation — construction.

1. The words "debt" and "liability," as used in § 1, art. 8, of the Constitution, are not employed in a technical sense, but have special reference to the basic warrant and legislative authority on which a state contract must rest, and on which alone a public debt must find its sanction in order to obligate the state to pay.

Same — computation — assessed value.

2. Under the provisions of § 1, art. 8, of the Constitution, the basis for computation by the legislature in creating public indebtedness is "the assessed value of the taxable property of the state," and this is a present standard for the guidance of the legislature, and has reference to existing facts and conditions at the time the legislature acts on such legislation.

Same — constitutional requirement.

3. Under the provisions of § 1, art. 8, of the Constitution, the legislature, in the passage of an act creating public indebtedness, must be governed by the assessed value of the taxable property of the state, as the same has been ascertained and then exists, and such legislation cannot anticipate the future, and leave the ascertainment of the assessed valuation to the future acts of ministerial and executive officers.

(November 12, 1909.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the issuance and sale of certain state bonds, in pursuance of a statute providing therefor. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richards & Haga for plaintiffs.
Messrs. D. C. McDougall, Attorney General, and J. H. Peterson, for defendants.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original application for a writ of mandate. It is prosecuted by the board of regents of the state university against the governor, secretary of state, attorney general, and treasurer of the state of Idaho, officers composing a board for the purpose of the issuance and sale of certain bonds of the state of Idaho, to be known as "University of Idaho Rebuilding and Equipment Bonds of 1909, Series A." It is alleged that under the provisions of an act of the legislature approved March 17, 1909 (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 407), entitled, "An Act Providing for the Issuance and Sale of State Bonds in the Aggregate Sum of Seventy-three Thousand Dollars ($73,000), and Appropriating the Proceeds Thereof to the University of Idaho for Completing the Main or Administration Building, the Central Heating Plant, for the Purchase of Note. — As of what time is the assessed valuation to be taken for purposes of determining the debt limit of a state or municipality.

In Rathbone v. Kiowa County, 27 C. C. A. 477, 49 U. S. App. 577, 83 Fed. 125; Board of Education v. National L. Ins. Co. 36 C. C. A. 278, 94 Fed. 324; Lake County v. Standley, 24 Colo. 1, 49 Pac. 23; and Germania Sav. Bank v. Darlington, 50 S. C. 337, 27 S. E. 846, it was held that where the debt of a municipality was limited to a certain percentage of the "assessed valuation" of the property therein, the computation of the debt permitted should be based on the last completed assessment before the debt was incurred.

So, in State ex rel. Marinette, T. & W. R. Co. v. Tomahawk, 96 Wis. 73, 71 N. W. 86, involving the validity of railroad aid bonds issued by a city, it was held, under a constitutional provision limiting municipal indebtedness to a certain percentage based upon the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the "last assessment for state and county taxes previous to the incurring of the indebtedness," that the computation must be based upon the last assessment next before the time fixed for the completion of the road and the delivery of the bonds.

Upon the same principle, it was held in Johnston v. Becker County, 27 Minn. 64, 6 N. W. 411, under a statute providing that taxes should be levied annually upon the taxable property in the state "as valued and entered on the grand list of taxable property," and prohibiting any county from contracting any debt which would make it necessary to levy upon the taxable property of such county a higher rate of tax than the statute permitted, that in considering whether a debt could be incurred, the county was bound to inquire whether a sufficient sum to discharge it could be raised by a levy within the statute on the taxable property of the county, as the same appeared upon the subsisting "grand list" of the county, and not upon any future "grand list."

In Lake County v. Sutliff, 38 C. C. A. 167, 97 Fed. 270, and Corning v. Meade County, Lands, and for Other Equipment and Improvements, and Authorizing the Levy of an Annual Ad Valorem Tax for Providing a Sinking Fund for the Payment of Such Bonds at Maturity and the Interest Thereon," the defendants are empowered and directed to issue and sell thirty bonds of the state of Idaho of the par value of $1,000 each, payable in two years after date of their issuance, and bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, the receipts from such sale to be available for the use of the state university, as specified and designated in the act. An examination of the act itself discloses that it authorizes the issuance and sale of bonds in the aggregate amount of $73,000, that the first $30,000 of the issue should be made on September 1, 1909, and the remainder of $43,000 should be made on September 1, 1910. The reason which prompted the legislature to defer the issuance of these bonds was that, at the time of the passage of this act, the state indebtedness was within about $1,300 of the constitutional limit, as prescribed by § 1, art. 8, of the state Constitution. The purpose of deferring the issuance of these bonds is very clearly and forcibly indicated by a proviso added to § 2 of the act. It reads as follows: "Provided, always, that in the issue of the bonds provided for by this act, the constitutional limit of state indebtedness be not exceeded, and that the retirement of outstanding bonds, or the increase of the assessed valuation of the state, or both, occurring between the date of the passage of this act and the dates of issuance of said bonds, be sufficient to bring the issues of bonds provided for in this act within the constitutional limit of state indebtedness." It is alleged in the petition that the state treasurer and the other state officers, acting in conjunction with him, decline and refuse to issue and negotiate the bonds provided to be issued on September 1, 1909, and the petitioners pray that a writ of mandate issue against them, requiring and compelling them to proceed in conformity with the act of March 17, 1909, and issue and negotiate $30,000 worth of bonds.

Defendants demurred to the petition, and among other grounds alleged that the act of March 17, 1909, which purports to authorize and direct the issuance of these bonds, is unconstitutional and void as being 42 C. C. A. 154, 102 Fed. 57, writ of certiorari denied 180 U. S. 638, 35 L. ed. 710, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921, it was held that the assessed valuation by which the constitutional or statutory limit of municipal indebtedness was to be measured was the last assessed valuation of the property before the bonds creating the debt were issued, and not the last one before they were voted.

But in Wilkinson v. Van Orman, 70 Iowa, 230, 30 N. W. 495, it was held under a provision limiting the indebtedness to a certain amount, to "be ascertained by the last state and county tax lists previous to incurring such indebtedness," that the computation should be based upon the tax lists which were completed before the bonds were voted by the electors of the district, and not upon assessment rolls not yet equalized for the year in which the election was had.

And in State ex rel. Sutton v. Babcock, 24 Neb. 640, 39 N. W. 783, it was held that the amount of bonds which could be issued by a city was to be measured by the assessed valuation at the time of the election.

In State ex rel. Morse v. Cornwell, 40 S. C. 26, 18 S. E. 184, it was held under a constitutional limitation of municipal indebtedness to a certain percentage "of the assessed value of all the taxable property" in the municipality, that the assessed value meant the assessment made by the proper authorities, completed and of record at the time the debt was created, and not an assessment made within the same fiscal year, but not completed until after the creation of such debt.

fer v. Hamill, 134 Ill. 666, 17 N. E. 799, 29 N. E. 280 (an earlier case, though published later), it was held that where a city entered into a contract for the construction of a system of waterworks, the validity of the debt incurred thereby was to be determined by the assessment made prior to the execution of such contract, and not by a subsequent assessment of the same year in which the contract was entered into, though the later assessment was made before the time stipulated in the contract for the completion of the work.

In West v. Chehalis, 12 Wash. 369, 50 Am. St. Rep. 896, 41 Pac. 171, it was held that where municipal indebtedness at the date of its incurring was within the constitutional limitation, as shown by the last previous assessment, the indebtedness might be validated by the subsequent vote of the citizens, irrespective of the value of the taxable property, as shown by the assessment in force at the time of the validating election.

In Prickett v. Marceline, 65 Fed. 469, affirmed in 15 C. C. A. 700, 32 U. S. App. 767, 69 Fed. 462, it appeared that the Constitution of Missouri explicitly declared that the value of taxable property in a municipality, for the purpose of ascertaining the limit of indebtedness, was to be determined "by the assessment next before the last assessment for state and county purposes, previous to the incurring of such indebtedness," and the specific holding of the court was that the act of extending the assessment by taxation by the city officers for city purposes did not constitute an "assessment," within the meaning of the Constitution.

in violation of § 1, art. 8, of the state Constitution. The portion of that section involved in this case reads as follows: "The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate, exclusive of the debt of the territory at the date of its admission as a state, exceed the sum of one and one half per centum upon the assessed value of the taxable property in the state, except," etc. It is first contended by the attorney general that this act is unconstitutional for the reason that the title is insufficient, and does not comply with the requirements of § 16, art. 3, of the Constitution. The conclusion we have reached, however, on the other question raised, renders it unnecessary for us to consider the title to this act. It is admitted that, at the time of the passage of the act authorizing this bond issue, it would not have been constitutional to authorize the immediate issue and sale of such bonds for a sum exceeding $1,362. It is claimed, however, that the act must be read and construed as if passed and approved on September 1, 1909, the date on which it authorizes the sale of the bonds. On the latter date this bond issue was not in excess of the constitutional limit. The assessed valuation of the taxable property of the state for 1908, and at the time of the passage of the act in question, was $119,724,181. The aggregate indebtedness of the state, exclusive of the debt of the territory, and also exclusive of the debt authorized by this act, was $1,794,500. The assessed valuation of the taxable property of the state on September 1, 1909, was $120,815,434, and the total indebtedness of the state on that date, exclusive of the territorial debt, and exclusive of the debt authorized by the act in question, was $1,754,250. It will be observed that between the time of the approval of this act and September 1, 1909, the indebtedness of the state was reduced $40,250, while the assessed valuation of the state during the same period increased $1,091,253. The question, therefore, to be answered, is simply this: Does § 1 of article 8 of the Constitution, above quoted, limit the legislature to the assessed valuation at the time the legislature is enacting and the governor is approving the act, or does it apply to the date at and after which the legislative act authorizes the sale of the bonds? If it refers to the former date, this act is void; if to the latter, it is valid.

Counsel for plaintiffs lay considerable stress on the words "debt" and "liability" as they appear in § 1, art. 8, and reason from the definitions of these words that the legislative act does not "create" the debt, but that the "debt" therein mentioned arises only when bonds are sold and the money is received therefor. It is true that the ordinary meaning of the word "debt" is that which one person is liable to pay or render to another in presenti, or at some future date. But it must have been used in this instance in a less technical sense, and with more special reference to the basic warrant and legislative authority on which the contract must rest, and on which alone the debt must find its sanction in order to obligate the state to pay. The framers of the Constitution, in drafting this section, evidently used the words "debt" and "liability" in the sense that they are "created" by the legislative act, and that the preparation and sale of bonds or warrants is only a ministerial act, prescribed and directed by the law itself. The real "creative" act in such an indebtedness is the legislative authority for the transaction. But there is other language used in this section of the Constitution which is, to our minds, more persuasive and convincing than that just considered. The basis of computation by the legislature in creating indebtedness is "the assessed value of the taxable property in the state." This is a present standard for the guidance of the legislature. It is to guide them in the passage of any measure looking to the creation of a debt, and it must exist when they are acting. It has reference to facts that already exist,—to an existing condition. They cannot act upon the basis of an "assessed value" which does not exist when they act. The "assessed value," as here used, is a present, existing, ascertained amount, and the legislature is not left to make choice among several valuations or sundry assessments. Neither can it, in our judgment, anticipate the future, and leave it to the will and pleasure of ministerial and executive officers, acting as a board of equalization, to so swell the total assessed valuation of the state, as returned by the various counties, that they may, in any given year, sell state bonds or not, at their pleasure. It so happened in this case that sufficient bonds were retired to permit the sale of this issue on September 1, 1909, and still be within the debt limit, even though the assessed valuation for 1909 had not increased over that for 1908; but this can make no difference with the principle involved. It might have depended entirely on a raise of the total assessed valuation, and the same officers who are to negotiate and sell these bonds are members of the board of equalization. There is no vice in this fact alone, but it illustrates the danger of such a rule, and the improbability that the framers of the Constitution ever intended an interpretation to be placed on this section that would make such a thing possible.

No authorities have been called to our attention that are directly in point. The case nearest in point is that of Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, in which the supreme court of Illinois construed the debt limitation section of the Constitution of that state, and arrived at a conclusion analogous to the view we have here expressed. The case of James v. State University, 131 Ky. 156, 114 S. W. 767, is cited by plaintiffs as supporting their position, but we do not think it can be so construed. That was the case of an appropriation to defray the current expenses of maintaining the State University of Kentucky and other educational institutions. A certain amount of the appropriation was made available each year, and was payable out of the annual revenues and income of the state. The court of appeals held in effect that such an appropriation would not amount to a "debt" within the meaning of the Constitution. That is in line with the decision of this court in Stein v. Morrison, 9 Idaho, 426, 75 Pac. 246, wherein it was held that an appropriation of the public revenues in anticipation of their receipt for the current expenses of state government does not amount to a "debt" within the purview of § 1, art. 8, of the Constitution. This provision of the Constitution was adopted for the protection of the people against the pressure that might be brought to bear on the members of the legislature for excessive appropriation for the various state institutions, internal improvements, and various other objects and purposes. It was intended to protect the new state from oppressive taxation and bankruptcy such as had befallen other states that had no such protection as a debt limitation in their Constitutions. It is a wholesome and salutary safeguard, and no other provision of the Constitution should appeal more forcibly to the courts than this. The act in question is unconstitutional and void in so far as it authorizes the issuance of bonds in excess of the limitation fixed by § 1, art. 8, of the state Constitution, and based upon the assessed valuation of the year 1908.

The demurrer to the petition is sustained, and the action is dismissed. No costs will be taxed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

DANIEL G. COLE, Appt.,

v.

FRANK R. MILLSPAUGH, Respt.

(— Minn. —, 126 N. W. 626.)

Libel — words defamatory of clergyman.

1. It is libelous per se to write of a clergyman, an applicant for a pulpit, "I would not have anything to do with him, or touch him with a 10-foot pole," if under the circumstances the words used would expose the person written of to hatred or contempt, or injury in his business or occupation.

Same — pleading — complaint — sufficiency.

2. Complaint held to state a cause of action, and presenting the question of fact whether the words used were intended to and might be understood to charge conduct or characteristics inconsistent with good character or plaintiff's profession.

(May 27, 1910.)

Headnotes by O'BRIEN, J.

Note. — What words uttered concerning clergyman are actionable per se.

Where derogatory words are uttered concerning clergymen, which tend to prove them unfit to continue their calling, the authorities are agreed that they are actionable in themselves, without proof of damage.

This accepted rule is well stated as follows in Newell on Defamation, 2d ed. p. 186, which section is cited in Potter v. New York Evening Journal Pub. Co. 68 App. Div. 95, 74 N. Y. Supp. 317: "Words are often actionable when spoken of clergymen which would not be so if spoken of others. But it does not follow that all words tend to bring a clergyman into disrepute, or which merely impute that he has done something wrong, are actionable without proof of special damage. The reason always assigned for this distinction between clergymen and others is that the charge, if true, would be ground of degradation or deprivation. The imputation, therefore, must be such as, if true, would tend to prove him unfit to continue his calling, and, therefore, tend more or less directly to proceedings by the proper authorities to silence him."

In the following cases the several written words concerning clergymen were held actionable per se: Bidwell v. Rademacher, 11 Ind. App. 218, 38 N. E. 879 (publishing in paper of bishop who as such was superintendent of an orphan asylum, that a young girl therein was confined in a dungeon for refusing to submit to desires of priest who was instructor in the asylum); *Bailey v. To make a case of libel, some actual imputation upon the plaintiff is necessary.

Rice v. Simmons, 2 Harr. (Del.) 417, 31 Am. Dec. 766; McDermott v. Union Credit Co. 76 Minn. 84, 78 N. W. 967, 79 N. W. 673; Herringer v. Ingberg, 91 Minn. 71, 97 N. W. 460.

It is essential, in case of words which are not of themselves libelous, that facts be stated showing how or why the language acquired and represented a defamatory meaning.

ter, as a member of a certain denomination, for funeral services, will confer a favor on the public generally by notifying the publisher," held actionable where innuendoes alleged that the meaning was that the plaintiff was falsely pretending to be a minister of that denomination).

In the following cases, where the matter was uttered orally, the several statements were held actionable per se: Elsas v. Browne, 68 Ga. 117 (charging minister with collecting money to print a paper, and embezzling it for his own use); Flanders v. Daley, 120 Ga. 885, 48 S. E. 327, s. c. on subsequent appeal, 124 Ga. 714, 52 S. E. 687 (stating, "I have always known he was unfit for the ministry, and an improper person to be allowed to preach, and was too dangerous and indiscreet"); Franklin v. Browne, 67 Ga. 272 (saying that minister collected money for a particular purpose and embezzled it, and that he is unfit to be a minister); Mitchell v. Mullholland, 106 Ill. 175 (saying, "He perjured himself," "You swore to a lie"); Chaddock v. Briggs, 13 Mass. 248, 7 Am. Dec. 137; Hayner v. Cowden, 27 Ohio St. 292, 22 Am. Rep. 303; McMillan v. Birch, 1 Binn. 178, 2 Am. Dec. 426; Dod v. Robinson, Aleyn, 63 (charging minister with drunkenness); Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. 244 (saying of clergyman that he was a liar, a knave, and a rascal, not expressly discussed, but recovery allowed); Shurtleff v. Parker, 130 Mass. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Tappan v. Wilson, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 190; Herringer v. Ingberg, supra; Smith v. Coe, 22 Minn. 276; Newell v. How, 31 Minn. 235, 17 N. W. 383; Richmond v. Post, 69 Minn. 457, 72 N. W. 704; Goldstein v. Foss, 4 Bing. 489; Barham v. Netherlands, 4 Coke, 20a; Caldwell v. Raymond, 2 Abb. Pr. 193; Fry v. Bennett, 5 Sandf. 54; Stone v. Cooper, 2 Denio, 293; Cole v. Neustadter, 22 Or. 191, 29 Pac. 550.

The facts justifying a defamatory interpretation are equally indispensable in charging a libel, as touching the plaintiff in his profession.

Robinson v. Germyn, 1 Price, 11; Goldstein v. Foss, supra; Gillan v. State Journal Printing Co. 96 Wis. 460, 71 N. W. 892; Divens v. Meredith, 147 Ind. 693, 47 N. E. 143; Purdy v. Rochester Printing Co. 96 N. Y. 372, 48 Am. Rep. 632; Ayre v. Craven, 2 Ad. & El. 2; Newell v. How, supra.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for libel. According to the complaint, a demurrer to which was sustained upon the ground of no cause of action, the Universalist Church in Minnesota has what is known as a "fellowship committee," to which applications for pastorates are addressed. The recommendation of the committee is necessary to the obtaining of any such pastorate. Plaintiff, a duly ordained

293, 39 Am. Rep. 454 (impliedly held actionable to say of minister that he was connected with no association of ministers, and was sent away from societies of which he had been pastor without the usual recommendations); Ritchie v. Widdemer, 59 N. J. L. 290, 35 Atl. 825 (saying that wherever minister had previously exercised ministerial functions, he had had trouble with the female sex, in one instance such that his wife threatened to leave him); Cummin v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 440 (statement that minister had committed perjury); Skinner v. Grant, 12 Vt. 456 (saying of clergyman that he said the blood of Christ had nothing to do with our salvation, more than the blood of a hog, impliedly held actionable); Hellstern v. Katzer, 103 Wis. 391, 79 N. W. 429 (archbishop stating to a priest's congregation that he was not of sound mind, that he was no more the priest of the church, since the archbishop had taken all rights away from him, that a blind or dazed priest has given the offense of ecclesiastical disobedience); Musgrave v. Bovey, 2 Strange. 946 (saying of minister, "You are an old rogue and a rascal and a contemptible fellow, despised and hated by everybody"); Pocock v. Nash, Comb. 253 (saying of minister that he is a rogue and a dog, and will never be good until he is 3 feet under ground, and that defendant would rather his son should make hay on Sunday than hear plaintiff preach); Cranden v. Walden, 3 Lev. 17 minister of the Gospel, had applied to the committee for a position, and, while his application was pending, "defendant falsely and maliciously, for the purpose of preventing plaintiff from securing the pastorship of any such vacant churches, and of injuring plaintiff in his profession as a minister, wrote and published of and concerning plaintiff, and of and concerning him in his profession as a minister, to said Rev. Thomas S. Robjont and others of said fellowship committee, the following false, malicious, defamatory, and libelous words and language, to wit: 'I (meaning defendant) would not have anything to do with him, or touch him (meaning plaintiff) with a 10-foot pole' (thereby meaning to charge, and intending to mean and charge, that plaintiff was unfit and unqualified morally and intellectually to fill the pastorship of any church, and particularly of any of said vacant pastorships of the Universalist Church aforesaid, and unfit and unsafe to fill any position of employment or place of trust, and that he was a man of bad character and poor intellectual qualifications, and untrustworthy in any place or position)."

Defendant insists that the words, "I would not have anything to do with him, or touch him with a 10-foot pole," are not libelous per se, for the reason that they neither assert nor imply anything against the plaintiff, but merely state what the defendant himself would not do. Libel, as defined by § 4916, Rev. Laws 1905, is a malicious writing which exposes one "to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which shall cause, or tend to cause, any person to be shunned or avoided, or which shall have a tendency to injure any person, corporation, or association of persons in his or their business or occupation." If a written statement is intended to, and may, as the words used are ordinarily understood, produce that result, the statute is violated, and a cause of action for general damages exists in favor of the person as to whom the statement is made.

This case is not free from difficulty. In themselves the words used do not charge the plaintiff with the commission of any crime, nor the possession by him of any characteristics which would necessarily expose him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule upon the part of any person other than the defendant, who is, of course, free to enjoy his own likes and dislikes and select his own company. Upon the other hand, the statement is one which might, under certain circumstances, imply, and be understood as charging, the possession by the plaintiff of habits and qualities which would render him entirely unfit to be the pastor of a church congregation. The considerations governing such a case are fully discussed in McDermott v. Union Credit Co.

(charging that minister preaches nothing but lies and malice in the pulpit); Townsend v. Hughes, 2 Mod. 159 (saying of bishop, "He is a wicked man"); Nicholson v. Lyne, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 94 (saying of minister that he had two wives); Starr v. Gardner, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 512 (saying of paid preacher that he has committed incest with his sister); Pemberton v. Colla, 10 Q. B. 461 (stating that clergyman had drugged defendant and then fraudulently procured his signature to a bill).

In Demarest v. Haring, 6 Cow. 76, it was held that a statement by defendant that plaintiff had solicited him to make away with a bastard child was actionable, irrespective of plaintiff's character as a clergyman; and that words conveying a direct charge of incontinency were actionable in respect of the plaintiff's profession as a clergyman, though they would not be if spoken of individuals generally.

In Gallwey v. Marshall, 9 Exch. 295, the court said they would have no doubt of a minister's right to recover for a verbal imputation of incontinence, if it had been alleged that he was at the time in receipt of professional temporary emolument.

But it has been held unnecessary that the minister defamed should be receiving compensation for his services at the time the words are spoken. Flanders v. Daley, 120 Ga. 885, 48 S. E. 327.

ion, however, as to what words touch a minister in his profession.

Thus, the following oral imputations have been held not actionable per se, since they were held not to have been spoken of him with reference to his office of minister: Tighe v. Wicks, 33 U. C. Q. B. 479 (saying of minister, "He will get drunk; I have seen him drunk"); Breeze v. Sails, 23 U. C. Q. B. 94 (saying of preacher that he kept company with a prostitute); Hopwood v. Thorn, 8 C. B. 291 (saying of minister that he was a rogue, and that he had outgeneraled his former partner in regard to the accounts, that he had cheated his partner, and expressing a wonder how respectable persons could countenance such a man in their presence); McDowell v. Bowles, 53 N. C. (8 Jones, L.) 184 (charging white man who was minister, with being a free negro).

It was held in Klos v. Zahorik, 113 Iowa, 161, 53 L.R.A. 235, 84 N. W. 1046, that sending an article to a paper, stating that if certain accounts which had appeared in the newspapers with reference to the acts of a priest in soliciting contributions from his congregation for the Spaniards were true, the priest had acted in an improper manner, and should be condemned by the public, did not render the person liable. The decision, however, rests on the ground that it was not a false statement of fact, but rather a criticism of the priest's supposed acts.

76 Minn. 84, 78 N. W. 967, 79 N. W. 673. On the reargument of that case it was held that to charge one with being "slow" in the payment of his debts was not libelous per se; but that was only because of the particular circumstances there existing and the connection in which the statement was made. That decision was to the effect that a discommendatory statement general in its terms, and which charges neither the commission of crime nor the possession of specific offensive characteristics, may or may not be libelous per se, depending upon the circumstances and conditions under which the statement is made. It seems clear that such is the correct conclusion; otherwise, a skilful writer might destroy the reputation of another, and yet avoid all legal responsibility for his conduct. It is not necessary to descend to vulgar abuse, or to make specific charges of crime, in order to expose one to hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to injure him in his business or occupation.

The plaintiff is a clergyman, and must, if he is to be successful in the practice of his profession, maintain a spotless reputation. He had submitted his application to be placed in charge of a church to the committee, whose recommendation was necessary, and who, before making it, were required to determine his qualifications for the position, which necessarily included not only his integrity and education, but those refined and personal qualifications so necessary to a successful performance of the many and complex duties falling to the lot of a clergyman. While it is true that the plain meaning of the words cannot be changed by any allegations of the complaint, it is also true that the circumstances under which the statement was made and the motive of the person making it may determine the meaning with which the words were used, and how they were intended to be and were understood. The complaint alleges that the words quoted were written by the defendant maliciously to the members of the committee for the purpose of preventing the committee from giving its recommendation to the plaintiff. We cannot avoid the conclusion that such a statement so made, and emanating from a responsible source, might tend to expose a clergyman situated as was the plaintiff, to contempt and injury in his profession. Therefore, under the allegations of the complaint, evidence might properly be received which would justify a jury in so finding. In the absence of any denial, explanation, or justification upon the part of the defendant, it must be held that the statement was libelous and actionable per se, and the demurrer improperly sustained.

Order reversed.

Note. — Liability for damming back water of stream by bridge.

The earlier cases on this question are included in a note to Avery v. Vermont Electric Co. 59 L.R.A. 817.

That a railroad company or other corporation or person constructing or maintaining a bridge, trestle, or culvert over a stream must exercise care to provide for the flow of the water in the stream, and that for a failure to do so the one maintaining the bridge is liable in damages, is supported by the following cases, in addition to those set out in the earlier note: Graham v. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. 39 Ind. App. 294, 77 N. E. 57, 1055; Wallingford v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 1049, 107 S. W. 781; Howard v. Buffalo, 122 N. Y. Supp. 1095; Miller v. Buffalo & S. R. Co. 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 515; Dutton v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 630; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Rollins (Tex. Civ. App.) 89 S. W. 1099; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Buchanan, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 129, 107 S. W. 595; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Cannon (Tex. Civ. App.) 111 S. W. 661; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Macon (Tex. Civ. App.) 115 S. W. 847; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Suter (Tex. Civ. App.) 118 S. W. 215.

And so long as the flood is not an extraordinary or unprecedented one, that is, one that could not reasonably have been foreseen, but is merely such a flood as is characteristic of the water course, and might reasonably have been anticipated, the railroad company, or, as is the case in some instances, the municipal corporation, is liable for the damages resulting from the negligent construction of the bridge which caused the overflow.

In addition to the many cases cited in the earlier note for this proposition, the follow-fact that other corporations, whose liability depends upon the same state of facts, are joined as defendants, does not change the rule.

Instructions — waters — obstruction by bridge — duty of builder.

2. An instruction that the builder of a bridge over a stream is required to leave openings for the passage of all the water reasonably to be expected to flow therein gives the proper measure of his duty. To add thereto a statement that no liability can attach for the results of an unusual rain or an extraordinary freshet, without further explanation, tends to mislead the jury.

Flood waters — obstruction by bridge — duty of builder.

3. The duty of the builder of a bridge over a water course to avoid obstructing it does not end with making provision for the escape of so much water as can be carried within the channel. If there is reason to anticipate that the stream will at times overflow its banks, he must also, if practicable, provide an outlet for the flood water.

Appeal — reversal — nonprejudicial error — statute.

4. The provision of the new Code (Laws 1909, chap. 182, § 581) that reversal shall not be ordered for errors which do not affirmatively appear to have prejudicially affected the substantial rights of the party complaining, when it appears that substantial justice has been done, does not authorize the affirmation of a judgment upon the ground that it is in accordance with the view of the facts which the reviewing court itself might derive from the conflicting evidence, where it is based on a verdict rendered under the apparent influence of a materially erroneous instruction, or by a jury made up in part of persons disqualified on account of interest.

But a railway company is not liable for injuries to the property of a riparian owner by water thrown thereon by the overflow of a stream, the water of which cannot, because of a storm so extraordinary in character that it has had but one precedent in forty years, escape through its culvert. Eagan v. Central Vermont R. Co. 81 Vt. 141, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 928, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1031, 69 Atl. 732.

Similar cases, and holding to the same effect, are Southern R. Co. v. A. M. E. Church (Ky.) 121 S. W. 972, and American Locomotive Co. v. Hoffman, 105 Va. 343, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 252, 54 S. E. 25, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773.

This was also recognized in Bell v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 36 Tex. Civ. App. 569, 82 S. W. 1073.

In Southern R. Co. v. A. M. E. Church, supra, it was held that the liability of a railroad company for obstructing the water in a stream by means of a new bridge could not be made to depend upon whether the new bridge obstructed the water to a greater extent than the old bridge, since, as the court said, the railroad was liable only in the event that the new bridge obstructed the passage of the water that accumulated from such ordinary and usual rainfalls in that vicinity as might have been anticipated by persons of ordinary experience and prudence, and it was not liable for overflow caused by extraordinary rains or floods, i. e., such floods or rains as were of such unusual occurrence in that vicinity that they could not have been anticipated by persons of ordinary experience and prudence.

But even if the flood were of such an extraordinary character that the one maintaining the bridge would ordinarily not be held for the obstruction of the water, yet, where there is negligence concurring with the flood, resulting in injury that would not otherwise have occurred, the one maintaining the bridge, although not liable for the action of the extraordinary flood, is liable for the damages which, but for the negligence in the maintenance of the bridge, would not have occurred. Standley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 121 Mo. App. 537, 97 S. W. 244.

It will be noted that in BROADWAY MFG. CO. v. LEAVENWORTH TERMINAL R. & BRIDGE CO. it was held that not only must the one maintaining a bridge over a stream make provision for the escape of so much water as can be carried within the channel, but he must also, if practicable, provide sufficient passageway for the flood water.

A case similar to BROADWAY MFG. CO. v. LEAVENWORTH TERMINAL R. & BRIDGE CO., and holding to the same effect, is Roland v. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. 82 Kan. 546, 108 Pac. 808.

This proposition is also supported by Howard v. Buffalo, supra, holding that those maintaining bridges over a stream must provide sufficient openings to permit, during ordinary floods, the passage of water outside the ordinary banks of the stream, but confined within the flood banks.

In Wilson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra, it seems to have been held that a railroad com-

Messrs. F. P. Fitzwilliams, O. J. Wood, John H. Atwood, W. Littlefield, and W. W. Hooper, for appellees:

Waters which have overflowed the banks of a stream during a freshet, in consequence of the insufficiency of the channel to hold and carry them off, are surface waters, to be treated as a common enemy, against which any landowner affected may protect himself.

Missouri P. R. Co. v. Keys, 55 Kan. 205, 49 Am. St. Rep. 249, 40 Pac. 275; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Renfro, 52 Kan. 237, 39 Am. St. Rep. 344, 34 Pac. 802; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cloud County, 75 Kan. 810, 88 Pac. 529.

pany maintaining a bridge over a stream must provide sufficient passageway even for the flood waters coming from another stream, which, as appears, was also bridged by the railroad company.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Herman, supra, there was a suggestion that the overflow of the stream was to be treated as surface water, and that the company could not be held liable for injury resulting therefrom. The court, however, said that if the water was thrown back upon the riparian owner because of the obstruction of the channel of the stream, it is immaterial by what name it is designated. The party who obstructs the flow and causes the injury is responsible.

So, in Edwards v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. and Standley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. supra, it was held that if the overflow of the stream was caused by the obstruction of the stream, the defense cannot be interposed that such water is surface water.

In San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Kiersey (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 1045, an instruction, in an action against a railroad company for damages to land, caused by the overflow of water, resulting from the alleged negligent construction of a trestle, to the effect that although the overflow was extraordinary, yet, if such overflow could have been reasonably anticipated by railroad engineers of ordinary prudence and skill, who, in the building of the embankments and trestle, "could have constructed them so as not to have caused the damage complained of," then the railroad company would be 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The overflow was the result of temporary causes not usually existing, and for which defendants are not responsible.

Taylor v. Fickes, 64 Ind. 167, 31 Am. Rep. 114; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Herman, 74 Kan. 77, 85 Pac. 817.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Property of the Broadway Manufacturing Company was injured by water overflowing from Three Mile creek, in Leavenworth, on the night of July 5, 1904. The company claimed that the overflow was caused by two bridges over the stream, one belonging to the city and the other to the Leavenworth Terminal Railway & Bridge Company, and by a trestlework viaduct of the Leavenworth & Topeka Railway Company, extending along the bed of the stream between the two bridges. It sued the owners of the three structures for substantially $20,000, alleging that all were negligently constructed. A general verdict was rendered for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment rendered thereon.

One hundred and ninety assignments of error are made, mainly relating to the admission and rejection of evidence and to guilty of negligence, was held not erroneous as imposing upon the defendant a degree of care greater than ordinary, and the necessity of erecting a construction beyond reason, or beyond what a person of ordinary prudence would have constructed under similar circumstances.

The question of prescriptive right to maintain a bridge in a certain manner or condition over a stream has been expressly excluded from this note, as well as all cases dealing with the question whether a municipal corporation or a railroad company should be held liable for damages caused by the construction of a bridge used by both.

Cases dealing with the obstruction of water, not in connection with the obstruction of a natural stream by a bridge, are, of course, not within the scope of this note.

The question, What are extraordinary floods, which one obstructing a water course need not anticipate? is discussed in a note to American Locomotive Co. v. Hoffman, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 252. And see, in this connection, Fairbury Brick Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 542.

Liability of county for injuries caused by construction or maintenance of bridge to property thereto adjoining—see note to Shawnee County v. Jacobs, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 209.

The right of an owner of a lower tenement, as against the rights of the upper landowner, to obstruct surface water in a natural drainage channel, is discussed in a note to Quinn v. Chicago, M. & S. P. R. Co. 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 789.

the giving and refusal of instructions. We think it unnecessary to examine them in detail, since some are of doubtful importance, and others relate to matters not likely to arise again. A number of instructions asked covered substantially the same ground, presenting in slightly different language the plaintiff's theory of the law. The only questions thought to require determination are whether certain jurors were competent, and whether the trial court gave a correct measure of the duty of the defendants with respect to the quantity of water for the passage of which they should have provided in bridging the stream. Several of the jurors who served in the case were residents and taxpayers of the city, and were retained over the challenge of the plaintiff, based upon that ground. Here, as in most other jurisdictions where the question has been passed upon, such persons are held to be disqualified to try an action against the municipality. Gibson v. Wyandotte, 20 Kan. 156; 24 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 271; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1133; Com. v. Brown, 147 Mass. 585, 1 L.R.A. 620, 9 Am. St. Rep. 750, 18 N. E. 587. In this state the rule has almost the force of a statute, since, after being announced by the supreme court, it has stood unchallenged for thirty years. There would be much less reason for holding that, in an action against a county, residents thereof are incompetent as jurors, because then a practical difficulty would be encountered, since this would necessitate a change of venue. But all question in that connection has been set at rest by the statute making them eligible. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1609. True, an individual taxpayer is but slightly affected by the rendition of a particular judgment against a city, but, so far as it may serve to encourage other actions, his indirect interest may be considerable. At all events, the propriety of a change in the practice in this regard is a matter for legislative, not for judicial, inquiry. The joinder of the three defendants in one action was not capricious or vexatious on the part of the plaintiff, but natural and commendable. Inasmuch as the claims against the other defendants were substantially the same as that against the city, any bias in its favor was a reasonable ground for at least a challenge "to the favor" upon the issue between them and the plaintiff. They had no right to insist upon the retention of jurors open to suspicion of prejudice, and the fact that they were made parties could not change the rule as to the municipality. No reason is suggested for supposing that the smallest difficulty would have been experienced in obtaining a jury from other parts of the county, whose impartiality would have been beyond question. The retention of the challenged jurors must be regarded as material error.

One instruction defining the duty of the defendants read in part as follows: "I instruct you that it was the duty of the defendants, in the construction of the bridges or culverts across Three Mile creek, to provide and maintain an opening or openings for the natural flow of the waters of said creek, sufficient to afford an outlet for all of the waters that might reasonably have been expected to flow from this water course, and this with reference to such freshets as might reasonably have been expected." This is substantially the test which has been recently approved by this court. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Herman, 74 Kan. 77, 85 Pac. 817.

But these instructions were added:

"Where a city, under the superintendence of a competent engineer, builds a culvert or bridge sufficient to discharge the ordinary quantity of water during low and high water, flowing through a definite channel between defined banks, it is not liable when, because of a flow caused by an unusually heavy rain, the banks of said stream are overflowed."

"If you believe from the evidence that the storm of July 5, 1904, was an extraordinary storm, and that such bridge of the city of Leavenworth at Seventh street was suitably constructed, so as to let the waters of Three Mile creek pass with reasonable freedom at all times, except in case of extraordinary freshets, then you should find for the defendants."

"Nor was said company [referring to each of the defendants, other than the city] required to anticipate extraordinary and unusual storms."

These additional instructions are open to criticism because they seem to be a limitation upon that already given. They convey a correct or an erroneous idea according to the meaning attached to the words "unusual" and "extraordinary." If an "extraordinary" freshet is understood to be one so outside of ordinary experience that its occurrence was not reasonably to have been anticipated, that word is not misleading. It is often so used by the courts and text writers (30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 375, 376; 3 Words & Phrases, 2628; Avery v. Vermont Electric Co. 75 Vt. 235, 59 L.R.A. 877, 98 Am. St. Rep. 818, 54 Atl. 179; American Locomotive Co. v. Hoffman, 105 Va. 343, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 252, 54 S. E. 25, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 773); but in the absence of a specific direction to do so, a jury might easily fail to give it that force. "Unusual" is hardly a strong enough expression to carry the same significance.

Both words are so vague that, as used in the instructions quoted, they serve to obscure rather than to illuminate the preceding statement of the proper test. The statement of the rule as to the quantity of water for the passage of which provision must be made was still further limited by the addition of these words in the same instruction: "Not, however, beyond the capacity of the stream; that is, the volume of water that could be confined within its banks." And in this connection the jury were further told that "the channel of a river, creek, or stream is that part of such river, creek, or stream which has on either side of said channel well-defined marks, evidencing the ordinary flowing of water therein; that is, the banks on either side of a channel are those which show evidence of being worn by the constant or frequent flowing of water in said channel, and it does not include any part of said banks upon which ordinary vegetation, such as grass and weeds, grow. If the bridges in question are of sufficient capacity to carry all the water which can flow within the ordinary well-defined channel of said Three Mile creek, then and in that case the defendants would not be liable for any damage caused by water which overflowed the banks thereof. The defendants nor either of them were in law required to construct any of the bridges in question of such size or dimensions as would accommodate and permit the flow of surface water, and, with this question in mind, I instruct you that waters which have overflowed the banks of a stream during high water or a freshet, in consequence of the insufficiency of the channel to hold and carry them off, are surface waters." These instructions seem open to the interpretation that the defendants, in building their bridges, were bound to allow room for the passage of only so much water as could be contained within that part of the water course where the flow was so nearly constant as to prevent the growth of vegetation. So construed, they are inaccurate and misleading. The defendants were required to provide for the passage of at least so much water as could be carried between the banks of the stream, whether they were denuded of vegetation or not, if the flow of such an amount was reasonably to have been anticipated. Evidence was introduced tending to show that Three Mile creek had a well-defined channel, the banks of which were bare only up to a certain point. The verdict may therefore have been influenced by this narrow view of the defendants' obligation. But we conclude that in this respect the charge was erroneous and probably prejudicial, even assuming that, taken as a whole, it means 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the defendants were required to allow for the passage of so much water as could be contained between the banks of the stream to their full height, regardless of the growth of vegetation thereon, but for no more. There are cases intimating, and even expressly holding, that whenever the banks of a stream are overflowed the surplus becomes at once surface water,—a "common enemy,"—against which anyone may protect himself. The great weight of authority, however, supports the view that it is to be so regarded only in case it has ceased to be a part of a general current following the channel; that if it continues to flow in the same direction while outside of the banks, returning thereto upon the subsidence of the flood, it is to be deemed a part of a running stream; and that it only loses its character as such when it spreads out over the open country, and settles in stagnant pools, or finds some other outlet. The question is fully discussed in Farnham's Water & Water Courses, §§ 879, 880, and the cases bearing upon it are collected in a note by that author in 25 L.R.A. 527, 531. More recent cases are Fordham v. Northern P. R. Co. 30 Mont. 421, 66 L.R.A. 556, 104 Am. St. Rep. 729, 76 Pac. 1040; Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co. 56 W. Va. 494, 68 L.R.A. 138, 108 Am. St. Rep. 968, 49 S. E. 378, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 201; and Clark v. Patapasco Guano Co. 144 N. C. 64, 119 Am. St. Rep. 931, 56 S. E. 858. See also Gould, Waters, 3d ed. § 264. A full note upon a related subject appears in 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 789, which contains references to earlier notes in the same series. It is not necessary, however, to decide how the term "surface water" should be used, nor what are the respective rights of persons affected with reference to waters properly so designated. As was said by Mr. Farnham in the note referred to: "To make the rights with reference to flood water of a river depend upon whether or not it is surface water is useless. The only safe course is to treat flood water as a class by itself, and then determine the respective rights according to the character of the flood." 25 L.R.A. 530. Much the same thing has already been said by this court: "There is a suggestion that the overflow of the stream is to be treated as surface water, and that the company cannot be held liable for injury resulting from such water. If the water was thrown back upon the riparian owner because of the obstruction of the channel of the stream, it is immaterial by what name it is designated." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Herman, 74 Kan. 77, 81, 85 Pac. 817, 818.

Cases on the duty of one building a bridge over a water course are collected in a note in 59 L.R.A. 862. The duty is thus stated in Union Trust Co. v. Cuppy, 26 Kan. 754: "A railroad company, in constructing its road over a natural water course, is required to leave such openings as are sufficient to afford an outlet for all water (from whatever source it may come, and in times of floods and freshets, as well as at other times) which may reasonably be expected to flow through such water course." Syllabus, p. 756. This duty springs from an obligation to refrain from inflicting any needless injury upon another. If, when a bridge is about to be constructed, the probabilities are that the stream to be crossed will at times overflow its banks, there is as much occasion to provide an outlet for the surplus water as for that which is confined within the channel. Where the adjacent lands are no higher than the banks, it may be impractical to provide an opening any larger than the channel itself, or to avoid presenting some obstruction to the passage of flood water. But where the ground rises as it recedes from the stream, and especially where there are secondary banks, the capacity of the wider channel so formed must be taken into account. The record does not disclose the precise conditions in this regard in the present case.

The defendants invoke the provisions of the new Code relating to appellate practice (Laws 1909, chap. 182, § 581), and maintain that, even if errors were committed in the impaneling of the jury and the giving of instructions, they do not warrant a reversal, because they do not affirmatively appear to have prejudicially affected the substantial rights of the plaintiff, and upon the whole record the judgment appears to have done substantial justice. To whatever extent the Revised Code may have changed the former procedure, it has not deprived litigants of the right of trial by jury, and this implies the right to have conflicts in the evidence resolved by impartial jurors under proper instructions. If the jurors are prejudiced against one of the parties, or are erroneously directed to disregard his theory of the law in a material matter, and a verdict is returned against him upon conflicting evidence, his substantial rights have necessarily been prejudiced. He has been denied a fair hearing before the tribunal provided by the Constitution. For this court to undertake, under such circumstances, to say what verdict unbiased jurors would have reached under instructions correctly defining the question they were to pass upon, would be to substitute its own judgment for that of a jury,—a result we cannot believe to have been contemplated by the framers of the recent legislation.

In discussions of the need of reform in judicial procedure, it has often been said that a judgment should not be reversed unless the reviewing court can affirmatively say that, except for the error complained of, a different decision would have been reached at the trial. It has been suggested that the new Code should be interpreted as adopting this criterion. The practical difficulty with such a view is that it is seldom possible to say with confidence what influence a particular ruling upon a vital matter may have had upon a verdict. When a jury is informed that certain facts constitute a defense to an action, a general finding for the defendant ordinarily gives no clue to what its decision would have been if it had been instructed to the contrary. It is sometimes assumed that the test proposed is practically that of the English courts in administering the statutes which provide that new trials shall only be granted for error which has occasioned some substantial wrong or miscarriage (36 & 37 Vict. chap. 66, § 48; Law Jour. 1873, p. 221), and that criminal appeals may be dismissed when, notwithstanding trial errors, no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred (7 Edw. VII. chap. 23, § 4, subd. 1). That the fact is otherwise is illustrated by the language of several recent cases. In Hunt v. Star Newspaper Co. [1908] 2 K. B. 309, a new trial was ordered on account of an erroneous instruction; the reason being thus stated: "The direction . . . was so expressed as to bear a meaning which might have misled the jury and affected their verdict, and as it was a general verdict, . . . we have no alternative but to send the case back for a new trial, because it is impossible to say to what extent the verdict may have been influenced by such misdirection." Page 321. In a similar case (Dakhyl v. Labouchere), printed as a note to that just cited, it was said: "In all cases it [the ordering of a new trial] is a most deplorable result, not to be entertained upon any but the most solid grounds, as the only means of redressing a clear miscarriage. In the present case I regret it all the more, because the amount of the verdict seems to indicate that the jury took the plaintiff's view of the facts. But I cannot reconcile myself to allowing a verdict to stand when I am convinced that the opinion of the jury was not really taken on two vital points on which the defendant was in law entitled to insist and did insist." Page 327. A criminal case reported in the same volume (R. v. Dyson, page 454) states these grounds for a reversal: "There having been a misdirection, the question arises whether the court can nevertheless dismiss the appeal . . . upon the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred by reason of the conviction. The proper question to have been submitted to the jury was whether the prisoner accelerated the child's death by the injuries which he inflicted in December, 1907. . . . And, if that question had been left to the jury, they would in all probability have found the prisoner guilty on that ground. . . . But it is one thing to say that the jury, on a proper direction, would probably have so convicted. It is another to say positively that there has been no substantial miscarriage of justice. . . . We cannot substitute ourselves for the jury, and find the facts which are necessary to support the conviction. The proviso is intended to apply to a case in which the evidence is such that the jury must have found the prisoner guilty if they had been properly directed. It does not apply where the evidence leaves it in doubt whether they would have so found." Page 456. Of course, rulings upon matters of minor importance, even although technically incorrect, may well be disregarded when it is reasonably clear that no serious prejudice has in fact resulted. But where it appears probable that a misdirection upon a vital matter has affected the verdict, there seems no course open but to order a new trial, although it cannot be said with absolute certainty that, had proper instructions been given, a different decision would have been reached. It is true that here the evidence fairly established that the high water of July 5, 1904, was almost without precedent,—that no greater flood had occurred since 1865. To hold the defendants responsible for failing to foresee and provide against such an unusual volume of water would be undeniably rigorous. But there was testimony fairly tending to show that the bridges did not provide an outlet for all the water at times of more usual freshets. A natural conclusion from all the evidence would be that the volume of water was so great that, even if there had been no bridges, all the ground in the vicinity would have been flooded. But the jury found that the defendants' bridges did not adequately provide for the passage of the waters of the creek at the time of the freshet that occasioned the damage complained of, and that their inadequacy in this respect caused or materially contributed to the injury to the plaintiff's property. This finding makes it seem probable that the general verdict resulted from the narrow view taken by the trial court of the duty of the defendants.

The defendants suggest that the statute of limitations began to run against the plaintiff's claim when the bridges were 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

built, and that therefore the bar had fallen before proceedings were begun. The cause of action here sued upon did not accrue until the flooding of the plaintiff's property. Union Trust Co. v. Cuppy, 26 Kan. 754; 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 381, note; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1146.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

WEB HIGH et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 161, 101 Pac. 115.)

Criminal law — presumption of innocence — joint information.

1. The presumption of innocence of one on trial for a crime is one of fact and of law, and no person can be convicted, even under a joint information, without proof of his individual guilt.

Same — burden of proof — directing acquittal.

2. Where a defendant pleads not guilty and admits nothing against himself, the burden of proof is on the state to make a case against him which will entitle it to go to a jury; and where the evidence only raises a mere suspicion of the guilt of the accused, it is insufficient to warrant a conviction, and the court should direct a verdict of acquittal, when requested by defendant.

Interstate commerce — regulation — intoxicating liquors.

3. Under subdivision 3 of § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, a resident of this state has a lawful right to order and receive a shipment of whisky by interstate commerce from another state, and to convey the same from the depot at which the shipment may arrive, in the original package, to his home.

Same — state Constitution — application.

4. The clause in the prohibition ordinance of the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma (§ 499, Bunn's ed.), while prohibiting the conveyance of intoxicating liquors from one place within this state to another place therein, has no application to interstate shipments until there has been a delivery of an interstate shipment of said liquors.

Headnotes by DOYLE, J.

Note. — The question what is sufficient to terminate interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors is discussed in the notes to State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 550, and State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1020.

Same — destination.

5. Carrying or conveying intoxicating liquors from the railroad station to the home of the consignee is a part of the interstate commerce transportation, when they were shipped from another state, and is not a violation of the constitutional clause making the conveyance of such liquors from one place within this state to another place therein an offense.

Same — Federal laws — scope — operation.

6. The constitutional clause prohibiting the conveyance of intoxicating liquors from one place within this state to another place therein, in the absence of prohibitory legislation by the state, is not within the scope and operation of the act of Congress of August 8, 1890, chap. 728, 26 Stat. at L. 313, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177, commonly known as the "Wilson act."

(March 29, 1909.)

ERROR to the Kiowa County Court to review a judgment convicting defendants of having unlawfully conveyed intoxicating liquors from one place within the state of Oklahoma to another place therein. Reversed.

Statement by Doyle, J.:

The plaintiffs in error (hereinafter designated as defendants) were, on March 31, 1908, convicted in the county court of Kiowa county on an information, the charging part of which reads as follows: "That on the 18th day of March, A. D. 1908, at and within the said county and within the jurisdiction of said court, Web High, Curley Bradley, Harry Whittemore, and George Broughton, then and there being, did then and there unlawfully convey intoxicating liquors, to wit, 100 pints of whisky from one place within the state of Oklahoma to another place within the state of Oklahoma, to wit, from the Rock Island depot at Mountain View, said county and state, to a point near the Chickasha Mill and Elevator Company's elevator at Mountain View, said county and state. Said conveyance of intoxicating liquor, as aforesaid, not being then and there the conveyance of a lawful purchase of intoxicating liquor as provided by law." The information was filed before the enactment of the prohibitory law, and was based upon that clause of the Constitution (§ 499, Bunn's ed.) which provides: "Or who shall ship or in any way convey such liquors from one place within this state to another place therein, except the conveyance of a lawful purchase as hereinafter authorized, shall be punished, on conviction thereof, by fine not less than $50 and by imprisonment not less than thirty days, for each offense." 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Three witnesses testified on behalf of the prosecution. Bob Allen, a deputy sheriff, testified that he arrested the defendants and made the seizure on the evening of March 18, 1908, on the public road, about 150 feet from the Rock Island depot, at Mountain View, without any warrant or other process, asserting his right to do so by virtue of the foregoing clause of the Constitution, at which time all of said defendants were riding on a delivery wagon from the depot towards the town; that in said delivery wagon was a barrel which looked like a sugar barrel; that he had seen said barrel at the depot and examined it, and it smelled like whisky; that said barrel, when opened, was found to contain 100 pints of whisky. The testimony of F. W. Fanson, railroad and express agent at Mountain View, shows that the defendant Whittemore, on March 14, 1908, purchased an express money order for the sum of $36, payable to Casey & Swasey, of Ft. Worth, Texas; that on the 18th day of March, 1908, he received said barrel as railroad agent, the same having been shipped from Ft. Worth, Texas, to the name of W. M. Silvers, and was received by the defendant Whittemore, he signing the name of W. M. Silvers to the express receipt and paying express charges of $3.40; that the defendant Broughton (drayman) was standing by when he delivered the barrel to said defendant Whittemore. The testimony of D. George Jones is not material to any issue in the case.

The defendants testified in their own behalf, in substance, as follows: The defendant Harry Whittemore testified that he purchased an express money order for the sum of $36, payable to Casey & Swasey, of Ft. Worth, Texas, from the agent of the Rock Island Railroad & Express Company at Mountain View, Oklahoma, on the 14th day of March, 1908; that said money order was by said defendant forwarded to the payee at Ft. Worth, Texas, together with an order for 48 quarts of whisky; that said whisky was shipped from Ft. Worth to Mountain View packed in a barrel, and was there received on the 18th day of March, 1908; that he paid the express charges thereon, and hired the defendant Broughton (a drayman) to haul it to his home; and that he purchased said whisky for his own use, and no other person had any interest in it. The defendant Broughton testified that he was running a delivery wagon at Mountain View, and was hired by the defendant Whittemore to haul said barrel from the depot to his home, and that he did not know at that time what said barrel contained. The defendants Web High and Curley Bradley testified that they were at the depot and caught a ride to town in the delivery wagon; that Deputy Sheriff Allen, about 150 feet from the depot, stopped the wagon, arrested the defendants, and seized a barrel that was in the wagon; that they in no way assisted to load or convey the barrel, and that they knew nothing about the barrel or its contents.

The testimony shows that there was nothing to indicate the contents of the barrel, and that it resembled a sugar barrel. The defendants were placed in jail, and the next day were taken to Hobart, and the information in this case was filed. Defendants were arraigned, and entered pleas of not guilty. The petition in error and case made was filed in the supreme court July 30, 1908, and said cause was, upon the organization of the criminal court of appeals, duly transferred by the supreme court, as by law provided, and is now before the court for review.

Messrs. Thomas W. Conner and O. J. Logan for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Fred S. Caldwell for defendant in error.

Doyle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by counsel for defendants "that the verdict and judgment of guilty in said case is not sustained by the evidence, and is contrary to law."

At the close of taking of the testimony, defendants, and each of them, requested the court to direct a verdict of acquittal as to each of said defendants, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support a conviction. The court refused to so direct the jury, and allowed exceptions. Under the facts which the evidence in this case proved, or tended to prove, we believe the court should have directed an acquittal as requested. The record clearly shows that the defendants Web High and Curley Bradley were only riding on the wagon in which the whisky was being conveyed; that they had no interest or ownership in the whisky, no knowledge that it was whisky, and that they took no part in the conveyance. It further shows that the defendant George Broughton (a drayman) was conveying the barrel that contained the whisky as he would any other article for hire. His testimony that he did not know its contents is undisputed.

As to the defendant Harry Whittemore, the record presents a question involving the construction of that clause of the Constitution (§ 499, Bunn's ed.) which is set forth in the statement of facts, as affecting interstate commerce in shipments of intoxicating liquor. The question is, Was the defendant Whittemore, in the removal of the whisky from the depot to his home, engaged in conveying it, within the purport and meaning of said clause of our Constitution?

In construing the language of said clause, it is well to remember that it was framed to meet the requirements of the prohibition paragraph of the enabling act (Bunn's ed. p. 144, § 507). Reference to said paragraph shows that the only language therein regarding the conveyance of intoxicating liquors is as follows: "507. Second, that the manufacture, sale, barter, giving away, or otherwise furnishing, except as hereinafter provided, of intoxicating liquors within those parts of said state now known as the Indian territory and the Osage Indian Reservation, and within any other parts of said state which existed as Indian reservations, on the 1st day of January, 1906, is prohibited for a period of twenty-one years from the date of the admission of said state into the Union, and thereafter until the people of said state shall otherwise provide by amendment of said Constitution and proper state legislation. Any person, individual or corporate, who shall manufacture, sell, barter, give away, or otherwise furnish any intoxicating liquor of any kind, including beer, ale, and wine, contrary to the provisions of this section, or who shall, within the above-described portions of said state, advertise for sale or solicit the purchase of any such liquors, or who shall ship or in any way convey such liquors from other parts of said state into the portions hereinbefore described, shall be punished, on conviction thereof, by fine not less than $50 and by imprisonment not less than thirty days, for each offense." Thus we see the prohibition requirement of the enabling act entirely omitted the question of interstate conveyance, and was drawn so as not to be repugnant to the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

In view of the fact that at the time of the alleged offense there had been no prohibitory legislation enacted, we do not deem it necessary to the decision of this case that we should enter upon the discussion of the existence and extent of the police power residing in the several states of the Union. It is quite as unnecessary to argue that the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the citizens of the different states was not intended to abridge the lawful exercise of the police power by the state governments. However, if judicial decisions can be said to settle a question, the question decisive of this case has been clearly and properly settled by the highest court of our country.

chap. 66, p. 81), forbidding any common carrier from bringing into that state any intoxicating liquors from any other state or territory of the United States, without first having been furnished with a certificate under the seal of the county auditor of the county of which said liquor is to be transported, or is consigned for transportation, certifying that the consignee or person to whom said liquor is to be transported, conveyed, or delivered is authorized to sell intoxicating liquor in said county. This statute was declared invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Matthews, who, in part, says: "The statute of Iowa under consideration falls within this prohibition. It is not an inspection law; it is not a quarantine or sanitary law. It is essentially a regulation of commerce among the states, within any definition heretofore given to that term, or which can be given; and, although its motive and purpose are to perfect the policy of the state of Iowa in protecting its citizens against the evils of intemperance, it is none the less on that account a regulation of commerce. If it had extended its provisions so as to prohibit the introduction into the state, from foreign countries, of all importations of intoxicating liquors produced abroad, no one would doubt the nature of the provision as a regulation of foreign commerce. Its nature is not changed by its application to commerce among the states." "And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the state and the Federal power. That is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the state, and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States. . . . The same process of legislation and reasoning adopted by the state and its courts could bring within the police power any article of consumption that a state might wish to exclude, whether it belonged to that which was drunk or to food and clothing."

In Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681, it was recognized that ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale, and beer are subject to exchange, barter, and traffic like any other commodity in which a right of traffic exists, and that, being thus articles of commerce, a state cannot, in the absence of legislation on the part of Congress, prohibit their importation from abroad or from a sister state, nor, when imported, prohibit their sale by the importer; and, accordingly, it was held that a statute of the state of Iowa prohibiting the sale of any intoxicating liquors, except for pharmaceutical, medicinal, chemical, or sacramental purposes, and under a license from a county court of the state, is, as applied to a sale by the importer, and in the original packages or kegs, unbroken and unopened, of such liquors manufactured in and brought from another state, unconstitutional and void, as repugnant to the clause of the Constitution granting to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." *

Following closely upon this decision, and probably in consequence of it, Congress, upon August 8th of the same year, enacted what is commonly known as the "Wilson bill," which provides: "That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise." [26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177.]

This so-called "Wilson bill" has been construed by several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 66, 41 L. ed. 633, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269,—this being a case wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages caused by the action of the defendants, who were state constables of the state of South Carolina, in seizing and carrying away several packages of wines and liquors belonging to plaintiffs and, at the time of the seizure, in the possession of the railroad company which, as common carriers, had brought the packages within the state,—Mr. Justice Shiras, who delivered the opinion of the court, in part says: "The evils attending the vice of intemperance in the use of spirituous liquors are so great that a natural reluctance is felt in appearing to interfere, even on constitutional grounds, with any law whose avowed purpose is to restrict or prevent the mischief. So long, however, as state legislation continues to recognize wines, beer, and spirituous liquors as articles of lawful consumption and commerce, so long must continue the duty of the Federal court to afford to such use and commerce the same measure of protection, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as is given to other articles."

"We cheerfully concede that the law in question was passed in the bona fide exercise of the police power. We disclaim any imputation to the lawmakers of South Carolina of a design, under the guise of a domestic regulation, to interfere with the rights and privileges of either her own citizens or those of her sister states, which are secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States. But, as we have had more than one occasion to observe, our willingness to believe that this statute was enacted in good faith, and to protect the people of the state from the evils of unrestricted importation, manufacture, and sale of ardent spirits, cannot control the final determination whether the statute, in some of its provisions, is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. As was said in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 661, 31 L. ed. 205, 210, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; 'If a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution.'"

After reviewing numerous decisions, the court, at page 99 of 165 U. S., concludes as follows: "In the light of these cases the act of South Carolina of January 2, 1895, must, as to those of its provisions which affect the plaintiff in the present suits, stand condemned. It is not an inspection law. The prohibition of the importation of the wines and liquors of other states by citizens of South Carolina for their own use is made absolute, and does not depend on the purity or impurity of the articles. Only the state functionaries are permitted to import into the state, and thus those citizens who wish to use foreign wines and liquors are deprived of the exercise of their own judgment and taste in the selection of commodities. To empower a state chemist to pass upon what the law calls the 'alcoholic purity' of such importations, by chemical analysis, can scarcely come within any definition of a reasonable inspection law. It is not a law purporting to forbid the importation, manufacture, sale, and use of intoxicating liquors, as articles detrimental to the welfare of the state and to the health of the inhabitants, and hence it is not within the scope and operation of the act of Congress of August, 1890. That law was not intended to confer upon any state the power to discriminate injuriously against the products of other states in articles whose manufacture and use are not forbidden, and which are therefore the subject of legitimate commerce. When that law provided that 'all fermented, distilled, or intoxicating liquors transported into any state or territory, remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, should, upon arrival in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and should not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise,' evidently equality or uniformity of treatment under state laws was intended. The question whether a given state law is a lawful exercise of the police power is still open, and must remain open, to this court. Such a law may forbid entirely the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and be valid. Or it may provide equal regulations for the inspection and sale of all domestic and imported liquors, and be valid. But the state cannot, under the congressional legislation referred to, establish a system which, in effect, discriminates between interstate and domestic commerce in commodities to make and use which are admitted to be lawful."

In the case of Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 426, 42 L. ed. 1096, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 664, the court in part says: "Interpreting the statute by the light of all its provisions, it was not intended to and did not cause the power of the state to attach to an interstate commerce shipment whilst the merchandise was in transit under such shipment, and until its arrival at the point of destination and delivery there to the consignee." And as a result of this ascertainment of the meaning of the Wilson act it was held that, as the act of moving the goods preceded the period affixed by the Wilson act, at which the state power could attach, the conviction was erroneous.

In Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 170 U. S. 439, 42 L. ed. 1101, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, Mr. Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the court, in part says: "In the inception it is necessary to bear in mind a few elementary propositions which are so entirely concluded by the previous adjudications of this court that they need only to be briefly recapitulated.

"(a) Beyond dispute, the respective states have plenary power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors within their borders, and the scope and extent of such regulations depend solely on the judgment of the lawmaking power of the states; provided always they do not transcend the limits of state authority by invading rights which are secured by the Constitution of the United States, and provided, further, that the regulations as adopted do not operate a discrimination against the rights of residents or citizens of other states of the Union.

"(b) Equally well established is the proposition that the right to send liquors from one state into another, and the act of sending the same, is interstate commerce, the regulation whereof has been committed by the Constitution of the United States to Congress, and hence that a state law which denies such a right, or substantially interferes with or hampers the same, is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

"(c) It is also certain that the settled doctrine is that the power to ship merchandise from one state into another carries with it, as an incident, the right in the receiver of the goods to sell them in the original packages, any state regulation to the contrary notwithstanding; that is to say, that the goods received by interstate commerce remain under the shelter of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, until, by a sale in the original package, they have been commingled with the general mass of property in the state.

"This last proposition, however, whilst generally true, is no longer applicable to intoxicating liquors, since Congress, in the exercise of its lawful authority, has recognized the power of the several states to control the incidental right of sale in the original packages of intoxicating liquors shipped into one state from another, so as to enable the states to prevent the exercise by the receiver of the accessory right of selling intoxicating liquors in original packages except in conformity to lawful state regulations. In other words, by virtue of the act of Congress, the receiver of intoxicating liquors in one state, sent from another, can no longer assert a right to sell in defiance of the state law in the original packages, because Congress has recognized to the contrary. The act of Congress referred to, chap. 728, was approved August 8, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 313, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177, and is entitled, 'An Act to Limit the Effect of the Regulations of Commerce between the Several States and with Foreign Countries in Certain Cases.'

Further on, the court says: "But the right of persons in one state to ship liquor into another state, to a resident for his own use, is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and does not rest on the grant of the state law. Either the conditions attached by the state law unlawfully restrain the right, or they do not. If they do,—and we shall hereafter examine this contention,—then they are void. If they do not, then there is no lawful ground of complaint on the subject. We are thus brought to examine whether the regulations imposed by the state law on the right of the residents of other states to ship into the state of South Carolina alcoholic liquor, to the residents of that state, when ordered by them for their use, are so onerous and burdensome in their nature as to substantially impair the right; that is, whether they so hamper and restrict the exercise of the right as to materially interfere with, or, in effect, prevent, its enjoyment."

In the case of Heyman v. Southern R. Co. 203 U. S. 270, 51 L. ed. 178, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 104, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1130, Mr. Justice White, delivering the opinion of the court, in part says: "As the general principle is that goods moving in interstate commerce cease to be such commerce only after delivery and sale in the original package, and as the settled rule is that the Wilson law was not an abdication of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, since that law simply affects an incident of such commerce by allowing the state power to attach after delivery and before sale, we are not concerned with whether, under the law of any particular state, the liability of a railroad company as carrier ceases and becomes that of a warehouseman on the goods reaching their ultimate destination, before notice and before the expiration of a reasonable time for the consignee to receive the goods from the carrier. For, whatever may be the divergent legal rules in the several states concerning the precise time when the liability of a carrier, as such, in respect to the carriage of goods, ends, they cannot affect the general principle as to when an interstate shipment ceases to be under the protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and thereby comes under the control of the state authority.

"Of course, we are not called upon in this case, and do not decide, if goods of the character referred to in the Wilson act, moving in interstate commerce, arrive at the point of destination, and, after notice and full opportunity to receive them, are designedly left in the hands of the carrier for an unreasonable time, that such conduct on the part of the consignee might not justify, if affirmatively alleged and proven, the holding that goods so dealt with have come under the operation of the Wilson act, because constructively delivered. We say we are not called upon to consider this question, for the reason that no facts are shown by the record justifying the passing on such a proposition. And as in this case we deal only with the power of the state to enforce its police regulations against goods of the character of those enumerated in the Wilson act, the subject of interstate commerce, before delivery, we must not be understood as in any way limiting or restricting the ruling made in Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 170 U. S. 439, 42 L. ed. 1101, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, upholding the right of a citizen of one state to bring from another state into the state of his residence, and keep therein, for his personal use, the merchandise referred to in the Wilson act. In other words, as in the case at bar, delivery had not taken place when the seizures were made, and the control of the state over the goods had not attached. We are not called upon to consider whether, if the power of the state had attached by delivery, the state might not have levied upon the goods, on the charge that they had not been bona fide brought into the state, and were not held by the consignees for their personal use, and, therefore, were not within the ruling in Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. supra."

In the foregoing cases quoted and cited, the various liquor laws of the respective states were considered and construed, and said laws were held repugnant to subdivision 3 of § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with Indian tribes,"—commonly called the "interstate commerce clause" of the Federal Constitution.

These repeated and deliberate declarations of the Supreme Court of the United States establish two propositions: First, that the act of Congress commonly known as the "Wilson bill" permits the states, in the exercise of their police power, to enact laws prohibiting the sale, and making interstate shipments, of intoxicating liquors upon their arrival in the state subject to the operation of the police powers of the state. However, the state legislatures are not authorized to declare when such importations shall become subject to state control, nor can the state in any manner change or affect the enactment made by Congress upon the subject. Under the Constitution Congress has exclusive power. Second, that the right to ship intoxicating liquors from one state into another, and the shipment of the same, is interstate commerce, and any citizen has a right to ship intoxicating liquors from one state into another, and a state law, organic or legislative, which denies or diminishes this right, or substantially abridges, interferes, or hampers the same, is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and this court is concluded by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on this question.

The seizure of the shipment in this case before it reached its destination denied to the consignee his constitutional right to receive the shipment.

Before the enactment of the law making the criminal court of appeals the court of exclusive appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases, this question was before this court, and, under the first act, requiring constitutional questions to be certified to the supreme court, the question was certified to said court for its final decision, and a decision was by said court rendered in said cause. Schwedes v. State, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 245, 99 Pac. 804. The syllabus reads as follows: "Under subdivision 3, § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, commonly referred to as the 'interstate commerce clause' of the Constitution, a resident of one state has the right to have shipped to him from another state alcoholic liquors, when ordered by him for his and his family's use, and to keep the same for such use; and the state cannot, under its police power, enact laws so as to substantially hamper or burden such constitutional right to have such shipment made, and to receive and retain the same, for personal use."

The foregoing authorities settle the question that conveying an unbroken original package containing intoxicating liquors from the railroad depot to the home of the consignee is a part of the interstate commerce transportation; and in this case the interstate shipment was not completed until the same was delivered at the home of the defendant Whitemore. In this case we are not called upon to decide, and we do not attempt to construe, the prohibitory law enacted subsequent to the filing of the information. We have only construed the clause of the prohibitory ordinance of the Constitution, upon which this prosecution is predicated.

We are of the opinion that the arrest and seizure by the deputy sheriff was unwarranted and without authority of law, as no offense had been committed: First, because said clause of the prohibition ordinance of the Constitution of the state of Oklahoma does not purport to abrogate the right to receive an interstate commerce shipment of intoxicating liquors; second, because said constitutional clause could not abrogate or in any manner diminish the protection conferred by the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded with directions to the County Court of Kiowa County to dismiss the case.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

W. M. KAISER et al., Exrs., etc., of Tilmon Ford, Deceased, Appts.,
v.

C. M. IDLEMAN et al., Resp'ts.

(— Or. —, 108 Pac. 193.)

Limitation of actions — payment — mortgage.

1. A mortgage is embraced by a statute providing that whenever any payment shall be made upon any existing contract, whether it be bill of exchange, promissory note, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness, the limitation shall commence from the time it is made.

Same — assignment of mortgage — payment by mortgagor.

2. The running of the statute of limitations upon a mortgage debt will be arrested by a payment by the mortgagor before the action is barred; although he has transferred the property to a stranger, where, under the statute, a payment continues and keeps alive the original promise.

(April 27, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marion County dismissing a suit to foreclose a mortgage on certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by McBride, J.:

On March 26, 1892, Tilmon Ford, plaintiffs' testator, loaned to C. M. Idleman $4,000, taking therefor his promissory note, payable two years after date, secured by a mortgage on certain real estate in Marion county. The mortgage contained the following covenant: "And the said C. M. Idleman does hereby covenant and agree to and with the said Tilmon Ford, his heirs and assigns, that he will pay the said principal and interest as the same become due according to the terms of said instrument of writing, to the owner or holder thereof, and will also pay or cause to be paid to the proper authorities, before the same become delinquent, all taxes of every kind that may be lawfully levied or assessed upon said instrument of writing or this mortgage, to the owner or holder thereof." The mortgage was duly recorded on the day of its execution. Idleman conveyed the land, on September 15, 1892, to Elenor A. Black, by a warranty deed, and in January, 1906, she conveyed the same to W. H. Black, her husband, who has ever since held the legal title. The complaint alleged that there had been paid, by Idleman, on the note and mortgage, various sums, which—with the date of each payment—are specifically set out in the complaint, the pay-

Note. — Effect of payment or acknowledgment by mortgagor to toll statute of limitations as against his grantee or other person holding interest in property through him.

It seems to be universally accepted that a new promise, part payment, or acknowledgment of the debt on the part of a mortgagor, before a conveyance by him of the property, or before the attachment of a lien, will have the effect of tolling the statute of limitations not only as against himself, but also as against his grantee, or other person holding an interest in the property through him, whether such part payment or new promise is made before or after the debt is barred.

This proposition is supported by the following cases: Cook v. Union Trust Co. (Cook v. Bramel) 106 Ky. 803, 45 L.R.A. 212, 51 S. W. 600; Clift v. Williams, 105 Ky. 559, 49 S. W. 328, 51 S. W. 821; Palmer v. Butler, 36 Iowa, 581; Du Bois v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Colo. 400, 96 Pac. 169; Heyer v. Pruyn, 7 Paige, 465, 34 Am. Dec. 355; Clark v. Grant (Okla.) post, —, 109 Pac. 234; Plant v. Shryock, 62 Miss. 821; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. ed. 142.

In Hughes v. Edwards, supra, the dates of the conveyances by the mortgagor are not stated, but it was said: "A purchaser with notice can be in no better situation than the person from whom he derives the title, and is bound by the same equity which would affect his rights. The mortgagor, after forfeiture, has no title at law and none in equity, but to redeem upon the terms of paying the debt and interest. His conveyance to a purchaser with notice passes nothing but an equity of redemption, and the latter can, no more than the mortgagor, assert that equity against the mortgagee, without paying the debt or showing that it has been paid or released, or that there are circumstances in the case sufficient to warrant the presumption of those facts or one of them."

In Cook v. Union Trust Co. supra, the court said: "In this case the notes given, if ments having been made in 1896, 1897, 1898, 1901, and 1907, respectively, each having been made before a period of six years had elapsed after the date of the preceding payment. The defendants, appearing separately, demurred to the complaint, on the ground that the suit was barred by the statute of limitations. The circuit court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the suit. Plaintiffs appeal.

Messrs. W. M. Kaiser and M. E. Pogue, for appellants:

Payment on a debt evidenced by a note and secured by a mortgage is a payment on the latter as well as the former, and marks the point of time in one case as well as the other from which the statute of limitations runs.

Allen v. O'Donald, 28 Fed. 346; Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 35 L. ed. 843, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Dundee Invest. Co. v. Horner, 30 Or. 562, 48 Pac. 175; Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 147, 148, 27 L. ed. 683, 684, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408.

And payment by any person liable, directly or in a representative capacity, will keep the debt alive as to all persons liable thereon, whether such payment was made by their authority or not.

Dundee Invest. Co. v. Horner, supra; Partlow v. Singer, 2 Or. 307; Sutherlin v. Roberts, 4 Or. 378; Allen v. O'Donald, supra.

no payments had been made, were not barred by limitation at the date of the mortgage to appellee trust company, and any inspection of the record would have put it on notice concerning appellant's debt. At the date of the mortgage to appellee, the appellant, by reason of the annual payments made by Bramel, had fourteen years in which she could collect her notes and enforce her lien, and it cannot be said that, by reason of the fact that Bramel executed a mortgage to appellee trust company, this right to enforce collection and her lien was reduced to fifteen years from the original date of maturity. To so hold would allow a debtor to defeat the collection altogether of a debt, if by payments he had been indulged beyond the period of limitation, on the idea that, being the payor and owner of the property, he could by payments elongate both note and lien. For after the lapse of fifteen years from the date of maturity, when it would be barred, except for the payments, the debtor could sell the property free of liens. This cannot be the law. The vendee or mortgagee accepts the position as it is when his conveyance is executed. The holder of the lien has all the time to enforce the lien as the facts of the case at that time give him, and no more. It follows that the appellant's lien for purchase money is not barred by limitation, and she is entitled to have same enforced, even as against the mortgagee trust company. Being a vendor's lien, it is prior to the mortgage lien."

In First Nat. Bank v. Woodman, 93 Iowa, 668, 57 Am. St. Rep. 287, 62 N. W. 28, where it appeared that the second mortgage was given after the first mortgage had in fact been revived, it was held that notwithstanding the second mortgage was given when, by the records, the first mortgage seemed to be barred, such second mortgage did not take precedence over the first mortgage, since a second mortgagee, where a prior mortgage is uncanceled, must take notice of the fact, whether or not the cause of action thereon has been revived. In this case there were no controlling equities in behalf of the second mortgagee, as the second mortgage was taken mostly for antecedent debt, and nothing was parted with on the strength of the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, in Plant v. Shryock, supra, the purchasers based their defense on the ground that they had no actual knowledge of the mortgagee's claim upon the land, and that the records showed that the trust deed was barred long before they purchased the land, and that the record did not disclose any new promise of the grantors. The court, however, said that the deed of trust was recorded and there was no entry of satisfaction on the record; and although, at the date of the purchase of the land, the note appeared on its face to be barred by the statute of limitations, it was incumbent upon the purchasers to pursue the inquiry suggested by the record, and ascertain if, notwithstanding the apparent bar of the note, it was in truth still a valid subsisting debt.

The above case was cited in Bowmar v. Peine, 64 Miss. 99, 8 So. 166, as being conclusive that the lien of the mortgage must prevail, both as against the mortgagor and all parties claiming his title. The various dates given in this case, although the court makes no note of it, reveal that the buyer of the property purchased at execution sale more than three years before the mortgagor waived the statute of limitations, and that the waiver was made after the debt in fact had become barred.

Revival after conveyance.

Coming to the other class of cases, that is, where a new promise or part payment or acknowledgment was made after conveyance of the property or the attachment of a lien, it would seem to follow from the above cases that payment under such circumstances could not have the effect of tolling the statute of limitations as against the grantee, and this would seem to be especially true in those cases where not only the conveyance was prior to the attempted revival, but such revival was after the debt was barred.

A case so holding is Cason v. Chambers, 62 Tex. 305, where it was held that while the subsequent renewal of a debt by a new note given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee as

The mortgagor's grantee has no greater rights against the mortgagee than the mortgagor himself.

2 Jones, Mortg. 6th ed. § 1202; Medley v. Elliott, 62 Ill. 532; Grether v. Clark, 75 Iowa, 383, 9 Am. St. Rep. 491, 39 N. W. 655; Kendall v. Tracy, 64 Vt. 522, 24 Atl. 1118.

The purchaser is bound by the acts and declarations of the mortgagor in respect to the mortgage while he retains the equity of redemption or any part of it.

Jones, Mortg. 6th ed. § 1202; Heyer v. Pruyn, 7 Paige, 465, 34 Am. Dec. 355; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489, 6 L. ed. 142.

A payment made by a mortgagor after between them would operate a renewal of the mortgage given to secure it originally, yet such renewal could not affect the purchaser of the mortgaged property, whose right accrued prior to the renewal, and while the original debt was barred by the statute of limitations.

In Schmucker v. Sibert, 18 Kan. 104, 26 Am. Rep. 765, also cited in the KAISER CASE, it was said: "When the note is barred, the mortgage is also barred, and no subsequent payment, promise, or acknowledgment can revive the mortgage as to property which the mortgagor has, prior thereto, conveyed to a third party. Whenever the mortgage is barred, the property is free from the lien. It is, as respects the mortgage, as though the latter had never existed. If, therefore, the mortgagor no longer owns the property, he cannot impose a burden upon it,—his power to bind the property has ceased. He is as powerless over it as though he had never owned it. He can revive the note, as he could give a new note, for no rights but his own are involved. He can revive the old mortgage just so far, and so far only, as he could give a new mortgage; and that is, to bind his own property."

That one who executes a note and mortgage cannot revive such note and mortgage by part payment or otherwise after they have become barred, as against a third person to whom he has theretofore sold the mortgaged property, was also held in Hubbard v. Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co. 25 Kan. 172.

To the same effect are Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482, and Day v. Baldwin, 34 Iowa, 380, both set out in KAISER v. IDLEMAN.

That a mortgagor, after the debt has become barred, and subsequent to purchase at execution sale of the land by another, cannot revive the mortgage as against such purchaser, seems also to have been held in Damon v. Leque, 17 Wash. 573, 61 Am. St. Rep. 927, 50 Pac. 485, although the opinion is so vague that it is difficult to determine the weight to be granted the case.

In McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 82 Am. Dec. 754, it was also held that the acknowledgment of a debt after it and a mortgage on an undivided interest in certain property, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) he has sold the premises to another will repel the presumption of satisfaction arising after the lapse of twenty years from the time when the mortgage became due, so far as the subsequent purchaser is concerned.

Barrett v. Prentiss, 57 Vt. 297; Hughes v. Edwards, supra; New York L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Covert, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 154; Mack v. Anderson, 165 N. Y. 529, 59 N. E. 289.

The running of the statute of limitations against the foreclosure of a mortgage will be arrested by a partial payment of either principal or interest.

27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p 1561; California Sav. & L. Soc. v. Culver, 127 Cal. 107, 59 Pac. 292; Schifferstein v. Allison, 123 Ill.

securing the debt, were barred by the statute of limitations, did not have the effect of tolling the statute as against the debtor's joint tenant, who previously had become purchaser of that part of the property. The court in this case said: "It was formerly held that statutes of this nature proceeded upon a presumption of payment, and that the effect of an acknowledgment was to rebut this presumption, and place the debt upon its original footing. This view is now exploded, and the statute is universally regarded as one of repose, the benefit of which may be relinquished by the party interested, but cannot be taken from him without his consent."

It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of the acknowledgment as against Kelley unless the circumstances of the case are such as to preclude Kelley from relying upon the agreement. It appears that the plaintiff was ignorant of its existence, but, as he parted with nothing in consideration of the acknowledgment, he is not in a position to complain on that ground. It is not enough that he acted in good faith and without notice. The acknowledgment cost him nothing, and his rights under it are not those of an encumbrancer for value. If the debt had not been barred, the position of the plaintiff would be different; having no notice of the agreement, if he had suffered the statute to run, relying upon the acknowledgment, he would be entitled to protection. As the debt was barred, however, he cannot claim that his rights have been prejudiced by the want of notice, for the acknowledgment gave him none which could possibly be affected by it."

An interesting case on this question is Cook v. Prindle, 97 Iowa, 464, 59 Am. St. Rep. 424, 66 N. W. 781, overruling (Iowa) 63 N. W. 187, where it was held that a new promise on the part of a mortgagor after the debt was barred did not have the effect of reviving the mortgage lien on property which, although sold by the mortgagor to a grantee before the debt was barred, was sold by the latter to a third person after the debt was barred, neither grantee having knowledge of the new promise. The court, after reviewing First Nat. Bank v. Woodman, supra, said: "The question involved in Messrs. A. E. Clark, L. H. McMahan, and C. M. Idleman for respondents.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves but one question: Did the payments made by Idleman upon that case, the right of a subsequent mortgagee to avail himself of the statute, as against a claim apparently barred, is not the question we have to deal with. We have a case where one purchased the mortgaged premises at a time when the debt, as appeared from the mortgage, was barred, and without any notice that, after his grantor purchased the premises, the mortgagors had, by written promise, undertaken to revive the debt. We do not think that there is any decision of this court which has determined this question against the conclusion reached by the lower court. The doctrine of Day's Case, supra, which we have shown has been recognized in at least two subsequent cases, is in harmony with the thought that one who purchases the mortgaged real estate at a time when the mortgage appears to be barred may successfully interpose a plea of the statute of limitations to the foreclosure of such a mortgage, which the mortgagors have attempted to revive after they have parted with their title, he having no notice of said revivor. We are not disposed to extend the doctrine of First Nat. Bank v. Woodman to a case where the facts are like those at bar. We are aware that this court has often said that the lien of the mortgage will continue so long as the debt exists; and, as a rule, that is so; but the language thus used is to be construed in view of the facts then under consideration."

But see Bowmar v. Peine, 64 Miss. 99, 8 So. 166, supra, and New York L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Covert, and the immediately following cases, infra.

In Kerndt v. Porterfield, 56 Iowa, 412, 9 N. W. 322, it was held that a note and mortgage which have become barred by the statute of limitations may be revived by an admission of indebtedness by the mortgagor, and secure priority over a subsequent mortgage taken before the first mortgage became barred, although not foreclosed until it was revived. It was said in this case: "It may be, but the point we do not decide, that one acquiring an interest in mortgaged property after foreclosure of the mortgage is barred by the statute, and before a new promise is made, would hold by a right superior to the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the debt after he had conveyed the property to Mrs. Black operate to prevent the statute of limitations from running in her favor? By the provisions of § 5, title 1, Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, the limitation for the commencement of suits upon a sealed instrument is declared to be ten years, and the limitation for an action upon a promissory note is fixed at six years by the succeeding section. Section 24 of the same title is as follows: "No acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, whereby to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby; but this section shall not alter the effect of any payment of mortgagee after his debt is revived by a new promise. But the case is different where one acquires such an interest before the action upon the mortgage is barred and after the period of limitation has run, the debt is revived by a new promise. In such a case the debt was enforceable when the interest of the adverse claimant was acquired with full notice of the mortgage lien. When his interest was acquired, he took it subject to the mortgage, with the knowledge that the debt could be revived by a new promise, and the mortgage lien would stand as long as the debt existed. When the mortgage is foreclosed under a new promise removing the bar of the statute, he is in no different condition than he was in when he acquired his interest. If he was satisfied to acquire his interest while it was subject to the mortgage, he ought to be content to hold it in that condition. He can urge no equity which will relieve his property from the lien of the mortgage." The court, in distinguishing Day v. Baldwin, 34 Iowa, 380, supra, continued: "In that case the mortgagee [the maker of the notes], by his admissions in his answer to the action to foreclose, removed the bar of the statute. This we held he could not do so as to affect the interest of his codefendant, for the reason that he had no interest in the property, and was not a necessary party to the action, and by his pleadings did not show that he was even a proper party. It further appears that the admissions in the pleadings which removed the bar of the statute were made after the adverse title had been fully perfected and vested in the claimant. In the case before us it is not disputed that the mortgagees were authorized to make the written admission of the debt, and it is shown that Howard's title under which he claims was perfected after the admissions were made. The equities which, in that case, we held would not permit the removal of the bar of the statute, are not found in the record before us."

However, the rule that, after conveyance or attachment of the lien, the mortgagor cannot, by part payment, a new promise, or acknowledgment of the debt, revive the debt principal or interest." Section 25 reads: "Whenever any payment of principal or interest has been or shall be made upon any existing contract, whether it be bill of exchange, promissory note, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness, if such payment be made after the same shall have become due, the limitation shall commence from the time the last payment was made." With the foregoing provisions of the statute in view, we will not proceed to examine the question, which, for the first time, comes before this court for decision. It is of far-reaching importance, and there is much diversity of opinion found in the decisions of various courts in regard to it, and before discussing them, perhaps it is well to consider the question upon principle. Primarily a contract of this kind is an agreement to repay a sum of money borrowed. The note did not constitute the debt; neither did the mortgage. The first was evidence of the debt, and the second—in addition to being evidence of its existence—furnished a security for its payment. As a legal colloquialism, we speak of owing a sum of money on a note or a mortgage. But what in fact is meant by this phrase is that we owe a debt evidenced by a note or secured by a mortgage. Hence, when money is borrowed and a note and mortgage given as security for its repayment, or as evidence of the terms and duration of the contract, for many purposes the note and mortgage constitute but one contract,—a contract to repay money. It is true that there may be as against the grantee or lienor, has also been applied in cases where, from the facts, it appeared that the attempted revival was made before the debt was barred.

Such cases are Kendall v. Clarke, 90 Ky. 178, 13 S. W. 583 (set out in the KAISER CASE); Benedict v. Griffith, 92 Ark. 105, 122 S. W. 479; Hanna v. Kasson, 26 Wash. 568, 67 Pac. 271; Raymond v. Bales, 26 Wash. 493, 67 Pac. 269.

In Zoll v. Carnahan, 83 Mo. 35, there is also language to the effect that a mortgagor, after he has parted with his interest, cannot, by part payment or promise to pay, stop the running of the statute of limitations in favor of his grantee. But see the review of this case in KAISER v. IDLEMAN.

In Tate v. Hawkins, 81 Ky. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 181, it was held that while partial payments made by the original vendee on a note for the purchase money, one within fifteen years and the other after the lapse of that period, would have the effect as to him to suspend the operation of the statute of limitations, the rule could not be applied to the prejudice of one whose immediate grantor, it appears from the facts in the case, had secured the property from the original vendee long before the partial payments were made, and who himself, as also appears from the facts, acquired the property before the debt was barred, and thus before the last partial payment, although in fact after the first-named partial payment. The court in this case said: "If appellee Milner is now to be deprived of the safeguard provided by law, and upon the faith of which he purchased and paid for the land, it is to be done by an obstruction to the running of the statute, and a recognition of the cause of action after it had by law ceased to exist, made by Hawkins without his consent or notice to him. This court has, in the two cases referred to, held that Hawkins could, by his own act, elongate the statute, and continue his liability upon the note beyond fifteen years from the time it fell due; but it was not, nor ought to be, determined that Milner should thereby suffer. The lien is a charge upon the land which it is not the policy of the law, nor in accordance with the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) analogy of the law, should exist longer than the statutory existence of the note; and if reasons were necessary to justify this salutary and necessary principle, they are afforded by the circumstances of this case. Appellant is shown to have known of the purchase by Basket, and of the sale by him to Milner, and from his relation to Hawkins, being a brother-in-law, must have known that Hawkins was paid in full for the land, yet he continued to indulge him for more than fifteen years and until he became insolvent, and then attempted to subject the land to the payment of his debt. The consideration for this indulgence, whether friendship for Hawkins or his agreement to pay usurious interest, did not benefit Milner. In our opinion the statute should not be thus perverted in letter and spirit for the benefit of a creditor guilty of such laches."

Although the above cases for their decision relied solely upon the fact that the part payment or new promise was made after conveyance or attachment of the lien, and took no note of the fact that, at the time of part payment or new promise, the statute of limitations had not yet run against the debt, the facts make them in all respects similar to the KAISER CASE, and they are therefore clearly in conflict with that case.

Opposed to the above cases, and thus in line with the KAISER CASE, are such as New York L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Covert, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 350, reversing 29 Barb. 435, where it was held that payments upon a bond and mortgage by the mortgagor, which, from the facts, it appeared were made within the statutory period, will rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time, even as against a purchaser from such mortgagor.

It appeared in this case that the mortgagor, long before he made the payments, had conveyed the land in fee. As a reason for its decision, the court said: "These defendants purchased the premises pledged for the payment of that debt with full knowledge of its existence, and we are authorized to assume that either the amount due at the time of their purchase was deducted from their purchase money, or, in lieu thereof, they two remedies open to the creditor for the recovery of his money, but both arise out of the breach of one duty, which the law imposes upon the debtor; namely, to pay his debt according to the terms of his agreement. The law has wisely provided, in effect, that a promissory note upon which no payments have been made for a period of six years shall cease to be valid as evidence of a debt, by providing that, after such lapse of time, it may not be declared upon as a substantive cause of action. The right is not extinguished, but the remedy—the efficient means of enforcing the right—is taken away. But if a mortgage has been given to secure the payment of the same debt, being a higher and more formally executed evidence of it, the law, notwithstanding it has taken away the remedy upon the note, has provided that the mortgage shall be evidence of the original obligation for a longer period; that is, ten years. The note being by the law merchant readily transferable by indorsement and delivery, the courts, to facilitate the transaction of business, have held that, for certain purposes, the mortgage is an incident of the note, and passes with it; but it is no less true that both the note and mortgage are incidents of the original debt, and, taken together, they constitute the evidence provided by law to prove and render certain performance of the original contract of borrowing, and from the terms of a note and contemporaneous mortgage we get the complete contract between the parties. A partial payment upon a contract for the payment of money has always been held to toll the statute of limitations. In some jurisdictions this is held to be upon the theory that a new promise is thereby implied, and that a new period of limitations begins from the date of such promise; but in this state it is held that such result does not ensue by reason of a new promise, but that such part payment operates to continue and keep in force the original promise, and the courts, to facilitate the transaction of business, have held that, for certain purposes, the mortgage is an incident of the note, and passes with it; but it is no less true that both the note and mortgage are incidents of the original debt, and, taken together, they constitute the evidence provided by law to prove and render certain performance of the original contract of borrowing, and from the terms of a note and contemporaneous mortgage we get the complete contract between the parties. A partial payment upon a contract for the payment of money has always been held to toll the statute of limitations. In some jurisdictions this is held to be upon the theory that a new promise is thereby implied, and that a new period of limitations begins from the date of such promise; but in this state it is held that such result does not ensue by reason of a new promise, but that such part payment operates to continue and keep in force the original prom-elect to rely upon the personal covenant of their grantors to save them harmless therefrom."

And see Kendall v. Tracy, Hathaway, & Hathaway, 64 Vt. 522, 24 Atl. 1118; and Barrett v. Prentiss, 57 Vt. 297, sufficiently set out in the KAISER CASE. So, in Mack v. Anderson, 165 N. Y. 529, 59 N. E. 289, in which the question was raised whether payments made by grantees of a mortgagor, who have assumed the debt, will arrest the operation of the statute of limitations in favor of the grantee of another parcel, obiter statements were made to the effect that the mortgagor himself could have kept alive the bond and mortgage by making payments thereon within the twenty years, even after he had conveyed the premises. The court remarked that such payment would have bound the grantees, not upon the theory that the mortgagor was their agent, but because the latter would have been simply paying his own debt with which the land of the former was burdened.

In Stein v. Kaun, 244 Ill. 32, 91 N. E. 77, it was held that payment of interest on a note secured by a mortgage after the note was due, but, as the facts showed, before it was barred, arrested the running of the statute of limitations as well as to persons who, subsequent to the giving of the note, had secured an estate in remainder in the property, as to the person himself who paid the interest. The court said that any act of the mortgagor which arrests the running of the statute is equally binding upon his grantee with actual or constructive notice of the mortgage.

It should be noted here that, although it clearly appears in the immediately above cases that the part payment or new promise was made before the debt was barred, it is 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

difficult to say how much that fact affected the court in its decision, and it is probably safe to say that there is nothing in these cases from which it might be intimated that the result would have been different had the attempted revival been made after the debt was barred.

Aside from the KAISER CASE it does, however, appear in a couple of cases that the court had in mind the fact that part payment was made before the debt was barred.

Thus, in McLaughlin v. Senne, 78 Neb. 631, 111 N. W. 377, where it was held that a payment by the owner of the equity of redemption on a mortgage debt before the statute has run is binding on the property, and tolls the statute of limitations as against a subsequent mortgagee with notice of the prior mortgage, the court took occasion to say: "Whether a payment on a mortgage debt after its enforcement in rem has become barred would revive it as against a subsequent mortgage in existence at any time after the statute had run and before such payment was made is a question not necessarily involved in this case, and not decided."

In Hastie v. Burrage, 69 Kan. 560, 77 Pac. 268, where it was contended that payment on the part of the mortgagor would not toll the statute of limitations as against his son, the holder of the legal title, the court said that this question had been settled against this contention by the case of Jackson v. Longwell, 63 Kan. 93, 64 Pac. 991. In the Jackson Case it was held that part payments made by the husband on a note executed jointly by him and his wife, and secured by a mortgage on real estate belonging to the wife, would have the effect of tolling the statute of limitations, so as to make the land subject to foreclosure, although the note had become barred as to the wife, and

ise. Dundee Invest. Co. v. Horner, 30 Or. 558, 48 Pac. 175.

Applying these rules to the case at bar, it would seem that a payment by the debtor upon the note and mortgage,—i. e., upon the mortgage debt,—as alleged here, or a payment upon either, would serve to toll the statute as to both. Indeed, there would be no room for contention to the contrary had Idleman, the original mortgagor, retained the legal title to the mortgaged premises, unless, as contended by defendants, the provisions of § 25 do not embrace mortgage debts. It is contended that the words, "bill of exchange, promissory note, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness," do not, under the rule of ejusdem generis, include mortgages, but are limited to instruments not under seal, and of like character to those specified. The rule is stated by a leading author as follows: "When general words follow an enumeration of particular things, such words must be held to include only such things or objects as are of the same kind as those specifically enumerated." 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. § 422. "The doctrine of ejusdem generis is but a rule of construction to aid in ascertaining the meaning of the legislature, and does not warrant a court in confining the operation of a statute within narrower limits than intended by the law-makers. The general object of an act sometimes requires that the final term shall not be restricted in meaning by its more specific predecessors." Willis v. Mabon (Willis v. St. Paul Sanitation Co.) 48 Minn. 140, 16 L.R.A. 281, 31 Am. St. Rep. 626, 50 N. W. 1110.

In the section now under consideration the first language used is "payment . . . upon an existing contract, whether it be bill of exchange, promissory note, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness." Here the general words precede the special enumeration, and certainly the words "any existing contract" are sufficiently broad to characterize the whole section. Moreover, a she was no longer personally liable. The court in the latter case took occasion to say: "Plaintiff in error cites in support of his contention the case of Schmucker v. Sibert, 18 Kan. 104, 26 Am. Rep. 765, where it was held that, when a note is barred, the mortgage securing the same is also barred. We most cordially indorse the doctrine laid down in that case. The trouble with its application to the case at bar rests in the fact that here the note is not barred. and that here the debt for which the mortgage was given has not been discharged."

In a few cases it seems to have been intimated that there is a distinction between those cases where the mortgagor parted with all interest in the property, and where he still retained the equity of redemption or any part of it.

A case of this nature is Du Bois v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Colo. 400, 96 Pac. 169, where, after referring to those cases in which the mortgagor had parted with all interest in the property before the time of payment, and stating that the majority of them hold that in such case the mortgagor cannot prolong the time of the payment of his mortgage, the court said: "But the decided weight of authority is that, when a purchaser with actual notice of the mortgage, or constructive notice by means of registry,—which is the case here,—acquires an interest in mortgaged property, he succeeds to the estate and occupies the position of his grantor. He takes subject to the encumbrance; and so long as the mortgagor retains the equity of redemption, or any part of it, his acknowledgment of the existence of the debt binds the subsequent purchaser."

In Raymond v. Bales, 26 Wash. 493, 67 Pac. 269, where it was held that when mortgaged premises are sold under execution 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

sale, a partial payment thereafter by the mortgagor on the debt will not stop the running of the statute of limitations as against the purchaser at such execution sale, it was also contended that the payment was made within a year from the date of the execution sale, and that therefore, since he still had the right to redeem, and was still the owner of the equity of redemption, he had such an interest in the mortgaged premises as authorized him to stipulate for an extension of the statute of limitations as to an action upon the mortgage. The court, however, said: "It must be held here that the encumbrance of appellant's judgment lien, and the levy and sale thereunder, vested appellant with such interests in the land as prevented the mortgagor from stipulating an extension of the statute of limitations as to the right of action to foreclose the mortgage against appellant."

Cases in which the question was raised, as in Mack v. Anderson, supra, whether payment by one grantee of a portion of the premises will toll the statute of limitations as to other grantees of the mortgagor, who have secured a portion of the premises, are not included in this note.

Those cases have also been excluded where it was sought to toll the statute of limitations as against the mortgagor because of a payment or new promise by the grantee.

For cases dealing with the question whether absence of the mortgagor from the state will toll the statute of limitations in foreclosure proceedings against his grantee—see note to Boucofski v. Jacobsen, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898.

Effect of part payment on mortgage by one cotenant to toll statute of limitations as to others—see note to Clute v. Clute, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 146.

bond—by its very definition—is an instrument under seal, a specialty, and not so different from a mortgage, in the formalities required in its execution, that the latter is unfit to be associated with it in a statute. A mortgage is within the reason of the enactment. It may be given in connection with a promissory note or bond, or may contain the complete contract within itself, but in either case there is no reason for denying a payment made upon such a contract the same efficacy that it would have if made upon a promissory note or bill of exchange. A mortgage is certainly an “evidence of indebtedness,” and not infrequently the only evidence. Chase v. Ewing, 51 Barb. 597. We conclude, therefore, that a part payment, either upon the note or mortgage, will toll the statute as to the mortgage. In this conclusion we are supported by the authority of decisions rendered in cases arising in this state. Sutherlin v. Roberts, 4 Or. 378; Allen v. O'Donald (C. C.) 28 Fed. 346; Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 35 L. ed. 843, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67.

The next and most difficult question is: Who is authorized to make such payment? On principle it would seem clear that the person who contracted the debt, gave the note, and executed the mortgage, would be the only one to whom the creditor should be required to look for fulfilment of his obligations. Under § 5359, Bellinger & C. Anno. Codes & Statutes, conveyances of real property not recorded within five days after their execution are void as to subsequent purchasers in good faith of the same property. In other words, the recording of a mortgage is constructive notice to subsequent purchasers, but there constructive notice ceases. Having recorded his mortgage, the mortgagee is not compelled to watch the records to see whether or not the mortgagor has sold the property, but has a right to assume that he still owns it, and to deal with him as such owner. And even if he has notice of a transfer of the legal title, he has a right to assume that the purchaser has informed himself of the condition of the title, and taken it subject to encumbrances that are shown by the record to have a valid existence. It is always in the power of a purchaser, before paying the purchase money, to make himself secure against an existing encumbrance, and, if he fails to do so, he ought not to require a mortgagee to be more diligent to protect him than he has been to protect himself. The weight of authority seems to indicate that a payment upon the mortgage debt by the original debtor, before the statute has run, has the effect to arrest its operation. “A purchaser with actual notice of the mortgage, or constructive notice by means of a registry, can avail himself of the presumption of payment from lapse of time only when the mortgagor could avail himself of it under the same circumstances. The grantee succeeds to the estate, and occupies the position of his grantor; . . . as, for instance, the purchaser of a part of the mortgaged premises cannot claim a presumption of payment of the mortgage from lapse of time, when this presumption is repelled by payments of interest made by the mortgagor within twenty years, or by his admission within this time that the mortgage was then subsisting.” 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1202. While the language above quoted was used by the author in reference to mortgages in jurisdictions where no statute of limitations existed, but where a lapse of twenty years was held to create a presumption of payment, we see no essential difference in principle, between such a condition and that existing in the case at bar. If part payment by a mortgagor, after he has parted with his title or equity of redemption, can rebut the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time, to the prejudice of his grantee, it would seem to follow naturally that part payment by a mortgagor similarly situated would keep the mortgage alive under our statute of limitations.

The case of Kendall v. Tracy, Hathaway, & Hathaway, 64 Vt. 522, 24 Atl. 1118, is in point on the matter at bar. In 1866 Kendall sold a farm to Tracy, taking his promissory note and mortgage on the farm in payment. In 1871 Tracy sold a portion of the farm to the Hathaways, who entered into possession and made extensive improvements. In 1889 Kendall brought suit to foreclose his mortgage. Tracy had made partial payments on the note from time to time to keep it alive. The defendants Hathaway pleaded the statute of limitations as to themselves. The court said: “The defendants cannot avail themselves of the statute of limitations. They could acquire by their deed no better title than Tracy had, which title he held subject to the petitioner's mortgage, and that mortgage was kept from the operation of the statute by payments made by Tracy to the petitioner.” In Barrett v. Prentiss, 57 Vt. 297, the court says: “Was the claim barred by lapse of time? The payment was made by Prentiss, the maker of the mortgage and notes, after he had sold and quit possession of the premises. He was liable upon the notes as maker; and a payment made by him, we hold, would rebut the presumption that the mortgage debt had been paid, not only as to him, but as to all who were grantees under him, they having taken their interest with constructive notice of the mortgage." In Mack v. Anderson, 165 N. Y. 529, 59 N. E. 289, the court, speaking of the effect of a payment made by a mortgagor after parting with his title, says: "The mortgagor could, of course, have kept the debt alive as to the Andersons, by making payments within the period of limitation, even without their knowledge or consent. Such payments would have bound the Andersons, not upon the theory that the mortgagor was their agent, but because the latter was simply paying his own debt, with which the land of the former was burdened." Nothing could be more applicable to the case at bar than the language above quoted. Idleman, the mortgagor, could have kept the debt alive as to the Blacks by making payments within the period of limitations, even without their knowledge or consent. See also Perry v. Horack, 63 Kan. 88, 88 Am. St. Rep. 225, 64 Pac. 990; Jackson v. Longwell, 63 Kan. 93, 64 Pac. 991; Teegarden v. Burton, 62 Neb. 639, 87 N. W. 337. We conclude, therefore, that payments by Idleman, before the statute had barred the action on the note, tolled the statute, not only as to him, but as to defendants as well.

We have examined the authorities submitted by defendants' counsel, and fail to discover that any one of them covers the exact point in issue. Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. v. Northwest Thresher Co. 14 N. D. 147, 70 L.R.A. 814, 116 Am. St. Rep. 642, 103 N. W. 915, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1160, merely holds that the absence of the original mortgagor from the state does not toll the statute of limitations as to his subsequent grantee. Although the course of reasoning by which the learned court arrived at this conclusion is somewhat unique, the conclusion itself is sound and fully in accord with the holding in this state. Anderson v. Baxter, 4 Or. 105. The case of Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482, is not in point. In that case the mortgagors, after sale of the property, and after the statute had run, attempted to renew the note and debt; and it was held that they could make no new promise to the prejudice of their grantee. Some dicta used by the court in its opinion would seem to be favorable to defendants' contention, but it must be taken to refer to the facts before the court, and be construed with those facts in view. In the case of Day v. Baldwin, 34 Iowa, 380, Baldwin, the original mortgagor, attempted to revive the mortgage debt as against his grantee after the right of action had become barred, and it was held that such recognition of the mortgage would not bind the grantee. The case of Cook v. Prindle, 97 Iowa, 464, 59 Am. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

St. Rep. 424, 66 N. W. 781, was a similar case, and the decision followed the rule announced in Day v. Baldwin, supra. In Zoll v. Carnahan, 83 Mo. 35, it was contended that the absence of the vendee, against whose property a vendor's lien existed, tolled the statutes as to his subsequent grantee, and the court held adversely to this contention. What was said in the opinion in regard to the effect of a part payment by a mortgagor, under such circumstances, was not predicated upon any fact appearing in the case, and is pure dictum. The case of Kendall v. Clarke, 90 Ky. 178, 13 S. W. 583, arose upon an attempt to enforce a vendor's lien against a grantee of an original vendee. The court held squarely in that case that a payment by the vendee would not keep the lien alive against his grantee. The disfavor with which courts view vendor's liens may have accounted for this decision, though it does not so appear, and we concede this case to be fairly in point, as sustaining defendants' contention, but in view of the weight of authorities to the contrary, as well as what we deem, upon reason, to be the safe and salutary rule, we decline to adopt the reasoning of the case cited. In Old Alma-House Farm v. Smith, 52 Conn. 434, the maker of a note and mortgage conveyed his equity of redemption to a third party, who, from time to time, for fifteen years following, paid interest on the note. It was held that this did not toll the statute as to the original mortgagor. The reason given is that the party making the payments was not liable on the note, and that he was not in such privity with his grantor as to be his agent for the purpose of making a new promise. It will be seen that this decision proceeds upon the theory that a part payment constitutes a new promise, and must therefore be made by a joint debtor or someone having actual or implied authority to bind the original maker,—a doctrine expressly repudiated in this state in Dundee Invest. Co. v. Horner, supra. The case of Schmucker v. Sibert, 18 Kan. 104, 26 Am. Rep. 765, is another case in which an attempt was made to revive a debt already barred by the statute, and is not in point here.

Without pursuing the subject further, it is sufficient to say that, outside of the case of Kendall v. Clarke, supra, which we deem unsound, and Old Alma-House Farm v. Smith, supra, which is based upon a construction of the statute of limitations different from that which prevails in this jurisdiction, the other cases cited resolve themselves into two classes: (1) Those in which it is held that absence from the state will not toll the statute as to a grantee of the mortgagor; (2) those in which it is held that a payment by the mortgagor, after the statute has run, will not revive the debt as against his grantee. The distinction between these cases and the one at bar is this: (1) In this state a part payment continues and keeps alive the original promise, while the absence of the primary debtor from the state has no such effect. (2) The revival of a debt after it has once been barred is in the nature of a new promise or contract, not a continuation of the old; and a mortgagor has no authority to make such new promise to the prejudice of his grantee.

It follows from the conclusions here arrived at that the decree of the court below should be reversed, and the demurrer overruled, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

(140 Wis. 505, 122 N. W. 1126.)

Death — presumption — absence — search.

1. Proof of diligent search and inquiry is not required to establish the presumption of death when a person has absented himself from his home or place of residence for seven years.

Domicile — parent's home.

2. The home of his widowed mother will be presumed to be that of an unmarried son who, upon reaching majority, goes away to work, but makes such home his headquarters, in the absence of anything to show an intention to change it to another place.

Insurance — proofs of death — waiver.

3. A requirement of a mutual benefit society that suit cannot be brought until a certain time after proofs of death are furnished is waived by refusal of the proper officer to furnish blanks for such proof, because the notice given him was of absence for more than seven years, rather than of death.

(October 26, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Green County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

The plaintiff, as the beneficiary in a benefit certificate issued to her son Otto Miller, brings this action to recover $1,000. To establish the death of the insured, evidence was offered tending to show that at the time the action was begun he had been absent from his home and unheard of for seven years. No evidence was offered by the defendant. The court directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff, and such ruling is assigned as error. Otto Miller was last heard from in 1899. He was then twenty-three years of age and unmarried. He was a musician and a barber, and had pursued both callings for a livelihood, and had been away from home on and off for several years prior to his disappearance. It appears that he was devoted to his mother, writing to her frequently when he was away, and returning to her home at irregular intervals. The testimony fairly shows that, in so far as the alleged decedent had any home, it was with his mother. In 1899 he was en-

Note. — Necessity of inquiry to raise presumption of death from seven years' absence.

As declared in the note upon this question appended to Modern Woodmen v. Gerdomb, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 809, the weight of modern authority supports the rule that diligent inquiry for a missing person is necessary to raise a presumption of his death from seven years' absence.

Thus, in Posey v. Hanson, 10 App. D. C. 496, it was held that to raise such presumption there must be some proof of inquiry made of the persons and at the places where news of the absent person, if living, would most probably be had.

And in Hansen v. Owens, 132 Ga. 618, 64 S. E. 800, it was held that it must be shown that there was an unsuccessful effort to find the absent person by search and diligent inquiry at his last known place of residence, and among his relations or acquaintances, if any.

And in Policemen's Benev. Assn. v. Ryce, 213 Ill. 9, 104 Am. St. Rep. 190, 72 N. E. 764, affirming 115 Ill. App. 95, and Modern Woodmen v. Graber, 128 Ill. App. 585, the rule enunciated in Hitz v. Allgren, 170 Ill. 60, 48 N. E. 1068, was followed, that there must be diligent inquiry at the absentee's last place of residence, and among his relatives and any others who would probably have heard from him if living.

And in Renard v. Bennett, 76 Kan. 848, 93 Pac. 261, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 240, the following language from Modern Woodmen v. Gerdomb, 72 Kan. 391, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 809, 82 Pac. 1100, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 570, was quoted with approval: "In order that the presumption of life may be overcome by the presumption of death there must be evidence, not merely of absence from home or place of residence for the period of seven gaged to be married to a young lady at Monroe, where his mother resided. In July, 1899, the plaintiff and Otto went to Salina, Colorado, where Mrs. Miller visited some relatives until the following July. It is not entirely clear whether she went to Colorado with the purpose of making it her permanent home, but the inference from the testimony is strong that she did not. Otto did not remain at Salina long, but spent most of his time in Denver and Boulder until December, 1899, at which time he wrote his mother from Denver. Nothing further had been heard from him up to the time of the trial. Some rumors reached plaintiff as to his whereabouts, and numerous letters were written to parties who it was thought might be likely to know of him if he were alive. The plaintiff continued to make the required payments on the benefit certificate for the seven years after the disappearance of her son.

Mr. Arthur H. Burnett, with Messrs. Jeffris, Mouat, Smith, & Avery, for appellant:

The absence of a person for seven years from his usual place of abode or residence, and from whom no intelligence has been received, raises the presumption of death only where there has been diligent inquiry at the person's last place of abode, and among those who would probably hear from him if living.

Where a person changes his abode, the fact that he has not been heard from at his former place of residence raises no presumption of his death, unless it be accompanied by evidence that he has not been heard from at his last known place of abode.

Mr. J. M. Becker, for respondent:

If a person has absented himself from home or family, and has not been heard of for seven years, the presumption of law is that he is then dead; and if no other evidence is introduced on that point, the court should proceed on the presumption of death, without submitting the question to the jury.

years, but there must be a lack of information concerning the absentee on the part of those likely to hear from him, after diligent inquiry."

And in Dietrich v. Dietrich, 128 App. Div. 564, 112 N. Y. Supp. 968, it was held that the presumption of the continuance of life was not overcome until the lapse of seven years, "and then only after honest and bona fide attempts to find or hear from the missing person have met with failure."

And that there must be some search for the missing person before the presumption of death from absence can arise was the guiding principle of the following decisions, though no rule was laid down as to the character thereof: Re Hall's Deposition, 1 Wall. Jr. 85, Fed. Cas. No. 5,924; Kennedy v. Modern Woodmen, post, 181; Hoskins v. Lindsay, 1 Del. Co. Rep. 249, cited in 15 Century Dig. p. 2489; Shepherdson's Estate, 3 Del. Co. Rep. 376; Schwarzhoff v. Neck- 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

er, 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 325; Ross v. Blount, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 344, 60 S. W. 894; Latham v. Tombs, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 73 S. W. 1060; Re Creed, 1 Drew. 235; Benson v. Olive, 2 Strange, 920; Doe ex dem. France v. Andrews, 15 Q. B. 756.

In Re Allin, 17 L. T. N. S. 60, and in Re Robertson [1896] Pr. 8, the court refused to act upon the presumption of death from seven years' absence until advertisements for the missing person had been published.

In Bradley v. Modern Woodmen (Mo. App.) 124 S. W. 69, the testimony given in the trial court was held to tend to prove that enough diligence was exercised to discover the fate and whereabouts of the missing person, "even if we accept, as sound, recent decisions which hold the presumption only arises when due efforts have been made to learn the fate of the missing person."

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by the defendant that the evidence offered was insufficient to raise the presumption of death, and that a verdict should have been directed in its favor. If this contention be not well taken, then it is urged that the jury should have been permitted to pass upon the principal issue in the case.

Some of the more modern cases hold that an interested party seeking to establish the death of another may not rely on the absence of such party from his home or place of residence for seven years without being heard from, as being sufficient to raise a presumption of death, but, in addition thereto, it must be shown that diligent search and inquiry have been made and all available sources of information exhausted without result before a prima facie case of death is established. Modern Woodmen v. Gerdorn, 72 Kan. 391, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 309, 82 Pac. 1700, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 570, and cases cited. If this rule is adopted by this court, the judgment could not be sustained. While a considerable amount of evidence of search and inquiry was offered by plaintiff, and was not contradicted, still different minds might reasonably draw different conclusions as to whether the search was sufficiently diligent, thorough, and exhaustive to meet the requirements of the rule. In such a case the jury rather than the court should draw the inference. The rule stated by Mr. Greenleaf is that "after the lapse of seven years, without intelligence concerning the person, the presumption of life ceases, and the burden of proof is devolved on the other party. . . . It is sufficient, if it appears that he has been absent for seven years from the particular state of his residence, without having been heard from." 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 41. Other treatises on the law of evidence state the rule in substantially the same way. 4 Wigmore, Ev. § 2531; Jones, Ev. 2d ed. § 61 (57). Each of the authors named cite an abundance of cases in support of the rule announced. In Cowan v. Lindsay, 30 Wis. 586, this court adopted, without qualification, the rule as laid down in Greenleaf on Evidence, and has reiterated such rule in Whiteley v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 72 Wis. 177, 39 N. W. 369, and in Wisconsin Trust Co. v. Wisconsin M. & F. Ins. Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bank, 105 Wis. 464, 81 N. W. 642, although it was not necessary to the decision of either of the two cases last cited to do so. Thus it will be seen that the court is firmly committed to the general doctrine which does not require proof of diligent search and inquiry in order to establish the presumption of death when a person has absented himself from his home or place of residence for seven years. To hold in this case that the home of the plaintiff was not that of her son would be equivalent to holding that where a son has reached his majority, and has made it a practice to work away from home at times, he thereby loses his domicile with his parents, at least in the absence of direct evidence on his part of intention not to change his place of residence.

The plaintiff is a widow seventy-two years of age. She had six children. One died in 1898 and one in 1899, and three others died prior to 1898, so that Otto was the only living child and heir when his mother went to Colorado in July, 1899. Otto appears from the evidence to have been an affectionate son, returning often to the home of his mother, and writing her very frequently during his absence. The death of the plaintiff's daughter Emma in 1899 was the immediate cause of her going to Colorado. While there Otto made her numerous visits up to the time of his disappearance. There was nothing to suggest that he had acquired or intended to acquire a home or place of residence different from that of his mother. Intention is almost invariably a controlling element in determining residence. In Pennsylvania it is held that "residence is, indeed, made up of fact and intention; that is, of abode with intention of remaining. But it is not broken by going to seek another abode; but continues till the fact and intention unite in another abode elsewhere." Pfoutz v. Comford, 36 Pa. 420, 422. Other courts hold that a person leaving his place of residence with the present intention of abandoning it thereby ceases to be a resident of such place. Swaney v. Hutchins, 13 Neb. 266, 13 N. W. 282. But residence is not lost by leaving it for temporary purposes, where the intention remains to return when such purposes are accomplished. State ex rel. Daubmann v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 57, 59; Stratton v. Brigham, 2 Sneed, 420, 422; Warren v. Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 418, 69 Am. Dec. 69. The general rule is that a man must have a habitation somewhere, and that he can have but one, and that, in order to lose one, he must acquire another. Kellogg v. Winnebago County, 42 Wis. 97, 107; Bulkley v. Williamstown, 3 Gray, 493, 495. Residence signifies a person's permanent home and principal establishment, to which whenever he is absent he has the intention of returning. Re Clark, 61 Hun, 619, 40 N. Y. S. R. 12, 15 N. Y. Supp. 370, 371. Section 69, Stat. 1898, prescribes rules for determining the residence of electors. Subdivision 3 of this section provides that a temporary absence from home with the intention of returning shall not deprive a party of his residence; and subdivision 9 provides that intention to acquire a new residence, without removal, shall avail nothing, and that neither shall removal without intention. These statutory provisions would seem to be merely declaratory of the common law.

The residence of Otto Miller was with his mother, at least until he reached his majority, as he could form no valid intent to change it before. There is no proof that he acquired or attempted to acquire any new residence. There is abundant evidence that he did return to the home of his mother frequently, and at least made it his headquarters. Under these circumstances, we do not think the court erred in assuming that the residence of the plaintiff was the residence of her son. The certificate upon which suit was brought provided that no legal proceeding should be instituted to recover thereunder until ninety days after proofs of death were furnished. The constitution of the defendant required the officers of the local camp to report the death of a member to the sovereign clerk of the order, and made it the duty of such clerk to forward to the clerk of the local camp such blanks as should be prescribed by the sovereign commander and finance committee, upon which to make proofs satisfactory to them. A proper request for such blanks was made, and was refused on the ground that no notice of death had been received. In refusing to send the blanks, an officer of the defendant, presumably duly authorized, stated that proof of absence could not be received as proof of death, and that the validity of the claim made could not be recognized unless actual death could be shown. The defendant, no doubt in conformity with the provisions of its constitution, had blanks upon which to make proofs of death that would be satisfactory to it. The plaintiff could hardly be expected to know what was required in this regard. There was a denial of liability, if plaintiff proposed to rely on the presumption of death resulting from absence. Under these circumstances, the defendant waived its right to insist on proofs of death as a condition precedent to the beginning of suit. King v. Hekle F. Ins. Co. 58 Wis. 508, 17 N. W. 297; Faust v. American F. Ins. Co. 91 Wis. 158, 30 L.R.A. 783, 51 Am. St. Rep. 876, 64 N. W. 883; Matthews v. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

JOHANNA KENNEDY

v.

MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA,
Appt.

(243 Ill. 560, 90 N. E. 1084.)

Trial — direction of verdict — evidence concerning absentee.

1. The court cannot direct a verdict for an insurance company in an action on a policy upon the life of one who has been absent from his home for more than seven years, merely because of evidence that the absentee has been seen within that time, since the question of the credibility of such evidence is for the jury.

Evidence — duty to credit.

2. The jury is not absolutely bound by the testimony of a witness, although it is not contradicted by direct evidence, where the evidence itself indicates that it is unworthy of belief.

Witness — impeachment — contradictory statements.

3. Evidence of a witness given at a trial which involved the same facts, and of statements out of court tending to discredit his testimony, is admissible to impeach him.

Evidence — presumption of death — failure to follow rumors — effect.

4. Mere failure of the relatives of one who disappeared without explanation, and remained absent from home for more than seven years, to follow up rumors that he had been seen in different places, and institute diligent inquiry in such places for him, is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of death arising from such absence.

Same — failure to follow rumors.

5. The relatives of one who disappeared without explanation, and has remained absent from home for more than seven years, are not bound to follow up intelligence of a tangible and definite character as to his whereabouts to avoid its rebutting the presumption of death, if the source from which it comes is so corrupt and unreliable as to destroy its value.

Same — admission as to testimony — effect.

6. One receiving upon a trial the benefit of a declaration of an absent witness through the admission of his opponent that he had heard of it takes it subject to the same conditions and limitations which would attach to it had the declarant been called as a witness.

Note.—As to necessity of inquiry to raise presumption of death from seven years' absence, see note to Miller v. Sovereign Camp W. W. ante, 178.

Same — hearsay — claimed admission.

7. A statement of a stranger reported to the beneficiary of a benefit certificate the holder of which has been absent without explanation for seven years, that he had seen the absentee, the receipt of which is admitted by the beneficiary at the trial of the action to enforce the certificate, is merely hearsay, and evidence is properly admissible to impeach the credibility of the one who made it.

Witness — reputation — remoteness.

8. That a witness removed from a community ten years previous to a trial does not render inadmissible impeaching testimony of those who knew him when there as to his general reputation for truth and veracity, on the theory that it relates to a period too remote.

Appeal — modification of instruction.

9. A modification of an instruction as to the specific evidence the jury is to consider, so as not to include that of a particular person, is not reversible error, if his testimony was included by a general charge as to consideration of evidence.

Evidence — death — preponderance — sufficiency.

10. One seeking to recover on a policy of insurance upon the life of one who disappeared without explanation, and has been absent from home for more than seven years, is not bound to satisfy the jury of his death beyond a reasonable doubt, a preponderance of evidence being sufficient.

Appeal — limiting evidence — error.

11. Unduly limiting the cross-examination of a witness is not reversible error if no prejudice results therefrom.

Evidence — absentee — inquiries.

12. Evidence of having written letters subsequent to the commencement of an action on a policy of insurance upon the life of one who disappeared without explanation, and has not been heard from for more than seven years, making inquiry as to the presence of the insured in a certain place within the seven years, and about the time an informant claimed to have seen him there, is admissible in the action.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit commenced in the circuit court of Douglas county on the 31st day of January, 1907, by the appellee, Johanna Kennedy, against the appellant, the Modern Woodmen of America, upon a benefit certificate issued by the appellant to James Kennedy, bearing date the 19th day of February, 1896, and in and by which certificate the appellant agreed to pay to the appellee, the wife of James Kennedy, in case of his death, the sum of $2,000. A trial resulted in a judgment and verdict in favor of the appellee, and the appellant prosecuted an appeal to the appellate court for the third district, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, and a further appeal has been prosecuted to this court.

The declaration, in substance, averred that James Kennedy, on the 13th day of December, 1898, suddenly and without explanation left and departed from his home, situated near Tuscola in Douglas county, and that he has been unaccountably absent, and has never returned to his home or been heard of by the appellee, although she has made diligent and continuous search for him ever since his disappearance, and that she has been unable to find him, or any trace of him, although she has made diligent search and inquiry for him, and that by reason of his continued absence for seven years the law presumes said James Kennedy to be dead, and the declaration averred that the said James Kennedy departed this life on the 13th day of December, 1898. The general issue was filed. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and again at the close of all the evidence, the appellant made a motion for a directed verdict in its favor, which motion was denied, and the action of the court in denying said motion is assigned as error. It is also assigned as error that the trial court committed error in its rulings upon the admission and rejection of evidence produced on behalf of the appellee and offered on behalf of the appellant, and in modifying and refusing instructions offered on behalf of appellant. By a stipulation found in the record every fact necessary to authorize a recovery in favor of the appellee was admitted by the appellant, except the death of James Kennedy, and the principal question presented by this record is: Does the evidence introduced by the appellee raise the presumption of the death of James Kennedy? No direct proof of the death of James Kennedy was introduced, but the presumption of death arising from his continued and unexplained absence for the period of seven years subsequent to December 13, 1898, is relied upon to sustain the verdict and judgment.

The undisputed evidence shows that James Kennedy was forty-two years of age and had been for a number of years a farmer living near Tuscola with his wife and six minor children, the eldest of whom, a daughter, was about sixteen years of age at the time of his disappearance; that the relations between Kennedy and his family were kindly and affectionate, and that no reason or excuse existed which would justify or explain his disappearance; that on the day he disappeared he was in the city of Tuscola with his wife, and returned to his home in the evening in a happy and contented frame of mind; that he had on his person about $200 in cash; that he told his family he was going to Champaign by the early train that evening to pay the rent due upon the farm upon which they resided, which would fall due on the 1st day of January, and that he would return to Tuscola on the train which arrived at that place from Champaign, about 1 o'clock the next morning, and requested them to leave sufficient coal in the room for him to replenish the fire on his return, and to leave the south door unlocked so that he could get into the house on his return; that he went to the depot in Tuscola in the evening and purchased a ticket for Champaign; and while waiting for the train he was in his usual frame of mind, and talked with a number of people; that he said to an acquaintance by the name of Smith, at the depot, that he had come to meet some parties, and that he was going to some town near by the next week; that when the train going to Champaign arrived he left the waiting room and went out onto the platform, and was observed going in the direction of the train; that when he did not return to his home after the train arrived from Champaign the next morning upon which he was expected, his wife and children were alarmed, and they and his neighbors and friends immediately commenced to search and inquire for him; that they inquired of the train men in charge of the train going to Champaign, telephoned to Champaign, wrote letters of inquiry to his relatives and friends in adjoining and remote cities, and to his relatives at the place of his nativity in Ireland, but received no information relative to his whereabouts, and that he has never been seen or heard of by his family, neighbors, relatives, or friends since he was seen at the depot in the city of Tuscola on the evening of December 13, 1898.

The law is well settled in this state that where a person leaves home with the expectation of returning thereto within a short time, and he remains away, and his absence is unexplained and unaccounted for, and no intelligence is received from him, and he is not heard from, and his whereabouts cannot be ascertained, although diligent search and inquiry are made in the vicinity of his home and at such places as he would be likely to go, and from such persons as he would be likely to meet and know, and nothing is heard from or of him, and he remains away from his family and home for the period of seven years, a presumption arises from these facts that he is dead, unless there are other facts and circumstances shown which will rebut and overcome such presumption of death. Whiting v. Nicholl, 46 Ill. 230, 92 Am. Dec. 248; Johnson v. Johnson, 114 Ill. 611, 55 Am. Rep. 883, 3 N. E. 232; Reedy v. Millizen, 155 Ill. 636, 40 N. E. 1028; Hitz v. Ahlgren, 170 Ill. 60, 48 N. E. 1068; Policemen's Benev. Assn. v. Ryce, 213 Ill. 9, 104 Am. St. Rep. 190, 72 N. E. 764.

The only testimony found in this record which it is claimed by the appellant tends to rebut the presumption that James Kennedy was dead at the time this suit was brought is the testimony of William E. Rogers, a witness residing in the city of Peoria, whose deposition was read on the hearing, who stated that he saw James Kennedy in Salt Lake City, Utah, in the year 1900, and the statement of appellee, drawn out on cross-examination, that she was informed in the year 1904 by her son that Myrtle King Rogers, the wife of William E. Rogers, had told him in a store in the city of Tuscola, in the year 1904, that she had seen his father in Salt Lake City in the year 1900. The witness William E. Rogers, in his deposition used in this trial, testified that he had no personal acquaintance with James Kennedy, that he had never spoken to him but on one occasion, and that he had seen him but three times; twice in Tuscola in 1898, when he did not speak to him, and once in Salt Lake City in 1900, when he talked to him but a few minutes.

At the time James Kennedy disappeared he had a benefit certificate in the Court of Honor upon his life, in which his wife was named as beneficiary, and upon which suit was brought at about the time the suit upon the policy in question was commenced, and upon the trial of which case William E. Rogers testified as a witness orally, and his evidence given in that case is found in the record in this case. In the trial of this case proper foundation of impeachment was laid for the purpose of using the testimony given by William E. Rogers upon his examination in the Court of Honor case; and the testimony of William E. Rogers, given in the trial of the Court of Honor case, relating to his acquaintance with James Kennedy and his means of identifying him at the time that he claimed he saw him in Salt Lake City, is materially different from the statements made by him in his deposition read in evidence on the trial of this case. Appellee was also permitted, over the objection of the appellant, after the proper foundation for impeachment had been laid, to prove by T. N. Cofer, county judge of Coles county, that during the trial of the Court of Honor case he occupied a room on the second floor of the hotel in Tuscola adjoining a room occupied by Rogers and his wife; that there were double doors between the rooms; that between 10 and 11 o'clock at night the witness heard Mrs. Rogers say that the attorney for the defendant told her he would get the money by the latter part of the week—by Saturday night—to compensate them; that she told the attorney it was about the first of the month, and they were hard up for money. Witness also testified that he heard Mrs. Rogers say, "Don't you remember that I introduced you to Kennedy in Salt Lake City?" and that Rogers replied, "I believe I do;" that Mrs. Rogers said Kennedy was about forty-five years old, was a heavy man, weighing 160 or 180 pounds, had dark hair, heavy, sandy mustache, was slightly stooped, and "had a peculiar walk, like this," followed by footfalls on the floor.

The appellant contends that the impeachment of William E. Rogers by his former testimony and by the testimony of Cofer was improper, and urges that his testimony should have been assumed by the court to have been true upon the presentation of its motion to take the case from the jury, and as Rogers's testimony was uncontradicted, it showed that James Kennedy was living in 1900, and that there could, by reason of a failure to establish the death of James Kennedy, be no recovery, and the court erred in not taking the case from the jury upon its motion for a directed verdict. It was a question of fact for the determination of the jury whether or not the presumption of death arising from the unexplained absence of James Kennedy for more than seven years, established by the evidence of the appellee, had been rebutted, and the court could not properly assume, upon the hearing of the motion for a directed verdict, that the evidence of William E. Rogers was true, but it was for the jury to determine the credibility to be given to the evidence of William E. Rogers. The jury were not bound absolutely by the evidence of William E. Rogers, although it was contradicted by no direct evidence. In Podolski v. Stone, 186 Ill. 540, 58 N. E. 340, the court, on page 547 of 186 Ill., of the opinion, quoted the following language from Anderson v. Liljengren, 50 Minn. 3, 52 N. W. 219: "A court or jury is not bound to accept it [the testimony] as true merely because there is no direct testimony contradicting it, where it contains inherent improbabilities or contradictions which, alone or in connection with other circumstances in evidence, satisfy them of its falsity." And in Quock Ting v. United States, 140 U. S. 417, 35 L. ed. 501, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 733, 851, the court said: "There may be such an inherent improbability in the statements of a witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard his evidence, even in the absence of any direct conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony, and there may be so many omissions in his account of particular transactions, or of his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story." And the appellate court, in its opinion, in disposing of the testimony of William E. Rogers, said: "It would unduly extend this opinion to detail and discuss the evidence adduced upon the cross-examination of this witness, together with other evidence in the record introduced on behalf of appellee which tended to discredit his testimony. A most careful examination of the evidence persuades us that the jury were justified in concluding that the testimony of this witness was fabricated, and that he was unworthy of belief." We are of the opinion that the impeachment evidence introduced to disparage the testimony of William E. Rogers was properly admitted, and think that the trial court did not err in declining to take the case from the jury upon his evidence, although the same was uncontradicted by the direct testimony of any witness.

It appears from the evidence of the appellee that on receiving, in the year 1904, through her son, the intelligence that Myrtle King Rogers claimed to have seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City in the year 1900, she made no search or inquiry for James Kennedy in Salt Lake City prior to the commencement of this suit, for the reason, as she testified, that the reputation for truth and veracity of Myrtle King Rogers was bad, and that she was of the opinion that it would avail nothing to make search and inquiry for James Kennedy in Salt Lake City, and it is urged by the appellant that the appellee, by reason of her failure to make search and inquiry for James Kennedy in Salt Lake City upon receiving, through her son in 1904, information that Myrtle King Rogers claimed to have seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City in 1900, is barred of her cause of action, as the presumption that James Kennedy was dead at the time her suit was brought has been rebutted.

In Johnson v. Johnson, supra, the defendant in error testified that about one year after her first husband left her, and in 1867, she received a letter from him, and from that time to the time of the trial, in August, 1884, she had not seen him or heard from him, but that she had heard rumors at one time that he was dead, and at another that he was living, and at another that he was married again. In reviewing the effect of this testimony as bearing upon the validity of defendant in error's second marriage, the court said (page 616 of 114 Ill.): "It has been repeatedly held that mere rumor that the absent party is dead or living cannot be received in evidence, either to aid or rebut the presumption of life,"—and the wisdom of the rule of law thus announced by the court in that case is demonstrated in this case by the conduct of the witness Peter Wells. Wells had been in Chicago, and on his return he said to the son of appellee he had seen his father while in Chicago, giving street and number where he had seen him. On the conversation being repeated to the appellee and her family, her eldest son and daughter immediately went to Chicago in search of their father, but learned nothing of him; and on Peter Wells being called as a witness on the trial of this case he admitted he had made the statement to appellee's son on his return from Chicago, but stated that he did not see James Kennedy while in Chicago. He testified: "I was in Chicago September of last year; told Mrs. Kennedy's boy I saw his father some time last week; was at the eye and ear infirmary on West Adams street, No. 227; saw the Kennedy boy in Newman; he came over to my house; asked me if I saw his father; I said, 'Yes;' I said it as a joke; didn't tell the truth."

We think it clear that the failure to follow up information of the character received from Myrtle King Rogers will not necessarily defeat the right of recovery in a case like the one at bar, on the ground that the receipt of such information, unless followed up by search and inquiry, as a matter of law, rebuts the presumption of death arising from the lapse of seven years' absence, unexplained, of the party whose death is being investigated; but we are of the opinion that the probative force of such information, as bearing upon the presumption of death arising from the continued and unexplained absence of a party for the period of seven years, must be governed by the facts and circumstances surrounding each case under investigation. If such is not the rule of law in cases of this character, then in this case, as there is evidence found in the record that Myrtle King Rogers said she saw James Kennedy in Butte, Montana, Boise City, Idaho, and in the state of Minnesota, in order to establish the presumption of death by reason of the continued and unexplained absence of the party for seven years, it would have been necessary to prove on the trial in this case that diligent search and inquiry had been made for James Kennedy in the cities of Butte and Boise City and in the state of Minnesota, otherwise the presumption that James Kennedy was dead by reason of his long and unexplained absence, which covered a period of more than seven years, would have been rebutted by these statements of Myrtle King Rogers. We think, therefore, when the information as to the absent person, who has been absent for a long period, and whose absence has been unexplained, amounts merely to a rumor, it does not have the effect necessarily to rebut the presumption of death arising from the lapse of time, as a mere rumor is often founded upon nothing substantial, and may rest upon mere gossip, or may be put afloat by interested parties for the purpose of escaping liability, or with a view to defeat the presumption which arises from the unexplained absence of the party for the period of seven years. If, however, the intelligence is of such a tangible and definite character that unexplained, if reliable, it would rebut the presumption of death arising from the unexplained absence of a person for seven years, we think the failure to follow up such intelligence by due search and inquiry can, in a case like this, be excused by showing that the source from which the information came was so corrupt or so unreliable as to destroy its value,—and that was what was sought to be done in this case by calling witnesses to show that the statement made by Myrtle King Rogers was unreliable and unworthy of belief. A number of witnesses testified that her general reputation for truth and veracity was bad, and other witnesses testified that she made statements to them that she had seen James Kennedy in Butte, Montana, Boise City, Idaho, and in the state of Minnesota, and that she had afterwards denied making to them such statements. The deposition of Myrtle King Rogers had been taken, and was on file in this case, but was not read in evidence, as doubtless the appellant hoped to obtain the benefit of her statement, without calling her as a witness, by relying upon the admission of the appellee that she had received intelligence, through her son, that Myrtle King Rogers had seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City in 1900, instead of calling Myrtle King Rogers as a witness or reading her deposition in evidence on the trial, and thereby escaping the danger of the evidence of Myrtle King Rogers being impeached by direct contradiction or by witnesses who would swear that her general reputation for truth and veracity was bad. The appellant, by the course pursued, received the full benefit of the statement of Myrtle King Rogers. We think, therefore, if the appellant obtained, by the admission of the appellee, the benefit of the statement of Myrtle King Rogers upon the trial that she had seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City in 1900, without calling her as a witness, it received the benefit of her statement subject to the same conditions and limitations as it would had she been called as a witness. The statement of Myrtle King Rogers reported to the appellee by her son, and testified to by the appellee, was clearly hearsay evidence, and we think, when admitted, became subject to the general rules of law which govern the impeachment of hearsay evidence when such evidence, under some exception to the general rules against the admission of hearsay evidence, is properly received in evidence, as, for example, dying declarations, which are hearsay evidence, and which it is held may be impeached by any of the methods by which the evidence of the deceased could have been impeached had he been living and testified as a witness. Dunn v. People, 172 Ill. 582, 50 N. E. 137; Nordgren v. People, 211 Ill. 425, 71 N. E. 1042. It is obvious, if this case is analogous to the cases cited,—and we think, on principle, it is,—the impeaching testimony hereinbefore referred to was properly admitted. If the appellant had called Myrtle King Rogers as a witness, and she had testified on the trial of this case to the same statements she made to appellee's son about seeing his father in Salt Lake City in 1900, it would have been competent to have impeached her testimony in any of the methods allowed by law, and appellant cannot avail itself of the benefit of her statement that she saw the husband of appellee in Salt Lake City in 1900, and at the same time close the door of attack upon the credibility of the statement of Myrtle King Rogers by any method of impeachment which could have been used had she testified upon the witness stand. If the statement of Myrtle King Rogers can be used without subjecting it to impeachment, the effect would be to give to the statement of Myrtle King Rogers, made ex parte, and not under oath, greater potency than if she had testified to the same statement as a witness, and to make her statement thereby immune from attack, though she made the statement not under oath.

It is said, however, that the effect of permitting the witnesses to contradict the statement of Myrtle King Rogers, or to testify that her general reputation for truth and veracity is bad, is to permit a person to be impeached who has not testified as a witness in the case. That is true; but the same is equally true where a dying declaration is impeached by some one of the modes provided by law for impeaching a person who has testified as a witness upon a trial, and arises out of the necessity of the case.

It is said by the appellant, Myrtle King Rogers had not lived at Tuscola for about ten years previous to the trial of this case, and it is insisted that the testimony of witnesses who knew her when she lived at Tuscola, as to her general reputation for truth and veracity, related to a period too remote, and for that reason was incompetent. This precise question was decided contrary to appellant's contention in Holmes v. Stateler, 17 Ill. 453, and Blackburn v. Mann, 85 Ill. 222, in both of which cases the reasons for the admissibility of impeaching testimony under such circumstances are fully set forth.

It is also urged that the court improperly modified appellant's fourth instruction, and improperly refused to give to the jury appellant's thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth instructions. By the fourth instruction the court was asked to direct the jury that, in arriving at a verdict, they should consider all the evidence admitted by the court, including that relating to James Kennedy having been seen in Salt Lake City and other places, and the court modified the same by inserting therein the words "to the reports," so that as modified it read, "including that relating to the reports of James Kennedy having been seen," etc. The criticism of the modification is that it excluded from the consideration of the jury the testimony of William E. Rogers that he had seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City. We do not think the jury were misled by the modification. The testimony of William E. Rogers was included in the statement, "all the evidence admitted by the court," and the testimony of that witness was not excluded from the consideration of the jury by the modification of the instruction.

By the thirteenth and fourteenth instructions the court was requested to direct the jury that, before a verdict could be found in favor of appellee, the evidence must be sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt in their minds of James Kennedy being alive at the time the suit was commenced, and that if they entertained any doubt whether he was dead, the verdict should be for appellant. The refusal of these instructions was correct, as, this being a civil case, it was only necessary for the appellee to establish her case by a preponderance of the evidence. It is conceded that these instructions were contrary to the rule adopted in this state, but it is claimed that they are supported by authorities outside of this state, and this court is asked to follow those authorities. We think the rule announced in Policemen's Benev. Asso. v. Ryce, 213 Ill. 9, 104 Am. St. Rep. 190, 72 N. E. 764, where an instruction was considered laying down the rule that it was sufficient, to entitle the plaintiff to recover in a case like this, that he establish his case by a preponderance of the evidence, was a correct statement of the law.

By the fifteenth and sixteenth instructions the court was asked to direct the jury that, if appellee heard of her husband being at any place after his disappearance, it was her duty to make search and inquiry at such place, and if she failed to do so, she could not recover. What we have previously said in this opinion renders unnecessary a further discussion of that question. In our opinion the instructions were properly refused.

It is also insisted that the court erred in declining to permit the son of appellee to state in full the statement made to him by Myrtle King Rogers at the time she informed him she had seen his father in Salt Lake City. The son gave the substance of that conversation and the substance of what he informed the appellee was said to him by Myrtle King Rogers. It may be that the cross-examination of the witness on the point in question was unduly limited, but we do not think appellant was prejudiced thereby. The same may be said with reference to the refusal of the court to permit the mother of Myrtle King Rogers to testify what her daughter had reported to her with reference to seeing James Kennedy in Salt Lake City. There is no question but what the jury fully understood that Myrtle King Rogers claimed and repeatedly stated that she had seen James Kennedy in Salt Lake City, and the refusal to permit her mother to reiterate her story we do not think should reverse the case.

It is also said the court erred in permitting the appellee to prove she had written letters of inquiry with reference to James Kennedy to Salt Lake City since this suit was commenced. The letters were not introduced in evidence or called for by the appellant, although copies of the letters written and the replies received thereto were stated by appellee to be in the hands of her attorney, who was in court. For aught that appears, the letters, while written subsequent to the commencement of the suit, may have made inquiry as to the whereabouts of James Kennedy during the seven years subsequent to his disappearance from home, and about the time Myrtle King Rogers claimed she saw Kennedy in Salt Lake City, which clearly would have been a proper subject of inquiry at the time the letters were written, although it might not have been proper to make such inquiry with reference to the whereabouts of James Kennedy subsequent to seven years after his disappearance, which is not decided.

We have given this record the consideration which the importance of the case demands, and are of the opinion it contains no reversible error.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

IRA BRECOUNT, Appt.

Excusable homicide — unlawful intent — effect.

1. Homicide, to be excusable within the provisions of § 1995 of the General Statute of 1901 (Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 31, § 10), must have resulted from an act committed with lawful intent. It is not enough that the act is one which, under ordinary circumstances, would be lawful, and is committed by means ordinarily lawful, and with the usual and ordinary caution. There must be absence of unlawful intent.

Criminal law — coroner's warrant — effect.

2. A coroner's warrant for the arrest of a person found guilty by a coroner's jury takes the place of a complaint, and is sufficient authority for the holding of a preliminary examination before an examining magistrate.

Headnotes by PORTER, J.

(March 12, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cowley County, convicting him of manslaughter in the fourth degree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. W. Roberts and F. L. Richardson, for appellant:

The homicide was excusable within the meaning of the statute.

Johnson v. State, 66 Ohio St. 59, 61 L.R.A. 277, 90 Am. St. Rep. 564, 63 N. E. 607.

Mr. C. T. Atkinson, with Messrs. Fred S. Jackson, Attorney General, E. J. Fleming, and C. S. Beekman, for appellee:

It is manslaughter at common law and under the statutes of most of the states if one unintentionally kills another in doing an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, nor naturally dangerous to human life; at least, if the unlawful act is a misdemeanor, and not a mere civil wrong, and is malum in se, and not merely malum prohibitum.

Stentz, 33 Wash. 444, 74 Pac. 588; People v. Thompson, 122 Mich. 411, 81 N. W. 344; White v. State, 84 Ala. 421, 4 So. 598.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ira Brecount was convicted of manslaughter in the fourth degree, and sentenced to serve a term in the penitentiary, not exceeding two years. From this judgment he appeals.

Note.—In STATE V. BRECOUNT the defendant, a fireman, who caused a death while responding to a fake fire alarm known by him to have been turned in merely for the purpose of seeing the people scatter, with which purpose he was in sympathy, claimed that he was protected by a statute providing that "homicide shall be excusable when committed . . . in doing any other lawful act by lawful means, with the usual and ordinary caution, and without unlawful intent." It was held, and rightly, that he was not protected, because he was not without an unlawful intent. There appears to be an absence of direct authority on the effect upon the offense of homicide of the defendant doing an act lawful in itself, but with an unlawful intent.

It would seem that STATE V. BRECOUNT 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The accident upon which the prosecution is based happened in Arkansas City on the 1st day of July, 1908. The appellant was a substitute fireman in the employ of the fire department of that city. The fire department was called out by a fire alarm, and the appellant, in company with the chief, was making the run in the latter's wagon. The appellant was driving on a gallop through one of the main streets, when a collision occurred with a carriage in which Fred Bowers and his wife were riding, and Mrs. Bowers was thrown out, receiving injuries from which she afterwards died. The accident occurred at about 7 o'clock in the evening while a band concert was being given from a temporary stand erected in a part of the street. The street was filled with vehicles and a crowd of persons in attendance on the concert. The appellant was off duty from 6 o'clock in the evening, and at about 7 o'clock met Harry Scott, the chief of the department, two or three blocks from where the crowd was gathered. Scott had not been on duty during the day and was intoxicated. He had been threatening to turn in a false alarm and have the department make a run to see the crowd scatter. C. H. Peek, who was with Scott, was attempting to prevail upon him not to do so, and asked the appellant to take charge of Scott and get him home, and warned the appellant not to permit Scott to turn in an alarm, because it would result in the injury or killing of someone. Brecount replied, in substance, that Scott was chief and had a right to call out the department if he wanted to do so. Soon after this, Scott turned in an alarm from a box on the corner, and gave the location of the fire in a block on South A street, to reach which would take the fire department through the crowd then surrounding the band stand. After turning in the alarm, Scott and the appellant ran to the fire department building, where the lat-might also have been disposed of on the ground that the defendant was doing an unlawful act at the time, since it was unlawful for him knowingly to respond to a fake fire alarm turned in with evil intent, and if so, it will come within the scope of a note in 63 L.R.A. 353, on "Homicide in the commission of an unlawful act." This seems to have been recognized, for the court said that whether the act of the defendant "was lawful in this instance depends upon whether it was done with lawful intent. It was the intent which made the act unlawful."

There is a large number of cases in which homicide was committed while doing an act ordinarily lawful, in a negligent manner. These are collected in a note in 61 L.R.A. 277.

ter hitched the horse to the chief's wagon, and together they drove down the street as fast as the horse could travel. The appellant was driving, and Scott was whipping the horse. This occurred several minutes after the alarm had been turned in and after the fire department had made its run, so that by the time the rig driven by the appellant reached the vicinity of the crowd, many of the persons who had followed the first fire wagon, and had learned that the alarm was a false one, were returning in the direction of the band stand. Among them was Fred Bowers in a carriage with his wife and two other persons. Bowers was on the left-hand or wrong side of the street. He saw the danger he was in, and attempted to get out of the way, and called out a number of times, warning the appellant not to drive into his rig. The horse which the appellant was driving was whipped until within a short distance from the place where the collision occurred. Immediately after the accident, Bowers asked appellant why he drove into him, and appellant exclaimed, "G—— d—— you, we will teach you to keep on your own side of the street." There was little conflict in the evidence. The appellant's witnesses testified that during the time he was driving down the street, he held a tight rein on the horse, that the gong was sounded continuously, and the witnesses saw nothing unusual in the manner in which the run was made.

The principal contention of the appellant is that the homicide was excusable within the definition of § 1995 of the General Statutes of 1901 (Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 31, § 10), which, so far as applicable here, reads: "Homicide shall be deemed excusable when committed by accident or misfortune . . . or in doing any other lawful act by lawful means, with the usual and ordinary caution, and without unlawful intent." It is urged that the evidence of the state established that the appellant was engaged in a lawful act, by lawful means, with the usual and ordinary caution, and without unlawful intent. In this we are unable to concur. In the argument particular stress is laid upon the fact that the appellant was doing the act in the usual and ordinary manner. It may be conceded that the run was being made in the usual and ordinary manner, so far as the speed of the horse, the ringing of the gong, and the keeping of a tight rein on the horse, were concerned. And, if there had been an actual alarm, or one which required the appellant to make the run, and, while making it in good faith, the same accident had occurred, the appellant would not have been criminally responsible for the consequences. But in order to bring an act within the protection of the statute, something more is required than that it be done with the "usual and ordinary caution." There must be absence of "unlawful intent." It is apparent from the evidence that the alarm was turned in, not in good faith, for the purpose of making a practice run, but with the avowed purpose of running through the crowd, to see the people scatter; and that in the purpose the appellant was particeps criminis. There was no lack of evidence indicating the appellant's state of mind and his disregard of the rights of others. His profane exclamation immediately after the collision, to the effect that he would teach Bowers to keep on the right side of the road, and the circumstances under which the alarm was turned in, demonstrate beyond any question that the act was committed with an unlawful intent, that it was reckless, wanton, and wholly inexcusable, the result of a desire to exhibit a little brief authority, and to appear spectacular in the eyes of the people. The act of the appellant in driving through the street in the manner he did might have been lawful on a proper occasion, but whether it was lawful in this instance depends upon whether it was done with a lawful intent. It was the intent which made the act unlawful, and took it outside the protection of a statute which was not designed to relieve persons from responsibility for criminal recklessness.

There is nothing substantial in the claim that the appellant was denied a preliminary examination. While the statute provides that a written complaint under oath shall be filed with the magistrate before the warrant issues (Code Crim. Proc. § 36), there is another method provided by §§ 1768-1771, inclusive, of the Gen. Statutes of 1901. (Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 25, §§ 127-130.) Where there is a verdict of guilty by a coroner's jury, it is made the duty of the coroner to issue his warrant, upon which the defendant is arrested and taken before a magistrate for a preliminary examination. It is expressly provided that such warrant shall take the place of a complaint, and be sufficient foundation for the proceeding before the justice. Gen. Stat. 1901, §§ 1770, 1771, supra. "Such a warrant is of equal authority with one issued by a justice of the peace." State v. Tennison, 39 Kan. 726, 18 Pac. 948.

There was no error in the admission of testimony, nor in the instructions; and the evidence in support of the motion for a new trial was merely cumulative.

We are satisfied that the appellant had a fair trial, and the judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

W. S. DYCUS et al., Appts.,

v.

C. O. BROWN et al.

(135 Ky. 140, 121 S. W. 1010.)

Action — assignee — promise to pay.

1. One who takes from a debtor an assignment of property sufficient to pay all the debts of the assignor, under the agreement that he will pay them, cannot avoid liability to creditors on their claims.

Bankruptcy — barred claims — creditors with notice.

2. Creditors having notice of all steps taken in bankruptcy proceedings against their debtor occupy the same attitude, so far as the barring of claims is concerned, as though they had been mentioned in the petition.

Same — unliquidated claim.

3. A claim for loss on a contract by which one party was to buy produce with money furnished by the other, and to ship it to the latter for sale, after which the net profits were to be divided, is provable in bankruptcy proceedings against the former, so as to be barred by the discharge if the creditor had notice of the proceedings and that a loss was likely to result from the undertaking, although, at the time of the proceedings, the produce had not all been disposed of, so that the amount of the claim was not then ascertained.

Same — partnership transaction.

4. That a claim against a bankrupt grows out of a partnership venture does not relieve the partner holding it from the necessity of presenting it to, and having it audited by, the bankruptcy court.

(October 21, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for McCracken County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover one half the loss alleged to have been sustained under a certain partnership contract for the buying and selling of tobacco. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Miller and E. H. James for appellants.

Mr. J. D. Mocquot for appellees.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In November, 1902, the appellants W. S.

Note. — The only additional case which has been found to involve the question whether a discharge covers claims that might have been, but were not, liquidated pursuant to § 63b, is Re Hilton, 104 Fed. 981, which is sufficiently set out in DYCUS v. BROWN.

On the right to prove unliquidated claim for a tort in bankruptcy, see note to Brown v. United Button Co. 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 961. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) and J. B. Dycus, and S. H. Cassidy, now deceased, composing the firm of S. H. Cassidy & Company, entered into a contract with the appellees Brown and Bloom "for the purpose of buying and selling tobacco on joint account during the season of 1902-1903." By the terms of the contract, Cassidy & Company agreed to buy tobacco in the country, to be paid for with money furnished by Brown and Bloom, and ship the same to the Western District Warehouse Company at Paducah for sale by Brown and Bloom. Cassidy & Company were to receive 60 cents per hundred pounds as compensation for buying and delivering the tobacco. And it further stipulated: "When all the tobacco prized and delivered under this contract shall have been sold, and all legitimate expenses of the business have been paid (said expenses to include commissions of 60 cents per hundred pounds, paid S. H. Cassidy & Company, all fire and marine insurance on tobacco, interest on all money used in the business, freight, drayage, and regular warehouse charges for selling said tobacco) then all profits or losses arising from this business shall be divided as follows,—one half to Brown and Bloom, and one half to Cassidy & Company." After this contract was entered into, Cassidy & Company bought a large quantity of tobacco with money furnished by Brown and Bloom, and shipped the tobacco to the warehouse named in the contract. In October, 1903, Cassidy & Company, composed of the members above mentioned, filed their petition in bankruptcy, and in February, 1904, settled with their creditors on the basis of 25 per cent of their claims, which settlement was approved by the bankrupt court, and thereupon the firm was discharged and acquitted of its indebtedness. Brown and Bloom were not mentioned in the bankruptcy proceedings as creditors of Cassidy & Company, nor was any part of the tobacco in the possession of Brown and Bloom scheduled among the assets of the firm, although at that time a large quantity of the tobacco purchased by Cassidy & Company, and shipped to Brown and Bloom, was unsold, and in the custody of the latter in Paducah. Some time in 1904 or 1905 Brown and Bloom sold all of the tobacco that had been purchased by Cassidy & Company, and it was then ascertained that a loss of about $11,000 had been sustained. In 1908 Brown and Bloom brought this action against W. S. & J. B. Dycus and M. A. Cassidy, the wife of S. H. Cassidy, to recover from them one half the loss. Upon hearing the case, the lower court rendered a judgment in favor of Brown and Bloom for the amount claimed, and it is of this judgment that the appellants complain.

There does not seem to be any serious dispute concerning the fact that the sale of the tobacco resulted in a loss, or the amount of it; but appellants insist that the discharge in bankruptcy released them from all liability to Brown and Bloom, growing out of the tobacco transaction, and that the judgment against Mrs. M. A. Cassidy was erroneous.

Taking up first the question as to the liability of Mrs. M. A. Cassidy, her connection with the transaction arose in this way: In December, 1907, her husband, S. H. Cassidy, conveyed to her all his real and personal estate, and in consideration thereof she agreed "to meet and comply with all his obligations, so far as the property herein conveyed may enable her to do and comply with them." And it was averred in the petition of Brown and Bloom that "the value of the property so conveyed to and received by Mrs. Cassidy was more than sufficient to satisfy the claim of Brown and Bloom, and all other obligations of S. H. Cassidy, and that Mrs. Cassidy took said property in trust, for the purpose of discharging the obligation due to Brown and Bloom, as well as all other indebtedness of S. H. Cassidy." These averments of the petition were confessed by the failure to deny them. We are therefore of the opinion that, unless there be some other reason for setting aside the judgment against Mrs. Cassidy, the objections to it in her behalf cannot avail her.

Cassidy & Company—and for purposes of brevity we include Mrs. Cassidy—set up in their answer that, prior to their adjudication in bankruptcy, they agreed with Brown and Bloom that the latter would take all of the tobacco that had been purchased by Cassidy & Company for the firm, "for better or worse," and pay all debts and expenses growing out of the purchase and sale of the tobacco; and, in consideration of this undertaking on the part of Brown and Bloom, Cassidy & Company surrendered all interest they had in the tobacco, and thereafter did not concern themselves about it, but treated the tobacco as the sole property of Brown and Bloom. They further averred that, because of the agreement and transfer of the tobacco to Brown and Bloom, it was not mentioned in the schedule filed by them in bankruptcy proceedings. All this was denied in a reply filed by Brown and Bloom. On the issue of fact thus presented the evidence is conflicting; but, in the view we have of the case, it does not seem important to further consider this phase of it.

As it is conceded that Brown and Bloom had actual notice of the adjudication in bankruptcy, and all the steps taken in the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bankruptcy proceedings, they occupied towards the bankrupts the same attitude as if they had been mentioned in the petition in bankruptcy as creditors of Cassidy & Company. Jones v. Walter, 115 Ky. 556, 74 S. W. 249. It follows from this that if the claim of Brown and Bloom was a "provable" one under the bankrupt act, they should have presented it in the bankrupt court; and, failing to do so, are barred by the discharge in bankruptcy from recovering the amount of it in this action. If their claim against Cassidy & Company was not a "provable" one in bankruptcy, then neither the failure to present it nor the discharge affects their right to recover. It will thus be seen that the question narrows down to the single issue of whether or not the claim of Brown and Bloom was a "provable" claim against Cassidy & Company at the time the latter filed their petition in bankruptcy. That Cassidy & Company, on the one side, and Brown and Bloom, on the other, were partners in this tobacco venture, is manifest from the contract. This being so, it is the contention of counsel for Brown and Bloom that they were not required to surrender the tobacco to the bankrupt court, or present to the court any claim on account of probable or possible loss resulting to the partnership, and it is further insisted that their claim was not a "provable debt." Bankr. act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418), provides in part that "in the event of one or more, but not all, of the members of a partnership, being adjudged bankrupt, the partnership property shall not be administered in bankruptcy unless by consent of the partner or partners not adjudged bankrupt; but such partner or partners not adjudged bankrupt shall settle the partnership business as expeditiously as its nature will permit, and account for the interest of the partner or partners adjudged bankrupt." And, also: "Debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate, which are (1) a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not, with any interest thereon which would have been recoverable at that date, or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable and did not bear interest; . . . (4) founded upon an open account or upon a contract, express or implied; and (5) founded upon provable debts reduced to judgments after the filing of the petition, and before the consideration of the bankrupt's application for discharge . . . unliquidated claims against the bankrupt may, pursuant to application to the court, be liquidated in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate."

In the assumption that Brown and Bloom did not have a provable debt against Cassidy & Company in October, 1903, we cannot agree.

Bloom was asked the following questions:

Q. Tell whether, at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or the composition that was made, it was known whether or not the partnership venture engaged in between you, Mr. Brown, and the defendants, would result in a profit or a loss.

A. I expected it to be a loss,—in fact, I knew it.

Q. Was it known at that time whether there would be a profit or a loss?

A. Not exactly; the account was not closed up yet. It was open, and some tobacco had to be sold yet.

From this it appears that Brown and Bloom knew at the time Cassidy & Company filed their petition in bankruptcy that there would be a loss, and consequently an indebtedness due by Cassidy & Company to them, although the amount of it was not then ascertained. The mere fact that the total amount of the loss was not then ascertained, or the fact that it could not be ascertained until all of the tobacco was sold, did not, in fair meaning of the bankrupt act, leave it all an unprovable debt. Although the precise amount of the loss was not known when the petition in bankruptcy was filed, yet it was susceptible of ascertainment, and might properly be treated as an unliquidated claim, and as such it was the duty of Brown and Bloom to make application to the bankrupt court to have it liquidated, in order that it might, when liquidated, be proved and allowed against the bankrupt's estate. It only required a sale of the tobacco to fix the exact amount of the loss and consequent liability of Cassidy & Company, and if application had been made to the bankrupt court, it cannot be doubted that the court would have allowed a reasonable time to ascertain the loss, and have entered such orders as would protect the rights of Brown and Bloom in the meantime. The provisions of the bankrupt act in reference to provable debts should be so construed as to permit all debts that come fairly within the meaning of the law to be treated as provable, to the end that the purpose of the act in permitting insolvents to be relieved of their debts may be carried out; and where there is doubt as to whether a debt is provable or not, or as to whether it comes within the meaning of an unliquidated demand that may be made a provable debt, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the provability of the debt, or that it is an unliquidated demand in the meaning of the act, as the case may be.

That there is some confusion and apparent conflict in the cases as to what are and are not provable debts, and as to the proper meaning of the words "unliquidated claims," must be conceded; but the weight of authority favors the view we have taken. Thus, in the case of Re Hilton (D. C.) 104 Fed. 981, the facts were that in November, 1895, Johnson made a written contract with the firm of Hilton, Hughes, & Company, in which the bankrupt Hilton was a partner, whereby Johnson was employed for five years at an annual salary, payable monthly. Johnson continued in this employment until August, 1896, when the firm made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors. Johnson was paid up to that time, and discharged from further service. In 1899, Hilton became a voluntary bankrupt, and in his schedule Johnson was named as a creditor for an unliquidated demand arising from the breach of contract, but took no steps to liquidate his claim for damages. The question afterwards came before the court, in the bankruptcy proceedings, as to whether or not Johnson's claim was a provable debt. In considering the case, the court said: "It only remained to liquidate the amount of the damages arising out of the breach of the contract to make it provable like any other debt. Section 63b expressly provides for the proof of such claims, to be liquidated 'in such manner as the court shall direct.' Having made this provision, it is impossible to suppose that it was the intent of the act to allow a creditor voluntarily to withhold such a claim from liquidation, and thereby preserve it as a claim against any subsequently acquired property, and thus practically defeat the object of the bankrupt act as respects the debtor,—to free him from the load of former obligations. Section 17 provides that the discharge shall release the bankrupt from all his 'provable debts,' etc. A 'provable debt,' as here used, means, in my judgment, any claim that the creditor may make provable through the means provided by § 63b. . . . I cannot doubt that the intent of these words, 'claim provable in bankruptcy,' was to include every claim that, under the provisions of the bankrupt act, might be made provable; and the definite provision of § 63b for making unliquidated claims provable is, I think, precisely what is intended to be included in those words, as distinguished from the previous word 'debt.' In my judgment, therefore, this claim, as a claim that could be made provable in the manner provided by the act, would be barred by the bankrupt's discharge." In the case of Re Stern, 54 C. C. A. 60, 116 Fed. 604, it appears that the Manhattan Ice Company entered into contracts with sundry customers to supply them with ice for a fixed period. Before the period expired, the ice company was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the question presented for decision was whether or not the persons with whom it had made contracts to furnish ice had "provable debts" against it for the damages growing out of its failure to fulfil its contract. The court held that they did. In the case of Re Silverman (D. C.) 101 Fed. 219, the facts were that Rosenberg presented a claim against the bankrupts, Silverman Brothers, for unliquidated damages growing out of a breach of contract for his employment as manager of one of their departments. In considering the case the court, among other things, stated: "The claim being unliquidated, its allowance against the estate is provided for by subsec. b, § 63, of the bankrupt act, which provides that 'unliquidated claims against the bankrupt may, pursuant to application of the court, be liquidated in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate.' The claimant was therefore premature in presenting his claim for allowance before the referee, without first making application to the court to direct the manner of liquidating it."

In the light of these authorities, and others that we have examined, we are of the opinion that Brown and Bloom had, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, an unliquidated claim against Cassidy & Company that was a provable debt, and should have been presented in the bankruptcy proceedings; and, failing to do so, their right of recovery is barred by the discharge. In our opinion, § 63b, relating to unliquidated claims, was intended to, and does, embrace a claim such as Brown and Bloom had at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed. Their claim arose out of a contract. It was capable of definite ascertainment; and, although unliquidated in the sense that the exact amount they were entitled to recover was not ascertained, it was nevertheless a provable claim. Provable claims are not confined to the debts or liabilities mentioned in subsecs. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of § 63, but include unliquidated claims arising out of contract that are capable of definite ascertainment, such as the claim we are considering. An unliquidated claim of this character may be barred by the discharge, as well as an ascertained claim due upon a note, judgment, or open account, if the creditor holding such claim fails to present it. A creditor having an unliquidated claim within the meaning of the bankrupt act can no more withhold it, and after the discharge maintain an action upon it, than he could if his claim was founded upon a judgment or a note.

In Dunbar v. Dunbar, 190 U. S. 340, 47 L. ed. 1084, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757, in considering the proper construction of the words "unliquidated claims" in the bankrupt act, the court said: "In § 63b, provision is made for unliquidated claims against the bankrupt, which may be liquidated upon application to the court, in such manner as it shall direct, and may thereafter be proved and allowed against his estate. This paragraph b, however, adds nothing to the class of debts that might be proved under paragraph a of the same section. Its purpose is to permit an unliquidated claim, coming within the provisions of § 63a, to be liquidated as the court should direct. We do not think that by the use of the language in § 63a it was intended to permit proof of contingent debts or liabilities or demands, the valuation or estimation of which it was substantially impossible to prove." In Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 49 L. ed. 147, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 9, the court, upon the same subject, said: "As to paragraph b, two constructions are possible: It may relate to all unliquidated demands, or only to such as may arise upon such contracts, express or implied, as are covered by paragraph a. Certainly paragraph b does not embrace debts of an unliquidated character, and which in their nature are not susceptible of being liquidated." See also Brown v. United Button Co. 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 961, 79 C. C. A. 70, 149 Fed. 48, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 445.

Although the precise question presented in the case before us was not involved in the cases mentioned, the reasoning of the court supports the view we have taken.

Nor does the fact that the claim grew out of a partnership venture which must be settled add anything to the strength of the argument presented by Brown and Bloom, that it was not necessary to assert their claim in the bankrupt court. It may be conceded that Brown and Bloom had the right to settle the partnership business, but it is also manifest that it was their duty to report the settlement made to the bankrupt court. If a profit had been realized on the tobacco, the creditors of the bankrupts were entitled to their interest in it; and if a loss resulted, the partners sustaining the loss had the right to present their claim against the bankrupt's estate. It cannot be successfully maintained that, because the bankrupt act permits those members of a partnership who are not adjudged bankrupt to administer the assets, it was intended to release so much of such assets as might belong to the bankrupt partner from the payment of his debts. It seems evident that the purpose of the act, in giving to the members of the partnership not adjudged bankrupt the right to settle up the partnership affairs, was to protect their interest, and not to defeat the rights of the creditors of the bankrupt partner. And in our opinion, when some members of a partnership are adjudged bankrupt, and the other partners take charge of the partnership assets, it is their duty to report to the bankrupt court all steps taken by them in the winding up of the partnership business, and to report to the court the amount received in settlement of the partnership affairs. Brown and Bloom, however, did not pay any attention to the bankrupt proceedings, or make any reports of the partnership affairs. Their failure to do this lends support to the contention of Cassidy & Company, that they were to take the tobacco and relieve Cassidy & Company from all liability on account thereof. But, without further extending this opinion, we may conclude by saying that, as Cassidy & Company were discharged from their indebtedness to Brown and Bloom, the judgment against them was erroneous.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WISCONSIN EX REL. JAMES P. DAVERN, Respt.,

v.

DAVID S. ROSE, Mayor of Milwaukee,
Appt.

(140 Wis. 360, 122 N. W. 751.)

Mandamus — official discretion — control.

1. A mayor having all the powers of a chief executive cannot be compelled by mandamus at the suit of a taxpayer to remove from office the chief engineer of the fire department for dishonesty and perjury, misappropriation of public property, and the use of offices at his command to pay personal debts.

Same — insufficient charges.

2. A mayor having statutory authority to suspend for cause the chief of the fire department and communicate the facts to the board of fire commissioners, who shall proceed to consider the desirability of his removal from office, cannot be compelled by mandamus at the suit of a taxpayer to exercise the power of suspension because of charges of dishonesty against such chief, where he has investigated the charges, and determined that they were not sufficient to require suspension of the official.

Officer — reasons for action.

3. An executive officer of a city having statutory authority to suspend subordinate officials from office is not bound to declare the reasons for his action or nonaction in any particular case.

(October 5, 1909.)

Note. — Mandamus: to compel exercise of the power to remove or suspend public officer.

In harmony with STATE EX REL. DAVERN v. ROSE the cases generally hold that the exercise of the power to remove or suspend a public officer can only be enforced by the courts in so far as they may compel action on the part of the officer or board empowered to remove officers, to pass upon the sufficiency of the charges or investigate the conduct complained of, but that they cannot compel further action, or control the discretion of such officers or board.

Thus, in McLaughlin v. Burroughs, 90 Mich. 311, 51 N. W. 283, mandamus to compel the prosecuting attorney to sign a statement that in his opinion charges made in a petition to the governor for the removal of an alderman demanded investigation was denied, it appearing that he had previously informed the persons who signed the petition that no investigation was necessary, notwithstanding that under the statute such a statement by him is necessary to enable the governor to act upon the petition. The court said that, if it should issue a mandamus to compel the attorney to make the statement, it would be directing him to certify the opinion of the court, and would involve an examination and determination of the merits of the charges by the court, and the conclusion by it that the prosecuting attorney had abused his discretion, which it had no power to do; but that it was only when such officers refused to act that the court had jurisdiction, and that extends no further than to set them in motion and compel them to take action; that when such officers, under the law, have exercised their discretion, the court cannot review it.

In State ex rel. Kelleher v. St. Louis Public Schools, 134 Mo. 296, 56 Am. St. Rep. 503, 35 S. W. 617, it was held that while mandamus will not ordinarily lie to control the action of an inferior tribunal in whom a discretion as to the performance or nonperformance of duties is imposed upon it by law, yet, if the discretionary power is exercised with manifest injustice, the courts are not precluded from commanding its due exercise. Thus, where a school board has been guilty of a gross abuse of discretion conferred on it by statute, to fix the time, place, and manner of conducting an election of members of the board, by selecting for purely partisan ends judges and clerks of such election, who are all members of the same political party, and by persistently

A PPEAL by respondent from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County granting an alternative writ of mandamus requiring him as mayor of the city of Milwaukee to remove the chief engineer of the fire department for alleged misconduct in office. Reversed.

Statement by Dodge, J.:

Mandamus. Relator asserts himself to be a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Milwaukee, and that he petitions on behalf of himself and all others similarly situated, asserts various acts of misconduct on the part of the chief engineer of the fire department of said city, and that in September, 1908, he filed with the respondent, then and now mayor of the city of Milwaukee, certain charges of such misconduct; that thereupon said respondent called to his office a large number of the members of the fire department, and took their ex parte oral statements, and thereupon refused to suspend said chief or to send such charges to the board of fire and police commissioners for investigation, on the ground, as stated by respondent, that said charges were too flimsy to receive serious consideration. The charges consist principally in that some two or three years before said chief temporarily misappropriated certain funds under his official control; that he committed perjury, for which he was indicted, tried, and acquitted in 1907; that at that time he was also guilty of subornation of perjury; that at some times not named the labor of certain city employees, and also certain city property, was, under said chief's command, expended for his private benefit; that he appointed a man upon the fire force because of personal pecuniary obligation to him, instead of fitness; that immediately after filing such charges against him he discharged several of the members of the fire department; and other things not deemed material for statement. The respondent moved to quash the alternative writ issued upon said petition, (1) for insufficiency of the matter therein stated to warrant a writ of mandamus; and (2) for defect of parties respondent by reason of the nonjoinder of the chief. The motion to quash was denied, from which action this appeal is brought by respondent.

Mr. Walter H. Bender, with Mr. John T. Kelly, for appellant:

The mayor cannot be compelled at the suit of a taxpayer to exercise the discretion in him vested.

People ex rel. Peabody v. Atty. Gen. 22 Barb. 114.

Mandamus will not lie to control or review the exercise of the discretion of an officer when the act is either judicial or quasi judicial, and, while mandamus may and arbitrarily refusing to hear or to accede to requests of taxpayers for the appointment of election officers from different political parties, the supreme court, in the exercise of its superintending control over inferior tribunals, will, by mandamus, compel the board to rescind the appointments so made, and to select such judges and clerks from different political parties.

But in State ex rel. Smith v. Theus, 114 La. 1097, 38 So. 870, it was held that mandamus would lie against the district attorney to compel him to institute suit to remove a parish superintendent of public instruction from office which he was unlawfully holding and exercising, where such duty was imposed by law upon such officer.

In State ex rel. Castor v. Saline County, 18 Neb. 422, 25 N. W. 587, the supreme court, upon an original application, issued a mandamus to compel a board of county supervisors to act upon a complaint against a county officer and to proceed with the trial of the charges, where, under the law, they had authority to hear and determine complaints against county officers. The court said that while they could, by mandamus, compel the board of county supervisors to act upon the complaint, they could in no way control its judgment or legal discretion; but that the trial and ousting from office by the board was not the exercise of the judicial power nor of the power of impeachment, but of a quasi political and administrative power, and as such could be controlled by the court.

In Maverick Oil Co. v. Hanson, 67 N. H. 203, 29 Atl. 461, it was held that mandamus was not the proper remedy to compel the appointing power to remove an oil inspector from office on the ground of his ineligibility to office. In that case the court stated that the proceeding should have been an information in the nature of quo warranto, or a petition therefor brought in the name of the attorney general as representative of the state.

In State ex rel. Warmolts v. Keegan, 69 N. J. L. 186, 54 Atl. 813, it was held that mandamus would issue to compel the clerk of a board of alderman to strike one name from the roll of members, upon his refusal to comply with the resolution of the board directing him so to do. The court said that the clerk of board of aldermen, in keeping a record of its proceedings, performs a ministerial duty that is imperative in its nature, and his opinion of the legal propriety of the official acts that he is called upon to register is of no consequence.

Cases in which the writ of mandamus was requested for the purpose of restoring one to office have been excluded from this note, though the relief also sought was that the court compel the removal from office of one who had been appointed to take the place of the relator.

be invoked to compel the exercise of discretion, it cannot compel such discretion to be exercised in any particular way.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

With a debated question of defect of parties we shall not concern ourselves, since the view we have taken upon the general merits of this case renders it immaterial to the result.

The general plan of the government of the state, either generally or in such sections as its municipal corporations, is framed upon the theory of intrusting to the legislative and executive branches, and administrative officers appointed within them, the formulation of policy and the execution thereof by officials, constitutional or legislative, in whom is vested the discretion as to what will be most promotive of the welfare of the community. In general that policy is decided by the legislature, in detail it must in many respects be left to the individual officials acting upon their knowledge of specific situations and their judgment as to what the public good requires in those specific instances. Those officers are selected either by the people directly, or by some other method considered likely to procure the persons best qualified in judgment, character, and ability to perform their respective duties. They take their places as public officers under the sanction of an oath of office, and under the burden of a trust as binding and transcendent as do the judges of the courts. Their selection, either by the people themselves directly, or by their authorized representatives, carries with it declaration of the fitness of each officer for his place, conclusive until the appointing authority can have an opportunity to speak again, or until those tribunals vested with authority to remove are invoked. With the exercise of the judgment and discretion committed to such officials the courts have no right to interfere, and this for a very good reason. The occupants of judicial places are not selected to manage the political affairs of the state. The qualifications for their places are vastly different, and not such as to imply abilities to that end. Again, their opportunities for acquainting themselves with the needs and wishes of the people of the state or any locality, with all the complex elements involved in a given exigency, are in nowise comparable to those of the legislative or administrative officers. So that, other things being equal, the probabilities of a correct estimate of the needs of the public are far less in case of the judges than they are in case of the holders of the political offices. Of course, all officials, being human, are liable to err, and the people must suffer the results of errors of judgment into which their responsible officials, judicial as well as others, may fall; but at least the theory of our government is that the peril of error of judgment or intention on the questions committed to them is less in the legislative and executive officials, close to the people and close to the facts of the exigencies in which they act, than it would be at the hands of the judiciary, selected for its supposed ability to apply abstract rules of law to concrete instances. Thus, much has been said because of a growing tendency, of which we think the present proceeding is illustrative, to suppose that any individual who differs with a public official as to the policy which the latter should pursue may demand that the judgment of some court as to his conduct shall be substituted for his own, and control his official acts. Nothing could be further from the theory of our government nor less likely to be promotive of public welfare. People ex rel. Sutherland v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89. Courts sit to remedy wrongs, and it is often urged that no wrong should, by courts, be allowed to go without a remedy; but no wrong in the legal sense results when one receives all that the law accords him. So, when the only right of an individual, or the public, which the law gives, is that which a designated officer deems best, the honest decision of that officer is the measure of the right, however his judgment may differ from that of others, even of the courts. State ex rel. Cook v. Houser, 122 Wis. 534, 570, 100 N. W. 964; Rowell v. Smith, 123 Wis. 510, 528, 102 N. W. 1.

Of course, it is true that the legislature may, and very frequently does, impose upon executive and administrative officers absolute duty involving nothing of judgment or discretion except such as is first exercised by the legislature itself, which discretion, being there exercised and pronounced in the law, leaves no choice to the official. Such ministerial duty may be enforced in a proper case by the courts if there is no other adequate method provided. It therefore becomes essential in every case of official action to consider whether the legislature has so passed upon all questions of policy and discretion, and imposed by law a mere ministerial duty in obedience to their decision, or has reposed in the administrative or executive officer discretion as to when or how he ought to act. In organizing the government of the city of Milwaukee the legislature followed the general lines of the governments of the United States and of the several states in creating legislative and executive departments and officers mainly independent of each other. The charter provided for a mayor having, within the limited territory, the substantial characteristics of a chief executive in analogy to the President of the United States and the governors of the several states. The charter declared that the mayor should be "the chief executive officer and the head of the fire department and of police in said city," and that he should "take care that the laws of the state and the ordinances of the city are duly observed and enforced." These expressions signify the conferring of all the powers of a chief executive, except as elsewhere limited, with the necessary right of discretion and judgment. They also evince the reliance and confidence in the motives which should actuate the decisions finally arrived at by such an officer, which accompany the delegation of broad discretion and responsibility to the other principal officers of government, imposing as an assurance and sanction for the faithful performance of such duties the same official oath as in the case of a governor of a state or the judges of the highest courts. The mayor, therefore, generally speaking, is in no sense a mere ministerial officer to perform only acts as to which the legislature has exercised all discretion and judgment and made him a mere implement of expression. While, as already said, mere ministerial duties may incidentally be conferred upon him, the general words of the charter go much further. They indicate reliance in his discretion, rather than mere ministerialism. From early times the grant of executive power, the general power to execute the laws, has been construed as broadly effective of itself, and especially so in the matter of appointment and removal of subordinate officers. On this subject occurred the most famous historical instance of constitutional construction by a legislative body. In the first Congress of the United States, upon a bill to create the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to be appointed by the President, with the consent and approval of the Senate, and "to be removed from office by the President of the United States," ensued in the House of Representatives one of the most remarkable debates in the history of the Federal government, on the question whether the last-quoted words should be eliminated because implying assertion of power in the Congress to grant or withhold the right of removal; it being contended, on the one hand, that the power under the Constitution might rest in any of several places, and, on the other hand, under the leadership of James Madison, that the "executive power" conferred by the Constitution on the President had already vested in him the power of removal of executive officers, and that the Congress could not take it away, and should not appear to claim such right. Those debates are contained in 1 Annals of Congress, extending from page 455 to page 585, and resulted in the overwhelming adoption of Mr. Madison's contention against the proposition that the power of removal inhered in or resulted from the power of appointment or rested with the legislature to grant or withhold, but that it was included in the "executive power," and hence was vested in the President. That construction of the Constitution has received multitudinous approval since, and been recognized by all thoughtful and careful writers, jurists, and attorneys general of the United States as settled. 2 Marshall, Life of Washington, p. 162; 1 Kent, Com. 310; Bancroft's History of the Constitution; Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet. 225, 10 L. ed. 136; 4 Ops. Atty. Gen. (Legare) 1; Id. (Clifford) 609; 5 Ops. Atty. Gen. (Crittenden) 288, 290. This subject was exhaustively discussed and a very complete collection of the expressions of leading writers thereon embodied in the brief for the government in Parsons v. United States, 167 U. S. 324, 42 L. ed. 185, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 880. Mr. Madison's views, thus adopted, are expressed more particularly on pages 462, 463, 464, and 499 of 1 Annals of Congress. Thus, before adoption of our Constitution and before the draft of the Milwaukee charter, it had become established that executive power as conferred by such instruments included the power to appoint and remove subordinate executive officers at discretion, except as qualified by other expressions.

Hence, seemingly, it would be plain that in the absence of any other charter provisions the mayor, merely by his creation as the chief executive, and by the imposition of the duty to see that the laws and ordinances were enforced, would have the power of appointment and removal. That power, however, was qualified in some degree through all stages of the charter of Milwaukee up to the adoption of a fire and police commission, by chapter 378, p. 1251, Laws 1885, whereby the appointment and removal of the chiefs of the fire and police departments was vested in that board and taken away from the mayor. Section 6 of that act provides that, in case of a vacancy in either office, it shall be the duty of said board to appoint proper persons to fill such offices "during good behavior subject to suspension and removal as hereinafter provided;" and § 12 conferred on the board the power to remove either such officer when of the unanimous opinion that the good of the service would be subserved thereby. These provisions, emanating from the legislature, were, of course, limitations upon the executive power of the mayor, but accompanying them was § 11 of the same act, which provided that the chief of police and the chief of the fire department and other specified officers shall be subject to suspension from office for cause by the mayor at any time. Any officer so suspended shall thereupon cease to exercise the functions of his office until he shall be reinstated. In case of such suspension, the mayor shall at once communicate to said board the charge or charges against the officer suspended, and the board shall at once consider and examine the same, giving the suspended officer opportunity to meet the charges and to be heard in his own defense. If the charges are not sustained by the board, the officer shall be immediately reinstated. If they are sustained, the board shall determine whether the good of the service requires removal from office or suspension, and their decision shall control the action of the mayor. It is clear that thus was formulated an entirely new scheme or plan with reference to certain subordinate executive officers, whereby the whole subject of their appointment and removal was taken out of the hands of the chief executive of the city, and vested in a board; but it is equally apparent that the legislature, appreciating the inherent incapacity of such boards for prompt and effective executive action in emergencies, intended to preserve in the mayor the power of suspension in a proper case. That power was lodged in the mayor as essential to his duty to guard the general welfare, and to see that the laws and ordinances should be enforced. The cause mentioned in § 11 for which the suspension might be made, of course, means any cause which, in the honest judgment of the mayor as a trusted and responsible chief executive, might reasonably render such suspension advisable for the public good. The discretion so conferred empowered him to weigh all considerations in deciding whether sufficient cause existed for such suspension. Those causes and considerations are innumerable. A perfectly good cause for removal may be no sufficient cause for summary suspension, and, vice versa, a good cause for temporary suspension may exist which does not warrant complete removal. In the case of the fire chief his abilities as a fighter of fire to preserve property and the safety of the community are considerations of great importance which may well deter the mayor in his honest judgment from even temporarily displacing him and leaving the city without his services, although he may lack many other attributes of an ideal public officer, and thus make choice of a successor advisable. The condition of things as to the presence upon the force of a subordinate able to supply those emergency qualities which the chief may have, might well justify the mayor in deciding not to suspend one whom he may believe ought not permanently to continue as the chief of that fire department because of other defects of character, during consideration by the board of the sufficiency of those defects as cause of removal. For multitudinous reasons like these, it is not the absolute duty of the mayor, even if informed of great or even gross dereliction in certain directions, to momentarily deprive the city of the protection resulting from other abilities of such an officer as the fire chief or the chief of police. The contention of respondent to the effect that, whenever charges are laid by a "citizen and taxpayer," a ministerial duty is imposed upon the mayor to forthwith suspend, at once suggests illustrations which are convincing of the impossibility of such legislative intention. Were the chief of police engaged in a campaign against gambling houses or houses of ill fame, he would naturally draw upon himself the antagonism of those who profit from such establishments, and if, at the critical moment of such proceedings, a fearless and effective chief of police must lay down the fight because the proprietor of such a building, a "citizen and taxpayer," laid some charge of general impropriety or even dishonesty against him, the possibility of the enforcement of the laws and ordinances for the time being at least might well disappear. The mayor must be authorized in such a case to look not alone to the charges, but as well to the necessities of the community. The possibility of a substitute for the assailed officer competent to meet the exigencies of the moment, and an infinity of other considerations as to whether it is best that he be summarily suspended and the office left vacant until the commission can, in the slow course of investigation and procedure that must characterize such bodies, fill the place with another appointee, present themselves in such a contingency. We are persuaded that the power, and, of course, the duty, of suspension preserved in the mayor by § 11, is discretionary in a very high degree, and therefore, under the uniform holding of this court, that the mayor's decision not to exercise it is not subject to review or direction by the courts, unless, indeed, there may be found an entire refusal to consider and exercise discretion. State ex rel. Gill v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254; State ex rel. Gericke v. Ahnapee, 99 Wis. 322, 326, 74 N. W. 783; State ex rel. Coffey v. Chittenden, 112 Wis. 569, 574, 88 N. W. 587; State ex rel. People's Land and Mfg. Co. v. Holt, 132 Wis. 131, 111 N. W. 1106; State ex rel. Wisconsin Metropolis Teleph. Co. v. Milwaukee, 132 Wis. 615, 618, 113 N. W. 40; State ex rel. Rudolph v. Hutchinson, 134 Wis. 283, 114 N. W. 453; State ex rel. Vanderwall v. Phillips, 134 Wis. 442, 114 N. W. 802; State ex rel. Wagner v. Dahl (Wis.) 122 N. W. 748; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 42.

In this case we can find nothing of such refusal. There is no duty resting upon an executive officer vested with such ample discretion as this, to declare the reasons for his decision or his action in deciding against suspension. It is enough for him to declare that he deems the public welfare promoted by action or inaction, which declaration indeed need only be by the act. John Adams, who, as Vice President, had cast the deciding vote in favor of Madison's construction of executive power, referred to in an earlier part of this opinion, gave his own illustration, when President, of the extent of accountability of the chief executive under such a power, in his communication of May 12, 1800, to the then Secretary of State, which reads: "Divers causes and considerations essential to the administration of the government, in my judgment, requiring a change in the department of state, you are hereby discharged from any further service as Secretary of State. John Adams, President of the United States." In the presence of such a solemn declaration courts must indulge in every prima facie presumption in favor of the good faith of the executive officer in his discharge of his duties as such, and only when it can be established by the clearest possible evidence that such officer has wholly refused to exert his jurisdiction or to exercise any discretion whatever can the courts properly interfere by mandamus. Spalding v. Vilas, 161 U. S. 483, 40 L. ed. 780, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631; People ex rel. Peabody v. Atty. Gen. 22 Barb. 114, 118; Ely v. Cram, 17 Wis. 537; Connor v. Marshfield, 128 Wis. 280, 288, 107 N. W. 639. In the present case it appears by the relation itself that, upon receipt of relator's so-called charges, the mayor did enter into an investigation, took various means to inform himself of facts and of the situation, and declared his conclusion that the charges did not warrant the suspension of the officer, resulting, as it must, to the latter's great detriment and to the deprivation of the city and the public of his services. It is apparent, therefore, on the face of the papers, that the discretion was exercised, and that the conditions upon which it might be the duty of the mayor to suspend the fire chief did not exist. Hence, of course, the motion to quash should have been granted.

Order reversed and cause remanded, with directions to quash the alternative writ of mandamus and to dismiss the proceeding.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

PATRICK MALONEY

v.

JEREMIAH F. HAYES.

(206 Mass. 1, 91 N. E. 911.)

Landlord — unsafe sidewalk — liability.

A property owner cannot escape liability for injury to a pedestrian through ice formed on the sidewalk from water cast thereon from a pipe constructed by him, because at the time of the injury the property was in possession of a tenant.

(May 18, 1910.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to the direction by the Superior Court for Norfolk County of a verdict in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for Note. — Liability of abutting property owner for injury caused by ice formed from water artificially turned across sidewalk.

The following decisions upon this question have been reported since the preparation of the note accompanying Hynes v. Brewer, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598.

A property owner who, as landlord, has general control of his premises as to physical conditions and repair, is liable to one injured by falling on an icy sidewalk in front of such premises, where the accumulation of ice on the walk is due to the freezing of water artificially collected and discharged upon it by a defective gutter. The fact that it is the duty of the occupants of the building to remove the ice from the sidewalk does not discharge the owner from liability where the latter's neglect was the cause of its accumulating. Smith v. Preston, 104 Me. 156, 71 Atl. 653.

And so, a property owner who throws water from his roof, by means of a spout, onto his walk in such a manner that by the natural slant it flows to a public walk, where it freezes, is liable for injuries thereby caused to a pedestrian who is himself personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Louis S. Thierry for plaintiff.

Messrs. John H. Appleton and Charles R. Darling, for defendant:

The plaintiff must show that the premises were "permanently dangerous."

Clifford v. Atlantic Cotton Mills, 146 Mass. 47, 4 Am. St. Rep. 279, 15 N. E. 84; Coman v. Alles, 198 Mass. 99, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 950, 83 N. E. 1097.

It is the occupier who is prima facie liable to third persons for damages arising from any defect.

Leonard v. Storer, 115 Mass. 88, 15 Am. Rep. 76.

The owner has a right to rely on the tenant's managing the premises in such a way as to prevent them from being a nuisance.

Clifford v. Atlantic Cotton Mills, 146 Mass. 47, 4 Am. St. Rep. 279, 15 N. E. 84; Mellen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 695; Handyside v. Powers, 145 Mass. 123, 13 N. E. 462; Caldwell v. Slade, 156 Mass. 84, 30 N. E. 87; Hutchinson v. Cummings, 156 Mass. 329, 31 N. E. 127; Frischberg v. Hurter, 173 Mass. 22, 52 N. E. 1086; Neas v. Lowell, 193 Mass. 441, 79 N. E. 810; Coman v. Alles, 198 Mass. 99, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 950, 83 N. E. 1097; Rich v. Basterfield, 4 C. B. 783.

The wooden shoe which received the water from the conductor affixed to the house, and which was not itself affixed to the house, but was detached and movable, was not in the exercise of due care. Fried v. Gowdy, 199 Mass. 568, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 236, 85 N. E. 884.

The same principle is recognized in Drake v. Taylor, 203 Mass. 528, 89 N. E. 1035, where the court says: "A landowner who collects water into a definite channel, by a spout or otherwise, and pours it upon a public way, whereby through the operation of natural causes ice there forms, is the efficient cause in the creation of a nuisance, and is liable for whatever damage results as a probable consequence."

In the case of Duffy v. New York, 128 App. Div. 837, 113 N. Y. Supp. 118, the plaintiff was injured upon an icy sidewalk the condition of which, due to the emptying of water thereon from a broken leader on an adjoining house, had existed for more than a year, and the city was held liable on the ground that it was a continuing nuisance which it should have abated. This decision, of course, cannot be interpreted as holding that the owner of the house would not have been liable also for the conditions which existed. The decision is included for what it may be worth as suggesting a several liability in that line of cases.

itself a nuisance, and could only cause a nuisance, by the manner in which it was, according to the plaintiff's claim, used, viz., by putting it through the fence so as to discharge water onto the sidewalk.

Coman v. Alles, supra.

The plaintiff must show that the condition of things which he claims to have been dangerous, or calculated to produce a nuisance, existed when the defendant let the premises.

Frischberg v. Hurter and Neas v. Lowell, supra.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, while lawfully using the street as a traveler, was injured by falling on an accumulation of ice, which had been formed from water collected and discharged upon the sidewalk, through a spout attached to a conductor leading from the roof of the defendant's house. A landowner or occupier of land cannot lawfully collect surface water into a definite channel, and discharge it upon a highway, making it unsafe for the use of travelers. The act creates a public nuisance, and a traveler who suffers injury therefrom can sue the wrongdoer. Hynes v. Brewer, 194 Mass. 435, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598, 80 N. E. 503. But as the premises at the time of the accident were in the possession and control of a tenant at will, the defendant contends that he is not responsible. If during the tenancy the defendant voluntarily painted and shingled the house, no retention of control of the premises for the purpose of making repairs or ascertaining their condition is shown, and the tenant had the right of possession and enjoyment of the estate. Porter v. Hubbard, 134 Mass. 233; Kearnes v. Cullen, 183 Mass. 298, 67 N. E. 243; Sheehan v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 356, 73 N. E. 544. Where the lessor, whether the letting is by parol or by demise, reserves no right to enter upon the premises to make repairs, or to ascertain if they are properly used, he is not liable for injuries to strangers caused by the tenant's negligence in permitting them to become defective, or arising from the manner in which they are used. Frischberg v. Hurter, 173 Mass. 22, 52 N. E. 1086, and cases cited; Clapp v. Donaldson, 195 Mass. 39, 80 N. E. 486; Neas v. Lowell, 193 Mass. 441, 79 N. E. 810; Coman v. Alles, 198 Mass. 99, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 950, 83 N. E. 1097. The unrestricted use and control having been given to the tenant, the duty devolves upon him so to use the property as not to cause an injury to those who may be lawfully upon the premises, or to travelers on the highway upon which the estate abuts. Clifford v. Atlantic Cotton Mills, 146 Mass. 47, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

4 Am. St. Rep. 279, 15 N. E. 84. But if the unsafe condition of the sidewalk could have been attributed to the tenant's negligence, the defendant as owner also would be liable, if, at the time of letting, the conductor and spout were adjusted to form a permanent arrangement for the continued discharge of drainage. Clifford v. Atlantic Cotton Mills, 146 Mass. 47, 49, 4 Am. St. Rep. 279, 15 N. E. 84; Lufkin v. Zane, 157 Mass. 117, 122, 17 L.R.A. 251, 34 Am. St. Rep. 262, 31 N. E. 757. The connection of the spout with the conductor was not in dispute, and it was for the jury to decide, upon conflicting evidence, as to the location of the outlet or place of discharge. If they determined that when the tenant entered into occupation the spout projected beyond the fence, through which a hole had been cut and fitted for the purpose, they would be justified in finding, further, that the combination was used and had been designed by the defendant for the disposal of melting snow and water coming from the roof. The defendant let the property for hire with knowledge of these conditions, and if the formation of ice might have been prevented by the tenant's detaching the spout, or in some way confining the overflow within the inclosure, the premises were so constructed as to be permanently dangerous to travelers. Having created a continuing nuisance to which the plaintiff's injury was attributable, the defendant could not relieve himself from responsibility by leasing the premises, when he must have contemplated they would remain and be used in the same manner as when rented. McDonough v. Gilman, 3 Allen, 264, 267, 80 Am. Dec. 72; Prentiss v. Wood, 132 Mass. 486, 488; Jackman v. Arlington Mills, 137 Mass. 277; Dalay v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38, 41, 1 Am. St. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 841; Lufkin v. Zane, supra. The verdict for the defendant was improperly ordered, and there must be a new trial.

Exceptions sustained.

HAZEL KATHAN et al., Respts.,

v.

E. G. COMSTOCK et al., Appts.

(140 Wis. 427, 122 N. W. 1044.)

Tax — adverse title.

1. Exclusive possession by the owner of the record title for three years after the execution of a tax deed for the property extinguishes the tax title.

Fraud — positive representations — ignorance.

2. A representation by one claiming a tax title to real estate, that the title is perfect,—made for the purpose of securing a conveyance in form by the true owners, for a nominal consideration,—which can only be true in case the land was vacant and unoccupied during the period necessary to perfect the title under the statute, involves a representation that it was so in fact; and if such representation was false, the one making it is guilty of fraud in law, which will entitle the grantor to a rescission of the contract, although the one making it had no knowledge on the subject, and believed it to be true.

Same — duty to know.

3. One who makes representations to another of material facts, for the purpose of inducing that other to enter into contractual relations with him, and which are liable to accomplish the purpose without want of ordinary care on the part of such other, is bound at his peril to know whereof he speaks.

Judgment — separation of relief — evidence.

4. One who desires a decree setting aside a deed of real estate because a portion of it was secured by false representations to apply only to such portion, upon return of a proportionate part of the purchase money, must offer evidence which will enable the court to make an apportionment, and upon his failure to do so, the court may deal with the transaction as an entirety.

(October 26, 1909.)

Note. — Fraud: may fraud be predicated of misstatement as to title to real property.

Executed contracts.—when false statement is made with knowledge of its falsity, or without regard to its truth or falsity.

A false statement as to the character of title to real estate, when made as a fact, or without regard to its truth or falsity, for the purpose of inducing another to purchase the same, constitutes actionable fraud, where a sale is induced thereby in reliance thereon, and injury results therefrom, and will entitle the vendee to maintain an action for the fraud and deceit, or a rescission of the sale, if he acts with reasonable promptness after the discovery of the fraud. *Linn v. The representation, to be actionable fraud, must be made as a matter of fact rather than of opinion, although, of course, any representation as to title is, in part, at least, an opinion. Thus, a representation by a vendor that he had an arrangement with the owner of certain real estate which enabled him to sell it as his own, and that he had examined the title, and it was perfect, and that he would be responsible for it, and that there was no need of any abstract, constituted a fraud entitling the purchaser to recover damages, the representations being false as to the title. Reynolds v. Franklin, supra.

In Buchanan v. Burnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 114 S. W. 406, affirmed in 102 Tex. 492, 132 Am. St. Rep. 900, 119 S. W. 1141, the court asserted that an unqualified expression of ownership—of absolute title—is an affirmation of fact, notwithstanding it may involve an opinion as to the legal sufficiency of the evidences of such title; and added: "It is well settled that false representations of the vendor affecting the validity and sufficiency of his title, upon which the vendee had a right to rely, and did rely, and which induced the vendee to make the purchase, constitute such legal fraud as authorizes a court of equity to rescind the contract and decree a return of the purchase money paid."

In Burns v. Dockray, 156 Mass. 135, 30 N. E. 551, the court remarked that no doubt even a positive statement that a title is good involves somewhat a matter of opinion, but it also imports that there are no facts that affect its validity within the knowledge of the vendor making the representation, and if a purchaser relies upon the statement, he is entitled to recover damages as for fraud.

A false representation by the vendor that he personally knows that the title to certain real estate is good, as he has made an examination of the records of the title, thereby inducing the other party to refrain from taking steps to inform himself as to the title, is fraudulent, and entitles a pur-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Shawano County, quieting title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Equitable action to set aside deeds to real estate and quiet title.

The issues passed upon in closing the case by judgment may be concisely stated, as follows: The title to the particular land in question and others, aggregating twenty-two tracts, was in Joseph Kathan at the time of his death, May 26, 1901. He died intestate, leaving as his only heirs his widow, Hattie P. Kathan, and three minor children, the plaintiffs herein. The title to said land was vested in them on the death of Mr. Kathan, subject to six tax deeds thereon in the name of defendant Pier. The title to the particular tract was vested in Mr. Kathan many years before he died. It was occupied and used by him, in the main, as a wood lot and for cutting and removing timber therefrom, continuously, for several years after his ownership commenced. During such time a small part was cleared, cultivated, and inclosed by a fence. The land was thereafter used by Mr. Kathan continuously, down to 1897, in connection with an adjoining tract on which he owned and operated a brickyard. It was thereafter occupied continuously, down to the time of the commencement of the action, by defendant Eagle River Brick Company, in connection with the brickyard 40, under an agreement with chaser relying thereon to an action for damages if he suffers injury thereby. Jenkinson v. Stoneman, supra.

But see Conwell v. Clifford, 45 Ind. 392, which holds that a false representation that designated parties had a good title to certain land, and reliance thereon by a purchaser thereof without knowledge of the facts, is no defense to an action by the person making the representations upon notes given for the purchase price. The court said that the allegation that the plaintiff fraudulently represented that certain parties had a good title to the land did not show the representation of a fact, but simply a legal opinion.

A false statement by a vendor that the title was a fee-simple title, when in fact it was only an estate for life or years, is not a valid defense to an action at law by the vendor upon notes given for the purchase price. Howard v. Witham, 2 Me. 390.

It is fraudulent for a vendor of real estate falsely to represent that the land he is selling is part of a tract of land granted to him by the United States government, and that he is the sole owner of the tract. Barnes v. Union P. R. Co. 4 C. C. A. 199, 12 U. S. App. 1, 54 Fed. 87.

And when a vendee, in purchasing land, declares himself a stranger to it, and that he is relying on the representations of the vendor as to title, it constitutes a fraud entitling the vendee to avoid the sale, for the vendor to represent that his tax title to the land is good, that he has been where the land lies, and has looked at it, and found it all right, such representation being equivalent to saying that the land was unseated and subject to be sold for taxes at the time of the assessment upon which it was subsequently sold. Babcock v. Case, supra.

A vendor who falsely represents that a deed executed in blank and delivered by him to the vendee is a valid conveyance of the real estate therein mentioned is guilty of fraud, and the vendee, who has exchanged personal property therefor, may maintain trover to recover it, it appearing that the deed conveyed no title to the premises. Skinner v. Brigham, 126 Mass. 132.

It constitutes fraud for an heir falsely to represent that he is the owner of a one-third interest in the estate left by his father, if he thereby induces another to purchase his interest in reliance upon such representation, the representation being false in that the heir had no interest in the real estate, because of his indebtedness to the estate. Craig v. Hamilton, 118 Ind. 565, 21 N. E. 315.

A false representation by the vendor of real estate that the leases thereof held by tenants in possession are not absolute in terms, but are conditional, and inoperative in the event of the sale of the property, constitutes actionable fraud. Wilson's Appeal, supra.

A materially false representation by the vendor of real estate as to easements or appurtenances to land, made with the intention of deceiving the purchaser, and which actually does deceive him, amounts to a fraud which will sustain an action for deceit, if injury result therefrom. Fenley v. Moody, supra.

The vendor of real estate is guilty of actionable fraud in falsely representing that he was the owner of water from a creek adjoining the property sold, which, in its natural course, flowed over, upon, and through the land, and that the vendee could and would have this water for agricultural purposes, where he had previously parted with such rights. Wilson v. Higbee, 62 Fed. 723.

A representation that there is no encumbrance upon real estate, if false to the knowledge of the person making it, constitutes actionable fraud if relied upon by the vendee, to his injury. Carpenter v. Wright; Haight v. Hayt; and Jenkinson v. Stoneman,—supra.

A vendor of real estate who represents that the title thereto is all right is liable to the vendee for injuries occasioned to him by reason of an encumbrance upon the property of which the vendor had knowledge at the time of the representation. Riley v. Bell, 120 Iowa, 618, 95 N. W. 170.

The purchaser of real estate has a right to rely upon the representation of the vendor as to the amount due on an encumthe owner to convey the same to it for $200, as soon as cleared of back taxes. The plaintiffs did not know of the occupancy aforesaid till after the conveyance hereafter mentioned, to defendant Comstock. Some time subsequent to the death of Mr. Kathan, under an agreement with one Colman, county judge of Vilas county, that title to all the lands should be vested in one George, in the interest of plaintiffs, and the particular tract then be by him conveyed to the brick company, of which Colman was a stockholder, proceedings were had, in form in the county court of Vilas county, but in fact in the county of Shawano, resulting in such title being, in form, so vested, whereupon George conveyed the particular tract to said brick company, pursuant to such agreement.

The first of the aforesaid tax deeds was made and recorded in May, 1889, and the last one in May, 1898. After the proceedings aforesaid, in form vesting the title in George, defendant Pier represented and caused to be represented to plaintiffs that the statute of limitations had run in favor of her tax deeds, effectually divesting the title to said lands from plaintiffs, and vesting the same in her. She did that for the purpose of inducing them to convey, in form, the twenty-two tracts of land to defendant Comstock for the sum of $30. The particular tract then, and at the time of the commencement of this action, was worth at least $200. Relying upon such representations, which were in fact false, the tax deed titles as to such particular land having been brance upon the property purchased, and it is actionable for the vendor falsely to misstate the amount, with knowledge that the vendee is relying upon his representation in that regard. Hutchinson v. Gorman, 71 Ark. 305, 73 S. W. 793; Loucks v. Taylor, 23 Ind. App. 245, 55 N. E. 238; Short v. Cure, 100 Mich. 418, 59 N. W. 173; Griffeth v. Hanks, 46 Tex. 217.

Representations by the vendor of real estate as to the balance due on a mortgage on the real estate sold, and also as to what the mortgagee, a building and loan association, had represented to him would be the number of payments still required to extinguish the debt, are not statements of opinion, but are representations of fact, which the purchaser is entitled to rely upon, and if false, to recover damages suffered thereby. Loucks v. Taylor, supra.

Where the vendor knows, or may reasonably be supposed to know, material facts concerning the title which are unknown to the vendee, and which cannot otherwise be ascertained by him at the time and place of sale, and he informs the vendor that he relies solely upon the truth of his statements and representations in regard to the title, and the vendor makes statements relative thereto which, if true, would constitute a good title, and the vendee, relying thereon, purchases the property, if the statements afterwards prove to be untrue and the title bad, he is entitled, to the extent of the failure of title, to surrender the property, and defend against an action brought for the purchase money; and under such circumstances, it is immaterial whether the vendor knew that the representations made by him were false, or whether he made them without knowing whether they were true or not. Altgelt v. Mernitz, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 397, 83 S. W. 891.

In Barnes v. Union P. R. Co. 4 C. C. A. 199, 12 U. S. App. 1, 54 Fed. 87, the court said that even if it could be assumed that the vendor had no actual knowledge of the fact misrepresented, this would not relieve him from liability, where he represented the fact as of his own knowledge that the land was within a grant, and that he was the owner of it; and added that if he knew this to be false, that was fraud of the most positive kind; if he did not know whether the statement was true or not, the positive statement of his own knowledge that it was so was a false and fraudulent statement that he did know this to be a fact; and as these statements caused the same damage to the vendee, the vendor was equally liable in either event.

In Hutchinson v. Gorham, supra, it was said that it was sufficient to entitle the vendee of real estate to maintain an action for deceit against the vendor for false representations as to title, for the vendee to show that he was misled by such misrepresentations, and that the vendor made the representations with knowledge of their falsity, or that, having no knowledge with reference thereto, he asserted that they were true, with the intention of deceiving the vendee.

—false statements honestly or mistakenly made.

A vendor of real estate who makes false statements of fact as to the character of his title is guilty of a constructive fraud which will entitle the vendee, relying thereon to his injury, to avoid the purchase, even though, in making the statements, the vendor did not know of their falsity, and believed in the truth thereof. Lanier v. Hill, 25 Ala. 554; Bailey v. Jordan, 32 Ala. 50; Lindsey v. Veasy, 62 Ala. 421; Kiefer v. Rogers, 19 Minn. 32, Gil. 14; Parham v. Randolph, 4 How. (Miss.) 435, 35 Am. Dec. 403; Rimer v. Dugan, 39 Miss. 477, 77 Am. Dec. 687; Zunker v. Kuehn, 113 Wis. 421, 88 N. W. 605.

An executed sale of real estate may be rescinded in chancery upon the application of the vendee, who believed and acted upon a false representation as to title; and it is immaterial whether the vendor, in making it, knew it to be false; if the misrepresentation is in relation to a material matter, and a party is misled by it, the court said that the misrepresentation, although it may be innocent, operates as injuriously as if extinguished by the statute of limitations, the same having been occupied, as aforesaid, such proceedings were taken in the circuit court for Shawano county that the title of plaintiffs in all the lands, for the consideration aforesaid, was vested in Comstock, the deed to that effect being duly recorded. That was accomplished in the interest of said Pier, so that she might control the patent title as well as the tax title to all said lands. The next day after the conveyance to said Comstock, said Pier caused the particular tract to be mortgaged to her daughter, the defendant McIntosh, ostensibly to secure $250, but in fact to give her standing to commence an action to quiet the title as against the brick company. Such action was commenced, and during the proceedings therein, plaintiffs became possessed of information as to the possession aforesaid extinguishing the tax title claim. Thereupon this action was brought against all parties adversely interested, to vacate said deeds made by plaintiffs, and the mortgage as well, establish the title to said particular land in plaintiffs, according to the facts, and remove all clouds existing thereon, created by the deed to George, the deed by him to the brick company, the deed to Comstock, and the mortgage.

On such facts judgment was awarded to plaintiffs wholly annulling the deed to Comstock, conditioned upon the consideration paid by him, as aforesaid, being paid into court for his use, and decreeing that the possession by the brick company was lawful, it had been by design; and upon clearest principles of morality a court of equity should not only refuse to enforce, but should rescind, a contract made under such circumstances. Lanier v. Hill, supra.

It is immaterial that the vendor honestly believed the statements he made as to his title to real estate, if in fact they were untrue, where he made them with knowledge that the vendee was relying upon them in making the purchase. Rimer v. Dugan, supra.

A vendee may rescind a purchase of real estate where the vendor falsely represented his title to be good, if he relied thereon in making the purchase, and it is immaterial that the representations were made through an honest mistake. Bailey v. Jordan, supra.

Compare with Spence v. Duren, 3 Ala. 251, which holds that expressions by a vendor that his title is good are not fraudulent, even though acted upon by the vendee to his injury, unless it is shown that the vendor knew that a better title existed.

The representation by a vendor that he has a good record title to land he proposes to sell constitutes fraud if untrue, and relied upon by the vendee in making the purchase, even though the vendor believed it to be true, and had a record title good as to part of the property, and a good title to the balance by adverse possession. Zunker v. Kuehn, supra.

A vendor of real estate who represents the land sold to be a freehold when, as a matter of fact, it was only a copyhold, is guilty of a fraud upon the vendee, who purchases in reliance upon the representation, which entitles the vendee to a rescission of the sale; and this is true even though the vendor made the representation believing it to be true. Such a representation is made at the peril of the vendor, as he takes it upon himself to warrant his own belief of the truth of that which he asserts. Hart v. Swaine, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 42.

Where the owner of property, by reason of his gross negligence, is ignorant of a second mortgage thereon, and sells same to another, representing that there is but one mortgage upon it, which statement is relied upon by the purchaser, such misrepresentation, though mistakenly made, constitutes a fraud, entitling the vendee to a rescission. Kiefer v. Rogers, supra.

An untrue representation or a concealment in relation to land, either as to quality or title, by which a purchaser is imposed upon, is fraudulent, and it is immaterial whether the misrepresentations are intentional or not; if the vendor undertook to make such statements as facts, he is responsible for them. Parham v. Randolph, supra.

False representations by a vendor as to his seisin and right to convey real estate entitle the vendee to a rescission where he is deceived thereby, and induced to purchase same, and it is immaterial whether the representations complained of were made knowingly or ignorantly. Lindsey v. Veasey, supra.

In Buchanan v. Burnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 114 S. W. 406, affirmed in 102 Tex. 492, 132 Am. St. Rep. 900, 119 S. W. 1141, the rule was also declared that whether a representation of title by a vendor was made with or without knowledge of its falsity was immaterial; that in either event the vendor was bound to make reparation for the injury.

If the vendor of real estate, in selling same, asserts that the property is unencumbered, which statement is untrue, although he believes it to be true, he is nevertheless liable to the vendee in an action for deceit. "The assertion is equivalent to an assumption of its truth." Piche v. Robins, 24 R. I. 325, 53 Atl. 92.

But generally in an action for false representation by a vendor as to the title to property, it is necessary to establish the representation, its falsity, the intent to deceive, and reliance upon the representation by the vendee, and injury therefrom; and where the evidence does not warrant the conclusion that the vendor of real estate intended to deceive the vendee as to the title, but rather establishes that he believed that he was in fact the owner of the premises, the mere fact that there is an apbut under a license revokable at the pleasure of plaintiffs. Costs were awarded in plaintiffs' favor in one bill against Comstock, Pier, and McIntosh, and in favor of the brick company against the same parties.

Any actual possession by the former owner during the statutory limitation period destroys the constructive adverse possession of the owner of the tax title.

As the land in dispute was occupied so as to invalidate the tax deeds, and as the misrepresentations of the holder thereof induced the execution of the deed in suit, such deed must be set aside on the ground of fraud.

parent cloud upon the title does not justify a finding of an intention to defraud on the part of the vendor, since fraud must be proven, and cannot be presumed. Hence, where a vendor left his deed with an agent to be recorded, and the agent procured a deed of the same date to himself, which he recorded, and did not record the vendor's deed, which fact the vendor did not ascertain until some time later, when he caused his deed to be recorded, and then sold the land, representing that he owned it, such representation is not fraudulent. Buchall v. Higgins, 109 App. Div. 607, 96 N. Y. Supp. 241.

In order to constitute fraud there must be a misrepresentation of fact with intent to deceive, and a reliance thereon in entering into the contract; and a grantor, by merely giving a warranty deed of land which he had previously conveyed to another, is not per se guilty of fraud within this rule. Brown v. Manning, 3 Minn. 35, Gil. 13, 74 Am. Dec. 736.

The fact that, in a general conversation with a vendee with reference to real estate thereafter sold to him, the vendor referred to the same as "my property," is not sufficient to establish fraud on the part of the vendor, entitling the vendee to a rescission of the purchase, although he testified that he relied thereon. Reuter v. Lawe, 86 Wis. 106, 56 N. W. 472.

—where fraudulent representation is made by a person without interest.

The fact that a person who makes a fraudulent representation had no personal interest in the sale of real estate, the title of which he misrepresented, and that he received no portion of the purchase price, does not relieve him from liability to the vendee, where the latter relied upon the representation. Carpenter v. Wright, 52 Kan. 221, 34 Pac. 798; Eames v. Morgan, 37 Ill. 260.

But mere silence of a third person who happens to be present at a sale of real estate does not render him liable to the vendee, although such third person knew of 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a defect in the title to the property purchased. Littlejohn v. Drennon, 95 Ga. 743, 22 S. E. 657.

An owner of land, who executed a deed thereof, leaving the name of the grantee blank, thereby making it possible for the holder of the deed to deceive an innocent person as to his title, is liable to such third person for the fraud practised upon him, even though they never met. Baker v. Hallam, 103 Iowa, 43, 72 N. W. 419.

—expression of opinion.

A mere expression of opinion by the vendor of real estate as to his title, where based upon a state of facts truthfully stated, or equally within the knowledge of both parties, does not constitute fraud, even though the opinion is not well founded, a vendee not being entitled to rely thereon. Saltonstall v. Gordon, 33 Ala. 149; Martin v. Wharton, 38 Ala. 637; Fitzhugh v. Davis, 46 Ark. 337; Choate v. Hyde, 129 Cal. 580, 62 Pac. 118; Drake v. Latham, 50 Ill. 270; Conwell v. Clifford, 45 Ind. 392; Howard v. Witham, 2 Me. 390; Hoyt v. Bradley, 27 Me. 242; Perkins v. Trinka, 30 Minn. 241, 15 N. W. 115; Herman v. Hall, 140 Mo. 270, 41 S. W. 733; Fellows v. Evans, 33 Or. 33, 53 Pac. 491.

Thus, in Choate v. Hyde, supra, the court said that an expression of opinion by the vendor of real estate as to the sufficiency of his title was not actionable fraud, where the means of information respecting the title were equally accessible to both parties, or the facts upon which the opinion was based were within the knowledge of both parties.

And in Fellows v. Evans, supra, the court said that where all the facts relating to the vendor's title to the land are fully communicated by him to the vendee prior to the purchase, his opinion, based upon such facts, that his title is perfect, does not constitute actionable fraud.

The distinction between a statement of fact as to title and an opinion based upon an understood state of facts is made in Herman v. Hall, supra, wherein the court

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The findings of fact do not appear, at any point, contrary to the clear preponderance of the evidence. Therefore, by a familiar principle, they must be regarded as verities and the judgment based thereon right, if the conclusions of law are warranted.

said that a mere expression of opinion by the vendor that his title is good will not amount to a fraud; but a statement of a fact or facts upon which such statement is based, when made for the purpose of inducing another to act upon it, implies that the person who makes it knows such fact to exist, and that he speaks from his own knowledge; and if the fact does not exist, it constitutes a fraud, entitling the vendee, if injured thereby, to rescind the sale.

A statement by a vendor that his wife, if she should survive him, would be entitled to dower only in land of which he died seised and possessed, does not constitute actionable fraud, although, in reliance thereon, a person purchases real estate without having the wife join therein to bar her dower. Martin v. Wharton, supra.

An expression of opinion by the vendor of real estate that his tax title thereto is valid does not constitute fraud, where he makes no representation as to the facts upon the validity of which the title depends. Drake v. Latham, supra.

And it does not constitute fraud for the seller of a tax title upon property of another to represent in good faith that he has a valid title to the land, and that he will recover possession thereof in a proceeding he has already commenced for that purpose, even though the opinion is unfounded, and the legal owner of the land, in reliance thereon, purchases such tax title. Perkins v. Trinka, supra.

It does not constitute fraud which will entitle a vendee to rescind a purchase of real estate for the vendor honestly to represent that he has a good title to the property sold, where he states that his opinion is based upon a statement of fact made to him by the former owner, to whom he refers the vendee, who consults him in relation thereto before buying. Hawkins v. Wells, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 360, 43 S. W. 816.

A representation of title by a vendor of real estate is not fraudulent when honestly based upon an abstract of title furnished the vendee, where no other means are used to inspire confidence in such assertion. Botsford v. Wilson, 75 Ill. 132.

Silence as to, or concealment of, defects in title.

The intentional concealment by a vendor of real estate of defects in his title constitutes actionable fraud, where, to his knowledge, the vendee purchases in ignorance of such defect, and is injured thereby. Cullum v. Bank of Alabama, 4 Ala. 21, 37 Am. Dec. 725; Bryant v. Boothe, 30 Ala. 311, 68 Am. Dec. 117; Prout v. Roberts, 32 Ala. 427; Strong v. Lord, 107 Ill. 25; Devers v. Dallah, 6 T. B. Mon. 102; Johnson v. Pryor, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 243; Ingram v. Morgan, 4 Humph. 66, 40 Am. Dec. 626; Napier v. Elam, 6 Yerg. 108; Paulsrud v. Peterson, 109 Minn. 524, 121 N. W. 898, 122 N. W. 874.

In Cullum v. Bank of Alabama, supra, the court remarked that "in all cases of purchase there is a trust and confidence reposed by the purchaser in the vendor that the estate is not impaired in value or encumbered by any act done by him; indeed, by offering to sell an estate the vendor virtually represents it as not encumbered by himself, or, if encumbered, he will free it before the sale is executed; and if he wishes to discharge himself from the consequences of this implied representation, it lies with him to show that the purchaser was informed or otherwise knew of the encumbrance."

An action in tort may be maintained against a vendor and others interested in the sale of certain real estate for falsely representing as a matter of fact that the title to the real estate is good, they being in a position to know, where they also concealed the fact that a certain person was insane, where such insanity clouded the title. Burns v. Dockray, 156 Mass. 135, 30 N. E. 551.

The vendee of real estate is entitled to rescind his purchase for false representation by the vendor as to title, although he

If the particular tract of land was in the actual possession of Kathan, deceased, for the full three years after execution and recording of the last tax deed, as found by the trial court, and it seems, as above indicated, that such must be taken as the fact, the tax titles were thereby extinguished, leaving Kate Pier without any interest in the land whatever at the time she represented to the Kathan heirs that she had the whole title under her tax deeds, for the purpose of inducing them to part with the patent title to Comstock. Jones v. Collins, 16 Wis. 595; Pulford v. Whicher, 76 Wis. 555, 45 N. W. 418.

It is the settled law, not disputed at all by appellants, that actual or constructive possession of land under a tax deed for the full period of three years is necessary for operation of the statute of limitations, and that interruption of the mere constructive possession created by recording a tax deed of vacant and unoccupied land, by actual possession for any period by the former owner within the three years after such recording, turns the statute of limitations in favor of the former owner, which, if not interrupted by action on the part of the tax title claimant, or actual possession by him within the three years after the recording of the tax deed, extinguishes all rights under such deed. Cornell University v. Mead, 80 Wis. 387, 49 N. W. 815; Midlothian Iron Min. Co. v. Belknap, 108 Wis. 198, 84 N. W. 169.

No question is raised but what the proceedings whereby the title to the land in was furnished an abstract of the property, where examination thereof would have shown his title to be perfect, the vendor knowingly concealing an outstanding adverse title, not shown by the abstract. Anderson v. Buck, 66 Iowa, 490, 24 N. W. 10.

A vendor, after having conveyed away the coal underlying certain land, is guilty of a fraud entitling the vendee to a rescission of the purchase thereof, where he conceals the fact of having made such conveyance, and contracts to convey the land in fee simple, without any encumbrances or restrictions. Vernam v. Wilson, 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 257.

Compare with Wilson v. Higbee, 62 Fed. 723, wherein the court said that the vendor of real estate, who had disposed of the right to use the waters of the adjoining creek for agricultural purposes, in a subsequent sale of the land might remain silent as to whether the water had been previously disposed of or conveyed to other parties, and if he had done so, he would have been safe, and added: "The seller may let the buyer cheat himself ad libitum, but must not actively assist him in cheating himself."

In order that the concealment of a defect in a vendor's title be fraudulent, it must appear that he had actual knowledge thereof; mere constructive notice is not sufficient. Wilde v. Gibson, 1 H. L. Cas. 605.

Silence of the vendor in the sale of land is not fraudulent, although there are outstanding adverse titles to the property, where it does not appear that, at the time, he had knowledge thereof. Harland v. Eastland, 3 Hardin (Ky.) 590.

In some jurisdictions a vendee is not permitted to rely upon the mere silence of the vendor as to his title, and make no inquiry or effort to investigate same. Thus, in Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 352, it was held that mere silence as to a mortgage by the person holding a bond for the conveyance of the land covered thereby at the time of selling to another is not a fraudulent concealment, entitling the vendee to relief, in the absence of any practices to conceal such mortgage from the purchaser, who might have ascertained its existence by the exercise of ordinary diligence.

Mere silence by a vendor as to a judgment which is a lien on land which he is selling is not fraudulent as to a vendee who makes no inquiry in reference thereto. Ward v. Packard, 18 Cal. 392.

The mere silence of a third person who happens to be present at the time of a sale of real estate as to an encumbrance thereon of which he has knowledge does not constitute actionable fraud, rendering him liable to the purchaser. Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 352.

A purchaser of real estate who is informed that others own the property she is purchasing cannot rely blindly upon her belief that the vendor owns it and make no investigations in relation thereto, and thereafter hold the vendor for fraud, on the ground that he concealed his want of title. Grosjean v. Galloway, 82 App. Div. 380, 81 N. Y. Supp. 871.

Executory contracts.

A purchaser of real estate under an executory contract to purchase is generally held entitled to refuse to carry out the contract, and recover the amount paid on the purchase price, where he entered into the contract in reliance upon false and fraudulent representations of the vendor as to his title, or concealments by him of defects therein. Smith v. Robertson, 23 Ala. 312 (fraudulent representations); Norris v. Hay, 149 Cal. 605, 87 Pac. 380 (fraudulent representations); Thomas v. Coultas, 76 Ill. 493 (fraudulent representations); Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 365 (concealment of defects in title); Glass v. Brown, 6 T. B. Mon. 356 (fraudulent representation); Gunby v. Sluter, 44 Md. 237 (false or mistaken representation); Inness v. Willis, 16 Jones & S. 188 (fraudulent concealment of want of title); Ryder v. Wall, 29 Misc. 377, 60 N. Y. Supp. 535 (misrepresentation as to ability to convey); Lloyd v. Farrell, 48 Pa. 73, 86 Am. Dec. 563 (concealment by vendor of fact that others had an interest in the property he contracted to convey); Woods v. North, 6 Humph. 309, 44 Am. Dec. 312 (agreement by executor to convey, where he was with-question was conveyed to George, and by him to the brick company, were void. It is insisted, however, that the representation made by Kate Pier as to her tax titles having extinguished the Kathan title was not a representation of fact, but was a mere legal opinion of the effect of the tax deeds, and so was not fatal to the Comstock deed.

We are unable to sustain the contention that the representation was a mere opinion, grounded on such pure mistake of law as equity will not relieve from. She knew, or ought to have known, that such a representation, in all reasonable probability, was false, unless the land was vacant and unoccupied at the time of the recording of her tax deeds, and so continued during the entire statutory period of three years. Therefore she knew, or ought to have known, that such representation, by necessary implication, carried the idea that such vacancy and nonoccupancy had existed. So the representation was false and was of a fact material to the transaction which it operated to bring about.

It may be that Mrs. Pier did not know there was occupancy of the land, preventing the bar of the statute from running in favor of her tax titles. It may be that there was no moral turpitude characterizing the transaction. Whether there was or was not is not material. In this class of cases fraud in law is just as effective as fraud in fact. If one, in negotiating with another in contractual matters, makes misrepresentations of fact material to the transaction, for out power to do so); Mullins v. Jones, 1 Head, 517 (misrepresentation as to title); Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529, 42 Am. Dec. 447 (misrepresentation as to title); Topp v. White, 12 Heisk. 165 (misrepresentation as to title); Spencer v. Sandusky, 46 W. Va. 582, 33 S. E. 221 (fraudulent representation and intentional concealment of defect in title); Davis v. Lee, 52 Wash. 330, 132 Am. St. Rep. 973, 100 Pac. 752 (want of title in vendor); Adams v. Reed, 11 Utah, 480, 40 Pac. 720.

In Davis v. Lee, supra, the court said that "if a vendor who contracts to sell land has no title, or fails or refuses to furnish a proper title at the time the vendee is entitled to it, the latter can maintain an action to recover the purchase price. The vendor has assumed the attitude of ownership, and a failure to perform is in law a misrepresentation for which an action will lie."

Necessity of exercising diligence to discover truth of representation.

Where the vendor of real estate makes representations as of fact with reference to the title thereto, the vendee has a right to rely thereon; and having such right, there devolves upon him no legal duty to search the records or otherwise exercise diligence in investigating the truth of the representations. Hence it is no defense that the vendee might have ascertained the falsity of the representations by the search of the records, or by seeking other accessible information. Carpenter v. Wright, 52 Kan. 221, 34 Pac. 798; Young v. Hopkins, 6 T. B. Mon. 18; Campbell v. Whittingham, 5 J. J. Marsh. 96, 20 Am. Dec. 241; Pryse v. McGuire, 81 Ky. 608; Parham v. Randolph, 5 Miss. 435, 35 Am. Dec. 403; Kiefer v. Rogers, 19 Minn. 32, Gil. 14; Blumenfeld v. Stine, 96 App. Div. 160, 89 N. Y. Supp. 85; Wilson's Appeal, 109 Pa. 606, 7 Atl. 88; Vernam v. Wilson, 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 257; Griffeth v. Hanks, 46 Tex. 217; Morris v. Brown, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 266, 85 S. W. 1015.

fraud in the sale thereof by means of false representations relating to the title, the court said that the vendor had no cause to complain of the charge to the jury, that it was the duty of the vendee to exercise ordinary care to ascertain the title to land he was about to purchase; and added that such instruction was much more favorable to the vendor than he was entitled to.

The vendee has the right to rely upon the representations of the vendor as to his right to the use of water from a creek adjoining the premises purchased, the facts in relation thereto being within the knowledge of the vendor, and unknown to the vendee. In such circumstances the vendee may rely upon the representations, although other means and opportunity are afforded him to ascertain the truth; he is not bound, under the law, to go to the expense of verifying the truth or falsity of the statements, and the vendor is estopped from asserting that the vendee might easily have ascertained the truth if he had examined the records of the county where the land was situated. The liability of the vendor arises from his own fraud and falsehood, and is not in any manner affected by the question of diligence upon the part of the vendee. Wilson v. Higbee, 62 Fed. 723.

In Simmang v. Harris (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 786, the court remarked that there could be no relief for a vendee who had been defrauded in the purchase of land by false representations as to title, unless he satisfactorily established that he had been prevented from investigating the records and informing himself by the fraudulent acts of his vendors, and added: "If appellant was induced by the fraud of his vendors to forego an examination of the records, and acted on their representation as to the records, and that representation was false, he would, notwithstanding his lack of business prudence, be entitled to a rescission of the contract."

And in Ward v. Packard, 18 Cal. 391, the court said that it was not the policy of the law to encourage laches, and if means of information were known to the purchaser, and within his reach, he could not afterwards al-

the purpose of inducing such other to act thereon, and such other reasonably does so act to his prejudice, he may avoid the result on the ground of fraud, actual or constructive,—the latter really involving, generally, mere mistake of fact,—and may have the aid of equity jurisdiction to that end. It is not a sufficient answer to the claim of such other for such person to say he made the representations honestly, for it is, in law and equity, as regards avoiding such a transaction, his duty to know whereof he speaks, or not to speak at all as of his knowledge. This court has many times spoken on that question. Davis v. Nuzum, 72 Wis. 439, 1 L.R.A. 774, 40 N. W. 497; McKinnon v. Vollmar, 75 Wis. 82, 6 L.R.A. 121, 17 Am. St. Rep. 178, 43 N. W. 800;

lege his ignorance as a ground of fraud, unless by deceit or misrepresentations he had been actually misled.

A misrepresentation by a vendor as to his title or right to convey real estate does not constitute fraud, where, prior to the execution of a conveyance thereof, the title deeds to the property, which indicated that others were the owners, were placed by the vendor in the hands of the vendee for examination. Warner Elevator Co. v. Guthrie, 7 Ohio N. P. 200.

Compare with Buchanan v. Burnett (Tex. Civ. App.) 114 S. W. 406, affirmed in 102 Tex. 492, 132 Am. St. Rep. 900, 119 S. W. 1141, wherein it appeared that the vendees were given an opportunity to, and that they did partially, examine an abstract of the vendor's title and certain of his deeds, and it further appeared that the complete examination of these papers would have disclosed the defect in the vendor's title complained of. It was, however, held that this fact did not prevent the vendees from relying upon the representations of the vendor, as to his title, and that having such right to rely, they were under no duty to examine the papers at hand to ascertain the truth of the representations. The court said: "Appellees were not bound to exercise diligence to discover the falsity of appellant's representations, if he made them as charged, and appellees, without knowledge of their falsity, . . . believed them to be true, and they constituted a material inducement to appellees to enter into the contract, it was sufficient, notwithstanding greater care and diligence on appellees' part might have resulted in a discovery of the fraud."

In some jurisdictions the rule is asserted that the purchaser of real estate may rely upon the representations of the vendor as to title, where he has exercised ordinary care in investigating the truth of the representations.

Thus, in Younge v. Harris, 2 Ala. 108, the court said that a person induced to purchase land by the fraudulent representation of the vendor in relation to his title, the falsehood of which he had no means of ascertaining by the exercise of ordinary dili-

Gunther v. Ullrich, 82 Wis. 222, 33 Am. St. Rep. 32, 52 N. W. 88; Hart v. Moulton, 104 Wis. 349-359, 76 Am. St. Rep. 881, 80 N. W. 599; Krause v. Busacker, 105 Wis. 350, 81 N. W. 406; Zunker v. Kuehn, 113 Wis. 421, 88 N. W. 605.

The statement made to the effect that it is sufficient to put the party making misrepresentations in the wrong if he knew, or ought to have known, of their falsity, is not grounded on principles of actionable negligence, but on the idea that he who makes representations to another of material facts, for the purpose of inducing that other to enter into contractual relations with him, and which are liable to accomplish the purpose without want of ordinary care on the part of such other, is bound at his peril to know gence, may have relief in chancery for the injury suffered by him by reason thereof.

And in Steele v. Kinkle, 3 Ala. 352, the court said that equity would not aid the purchaser of real estate to rescind a contract because of fraudulent representations as to encumbrances thereon, where there had been a want of ordinary diligence upon the part of the vendee in ascertaining the truth of the representations.

Fenley v. Moody, 104 Ga. 790, 30 S. E. 1002, held that material false representations as to easements or appurtenances to land, made by the owner with intent to deceive the purchaser, and which actually did deceive him, entitled the vendee to maintain an action for deceit against the vendor, where the falsity of the representations was not ascertainable by examination of the land.

And see Andrus v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 130 U. S. 643, 32 L. ed. 1054, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, wherein the vendee, in seeking to recover for false representations by the vendor to the effect that he could place the vendee in immediate possession of the property, alleged that he used all diligence in his power to find out whether the representations were true or false, except to inspect the premises. The court denied the right to recover, upon the ground that inspection of the premises was the most natural and obvious mode of ascertaining the truth of the representations, and asserted the rule that "the law does not afford relief to one who suffers by not using the ordinary means of information, whether his neglect be attributable to indifference or credulity; nor will industrious activity in other directions to the neglect of such means be of any avail."

Where the purchaser of real estate is informed by another that he owns a portion of such real estate, and he does not believe the vendor owns any of it, she cannot rely blindly upon her belief that the vendor owns the property, and make no investigations in relation thereto. Grosjean v. Galloway, 82 App. Div. 380, 81 N. Y. Supp. 871.

A party making a false representation as to title of real estate being sold by him canwhereof he speaks. He ought to know, not because he should not act negligently, but because, under such circumstances, he should not speak to the facts at all for the purpose of inducing such other to act depending on the truthfulness of what is spoken, unless he knows that his representations are true, or expects to assume the burden of warrantor of their truthfulness. Palmer v. Goldberg, 128 Wis. 103-111, 107 N. W. 478.

That one may reasonably act, not knowing the facts involved himself, but on the faith of representations by another who desires to enter into contractual relations with him, as to conditions not presently observable, as in this case, is so elementary that not escape liability therefor on the ground that a bystander, in the presence of the purchaser, stated facts tending to show that the representation was untrue, where the purchaser nevertheless relied upon the representation of the vendor. Haight v. Hayt, 19 N. Y. 464.

As affected by the nature of the conveyance.

It is generally held that the right of a vendee to complain of fraudulent representations by a vendor as to his title to real estate sold is not affected by the fact that he received a deed containing covenants of warranty which extended to the particular defect. Diggs v. Kirby, 40 Ark. 420; Crutchfield v. Danilly, 16 Ga. 432 (vendor insolvent); Napier v. Elam, 6 Yerg. 108.

The fact that the vendee has accepted a conveyance with covenants of warranty does not deprive him of his remedy of rescission for false and fraudulent representations by the vendor as to his title. Buchanan v. Burnett, supra.

In Prout v. Roberts, 32 Ala. 427, a vendee was held entitled to rescind a purchase of real estate for fraudulent concealment by the vendor of a defect in his title, even though he had received a deed with covenants of warranty.

Compare with Andrus v. St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. 130 U. S. 643, 32 L. ed. 1054, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, which denied the right of a vendee to maintain an action for deceit practised upon him by the vendors, to induce him to purchase certain real estate by false representations to the effect that they had obtained a release of the right of all claimants to the land in question, and could put him into immediate possession. The court said that the covenant of quiet possession in the deed merged all previous representations as to the possession, and limited the liability growing out of them; and added: "Those representations were, to a great extent, if not entirely, mere expressions of confidence in the company's title and the right of possession which followed it against all intruders; the covenant was an affirmation of those statements in a form 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) we will treat it as a matter not requiring extended discussion in this opinion.

The claim is made that the court should not have set aside the entire deed to Comstock because of the false representations as to the particular tract of land. It may be that a showing might have been made which would have moved the court, as one of conscience, to require a partial restoration of the consideration paid by Comstock, and, on condition thereof, vacate the deed to him as to the one 40 only. The court, at the close of the evidence, fully acquitted Mrs. Pier of any actual intention to perpetrate a fraud upon respondents. She was found to have innocently, so far as moral turpitude is concerned, made false representations as to a material fact under such cir-admitting of no misunderstanding. . . . False and fraudulent representations upon the sale of real property may undoubtedly be ground for an action for damages when the representations relate to some matter collateral to the title of the property, and the right of possession which follows its acquisition, such as the location, quantity, quality, and condition of the land, the privileges connected with it, or the rents and profits derived therefrom. . . . Such representations by the vendor as to his having title to the premises sold may also be the ground of action where he is not in possession, and has neither color nor claim of title under any . . . judgment establishing his right to them. . . . But where the vendor holding in good faith under an instrument purporting to transfer the premises to him, or under a judicial determination of a claim to them in his favor, executes a conveyance to the purchaser, with a warranty of title and a covenant for peaceable possession, his previous representations as to the validity of his title or the right of possession which it gives are regarded, however highly colored, as mere expressions of confidence in his title, and are merged in the warranty and covenant which determined the extent of his liability."

The law exacts the same degree of truth and honesty from a vendor by quitclaim deed as from one by warranty deed. Hence, a vendor of real estate, who, by false representations as to the title, induces a purchase thereof, is not relieved from liability for the fraud by reason of the fact that the conveyance was by quitclaim deed. Ballou v. Lucas, 59 Iowa, 24, 12 N. W. 745; Atwood v. Chapman, 68 Me. 38, 28 Am. Rep. 5.

A vendee who has been defrauded in the purchase of real estate by false representations by the vendor as to his right to the use for agricultural purposes of waters from an adjoining creek is not precluded from recovering for the deceit by the fact that the conveyance to him was only a quitclaim deed. It is immaterial what covenants were in the deed; it is the fact that the plaintiff was induced by the false representations of the vendor to pay his money for the prop-cumstances as to render the resulting transaction voidable. The court concluded a statement of his views thus: "I think there is sufficient ground for a court of equity to set aside the deed so far as it relates to this tract of land." Thereupon respondents' counsel said, addressing the court: "I am perfectly willing for you to make it optional with defendants whether the whole deed shall be set aside." Then counsel for appellants addressed the court, saying: "I prefer to take the judgment of the court." Thereafter findings were filed, closing with an order for judgment as we find it.

It may be that after what occurred counsel for appellants should have offered evidence enabling the court to apportion the consideration paid by Comstock so as to require restoration to him of the equitable amount which the particular tract represented. It is the opinion of the court that they should, and that since they failed to do so, it was not error for the court to deal with the transaction as an entirety, as was done. Certainly, as the case was submitted, there was no basis for a judicial splitting up of the consideration.

In the judgment of the writer, the offer of respondents' counsel should, under the circumstances, have been regarded as consenting to restore the whole consideration as a condition of relief from the deeds and mortgage as to the one 40. That is reasonable, it seems, since only the trifling sum of $30 was involved. It is the writer's judgment that General Bragg, the able counsel who represented appellants at the trial, so understood it. He is too good a lawyer to have supposed it required consent or acceptance of an option on his part to enable the court erty that gives him a cause of action independent of the covenants in the deed. Wilson v. Higbee, 62 Fed. 723.

Necessity that injury result.

The rule is well settled that unless the vendee suffers some damage or injury from the fraudulent representation of the vendor as to title, he has no right of action either for damages for the fraud or to rescind. Merryman v. David, 31 Ill. 404; Buford v. Guthrie, 14 Bush, 690; Sonnesyn v. Akin, 14 N. D. 248, 104 N. W. 1026; Withers v. Atkinson, 1 Watts, 236.

The rule was applied in Merryman v. David, supra, as to representation by the vendor that he was the owner of land, where he made good his title prior to proceedings by the vendee. And to the same effect is Buford v. Guthrie and Sonnesyn v. Akin, supra.

In McNeny v. Campbell, 81 Neb. 754, 116 N. W. 671, modified in other respects, in 81 Neb. 761, 117 N. W. 885, it was held that misrepresentations as to title by a vendor who had no title to the land, but had an option for the purchase thereof, were not material to the contract or calculated to injure the vendee, hence did not constitute a fraud entitling him to a rescission of the contract, especially where he had not affirmatively shown his reliance upon the representations by recording his contract.

And the vendee has no claim against the vendor for false representations as to an encumbrance upon the real estate purchased, where the vendor procures a release thereof before any injury therefrom is caused the vendee. Withers v. Atkinson, supra.

The mere existence of a mortgage upon real estate at the time the vendor contracts for its sale is not of itself sufficient evidence of fraud to entitle the vendee to vacate the agreement, where the facts are such as to warrant the presumption that the vendor intended to procure the discharge of the encumbrance before the time arrived for him to convey the property to the vendee, free of encumbrance. Greenby v. Cheevers, 9 Johns. 126.

A subsequent purchaser from the original vendee, who had assumed and agreed to pay a mortgage given for the purchase price, cannot defend an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage on the ground that the vendor in the original transaction had made false and fraudulent representations as to the title to the property conveyed, it not appearing that he was in any way influenced by such representations. Harding v. Commercial Loan Co. 84 Ill. 251.

Effect of vendee retaining possession.

The general rule is that a vendee is not precluded from proceeding against the vendor for fraudulent representations as to the title of real estate by reason of the mere fact that he is in possession of the real estate, although such possession is under and by virtue of the purchase alleged to have been procured through fraud. Younge v. Harris, 2 Ala. 108 (action to rescind); Spence v. Duren, 3 Ala. 251; Cullum v. Bank of Alabama, 4 Ala. 21, 37 Am. Dec. 725; Bailey v. Jordan, 32 Ala. 50 (action to rescind); Watson v. Kemp, 41 Ga. 586; English v. Thomasson, 82 Ky. 280; Fristoe v. Laytham, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 157, 36 S. W. 920 (action to rescind); Stockham v. Cheney, 62 Mich. 10, 28 N. W. 692 (action for deceit); Morris v. Brown, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 266, 85 S. W. 1015.

In Cullum v. Bank of Alabama, supra, it was held that a vendee who has purchased real estate believing it to be free from encumbrance, the encumbrance having been to act upon such an offer, so understood. He doubtless acted as he did without reflection, through caution as to prejudicing the rights of his clients on appeal respecting the merits of the case, and was surprised when the order for judgment was filed providing for a vacation of the deed as to the whole twenty-two 40's, when the only misrepresentation complained of was as to the one 40, and the statute of limitations had, in fact, run as to the other twenty-one 40's, so that the vacation of the deed as to them could not be of any benefit to respondents. I think the trial court should have interpreted the offer of respondents' counsel as indicated, and ordered judgment vacating the deed as to the one tract, on return of the $30, or a less sum if respondents' counsel saw fit to make proof of the equitable amount.

The court, however, is of the opinion, as indicated, that as appellants' counsel elected to have the case submitted, the trial court did not commit error; that it was warranted in not requiring restoration of the full consideration for the recovery of the one 40, and in not, on its own motion, requiring proof enabling it to equitably divide the consideration so as to deal with the deed and mortgage as to the one 40 by itself.

The foregoing covers all questions in the case which appear to be of sufficient moment to require special notice. All have received consideration, resulting, in the opinion of the court, that the judgment should be affirmed.

Timlin and Barnes, JJ., took no part.

fraudulently concealed from him, may, upon discovery thereof, require its prompt removal; and if the vendor does not effect its discharge, the vendee is entitled to a rescission of the contract, and he may either remain in possession of the land purchased or abandon it.

The rule was asserted in Morris v. Brown, supra, that it was not necessary for a defrauded vendee of real estate to show a prior eviction in order to rescind a purchase of the real estate for fraudulent representation of the vendor as to the title; if a paramount outstanding title is shown, with danger of eviction by reason thereof, it is sufficient.

In Watson v. Kemp, supra, it was held that the fact that the purchaser was in possession of the land purchased would not prevent him from defending an action on the note given for the purchase price, on the ground that the vendor made false and fraudulent representations as to the title to the land, where his possession did not accrue from the purchase, he being in possession at the time of the purchase.

But a party entitled to rescind a contract for fraud on the part of the vendor in misrepresenting the title to real estate may deprive himself of this remedy by acquiescing in or by dealing with the property as owner after the discovery of the fraud. "A party claiming to rescind a contract for fraud must act promptly on discovery of the fraud, and restore or offer to restore to the other party what he has received under it; he cannot thereafter deal with the other party on the footing of an existing contract, or with the property acquired under it as his own." Schiffer v. Dietz, 83 N. Y. 300.

In conformity with the general doctrine that the party cannot rescind while retaining the fruits of the contract, a purchaser of real property must surrender possession acquired under the contract before he can maintain an action for its rescission; and where fraud is claimed for misrepresentation as to title, continuance in possession after the discovery of the fraud is evidence of an intent to abide by the contract. Ibid.

In Christian v. Scott, Minor (Ala.) 354, again before the court in 1 Stew. (Ala.) 490, 18 Am. Dec. 68, it was held in an action upon a bond for the purchase price of real estate, that it was error for the court to refuse to charge the jury that although the vendor may have made fraudulent representations as to his title, yet, if the purchaser received possession of the real estate purchased, and carried the contract into execution by taking unto himself ownership of the land, payment of the bond on the ground of fraud could not be resisted.

The long silence and acquiescence of the purchaser of real estate, in possession thereof, after discovering a defect in his title, innocently represented by the vendor to be good, conclusively shows that such representation did not induce the purchase, and hence cannot be thereafter relied upon as a defense to an action upon notes given for the purchase price. Glasscock v. Minor, 11 Mo. 655.

A payment upon the purchase price made by a vendee in possession of land under a contract for the purchase thereof is a waiver of his right to a rescission of the contract on the ground of false and fraudulent representations by the vendor as to his title. Webb v. Stephenson, 11 Wash. 342, 39 Pac. 952.

In Tissot v. Throckmorton, 6 Cal. 471, it was held that, in order for a vendee of land to entitle himself to a rescission of the purchase upon the ground of fraudulent representations by the vendor as to his title, he must surrender his deed to be canceled.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN MINING SUPPLY COMPANY,
Respt.,

v.

JOHN J. QUINN et al., Appts.

(40 Mont. 156, 105 Pac. 732.)

Pleading — conversion — sufficiency of allegations.

1. An allegation that, at the time of the seizure of property to satisfy the debt of a third person, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of it, and that such property continued to be his until its sale by the sheriff, is sufficient to support an action for conversion.

Sale — warehouse — delivery of possession.

2. Change of possession of a warehouse on leased land, and its contents, is effected by a delivery of the key, and ceasing to exercise control over the property.

Same — fraud — retention of possession — delivery — attachment.

3. Delivery of possession of chattels under a contract of sale is sufficient as against an attachment, if made prior to the time it is levied, although the sale is not accompanied by immediate delivery, as required by statute.

(December 15, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the District Court for Silver Bow County granting plaintiff a new trial after verdict in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.— Is failure to take immediate possession upon sale of chattels cured by taking possession before attachment of the particular right or lien of the person attacking the sale.

As to effect of chattel mortgagee taking possession before any specific right or lien of creditors has attached, see note to Martin v. Holloway, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 110.

Where the rule prevails that a sale of goods or chattels is invalid as to the creditors of the seller unless there is a change in the possession, it is sufficient to answer this requirement if the buyer takes possession prior to the levy upon the goods or chattels by a creditor or creditors of the seller. Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by the plaintiff, a corporation, against John J. Quinn, the surety on his official bond as sheriff of Silver Bow county, and C. M. Parr, to recover damages for the conversion of certain goods and chattels alleged to belong to the plaintiff. The property consists of a warehouse and certain mining machinery, lumber, etc., which was seized by Quinn, the sheriff, on July 8, 1905, by virtue of a writ of attachment issued in an action wherein Parr was plaintiff, and the Shackleton & Whiteway Construction Company was defendant, perfect as if the sale and delivery had both occurred at the same time; and added: If the sale is not fraudulent in fact, a delay in delivery does not make it fraudulent in law, as to those whose rights accrue subsequent to the time of delivery.

And in McIntosh v. Smiley, it was said that a bona fide sale of goods and chattels, possession of which is not taken within a reasonable time after the sale, is not void as to the vendor's creditors, if, before institution of any attachment suit by such creditors, the purchaser takes and retains actual possession.

So, in Kendall v. Samson, the court remarked that even though, upon the sale of chattels, there was not such a change in the possession as was necessary to protect the sale against the creditors of the vendor, yet such a change might be made at any time before an attachment intervened in favor of the seller's creditors; and added: "If the change [in the possession] does not immediately follow the sale, this would indeed be proper matter to go to the jury on the question of a fraudulent sale in fact, but it would be too much to hold that the change in the possession could not be per-and afterwards sold by order of the court. In the district court the defendants recovered judgment upon a general verdict in their favor. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was granted, and the defendants appealed from the order.

1. It is contended that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint alleges that, at the time of the seizure of the property, the predecessors of plaintiff were the owners and in possession of all the property, and that such property continued to be theirs until the sale thereof by defendant Quinn. While this pleading is not a model, we think it is sufficient. The seizure of one's property to satisfy a claim of another is a conversion of the property, irrespective of the designation given such seizure in the complaint.

2. The plaintiff claims that its predecessors in interest purchased the property from the Shackleton & Whiteway Construction Company before the seizure by Quinn. But it is urged by defendants that the evidence is insufficient to show such a delivery and change of possession as is necessary to satisfy our statute. The testimony discloses that the warehouse is personal property situated at 516 South Main street, Butte, on leased land; and that the other property was contained in the warehouse at the time of the seizure. It further discloses that on June 26, 1905, upon a sale of the property by the Shackleton & Whiteway Construction Company to Farnham, Wright, & Hale, the predecessors of this plaintiff, the construction company delivered up to Farnham the perfectly subsequently to the sale, so as to avoid the effect of the principle applicable to sales fraudulent per se."

Some statutes have been construed to render absolutely void, as against creditors, any sale of goods and chattels where a change in the possession was not substantially contemporaneous with the sale. In jurisdictions where such a rule prevails, it has been held that a change in the possession some time after the sale, although prior to the attachment of any liens upon the property in favor of the creditors of the seller, does not cure the invalidity; and hence, the property is subject to the seller's creditors, although at the time in the hands of the buyer. Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal. 119, 65 Am. Dec. 493; Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 401; Edwards v. Sonoma Valley Bank, 59 Cal. 148; Autrey v. Bowen, 7 Colo. App. 408, 43 Pac. 908.

This was also formerly the rule in Missouri. Franklin v. Gumersell, 9 Mo. App. 84, s. c. subsequent appeal 11 Mo. App. 306; Cabanne v. Bay, 10 Mo. App. 594. These cases, however, were in effect overruled by McIntosh v. Smiley, supra.

key to the warehouse, and thereafter did not exercise any ownership or control over any of the property. While this evidence is meager, it is held to be sufficient by the authorities generally. In Dodge v. Jones, 7 Mont. 121, 14 Pac. 707, this court said: "No particular act or formal ceremony is necessary to make a delivery in law. Any act done, coupled with the intent to change the ownership, which has the effect to transfer the dominion over the thing sold to the buyer, is a delivery." In that case it was held sufficient delivery and evidence of change of possession that the horses in question were gathered, a distinguishing brand placed upon them, and they then returned to their customary range. The subject was again considered at length by this court, and the doctrine of the Dodge Case approved, in Webster v. Sherman, 33 Mont. 448, 84 Pac. 878. It has been repeatedly said by the courts that the acts which will amount to a delivery will vary with the different cases, and will depend upon the character and quantity of the property sold. Lay v. Neville, 25 Cal. 546. It is easy enough to understand the meaning of the words "immediate delivery" as used in § 6128, Rev. Codes, when applied to the sale, over the counter, of small articles of merchandise; but when one attempts to apply the same meaning to a sale of a kiln of hot bricks, or hay in the swath, stack, or mow, or a large quantity of ore in bins, he appreciates fully the difficulty in the way of establishing a hard and fast rule applicable to all cases. It is not now an open question that there may be such a constructive delivery as will fully satisfy the requirements of the statute; for the law does not demand impossibilities. In Sharp v. Carroll, 66 Wis. 62, 27 N. W. 832, it was held that the delivery by the vendor to the vendee of the key to the granary was a sufficient delivery of the wheat therein, which had been sold. The same thing is held in Kellogg Newspaper Co. v. Peterson, 162 Ill. 158, 53 Am. St. Rep. 300, 44 N. E. 411, with reference to a sale of heavy machinery in a room. In Pope v. Cheney, 68 Iowa, 563, 27 N. W. 754, it was held sufficient that the purchaser of corn in a crib, immediately after the purchase, nailed up the openings in the crib. The same ruling is made in Vining v. Gilbreth, 39 Me. 496; Morrison v. Oium, 3 N. D. 76, 54 N. W. 288. See also Ott v. Sutcliffe (N. J. Eq.) 60 Atl. 965; Rapple v. Hughes, 10 Idaho, 338, 77 Pac. 722.

3. It is further contended by the defendants that at least a portion of the property seized was liable to the satisfaction of Parr's claim against the Shackleton & Whiteway Construction Company, for the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

reason that the delivery, if any, was not made contemporaneously with the sale by the construction company to Farnham, Wright, & Hale. The evidence discloses that a portion of the property in controversy was sold by the construction company to Farnham and others, on May 29, 1905, and that the purchasers did not take possession of it until June 26th following, when the remaining portion was sold. Bearing in mind, then, that the attachment was not levied until July 8, these facts present in concrete form the question raised by instruction 6a, given by the trial court. The question may be stated as follows: If a bona fide sale of goods and chattels is not accompanied by an immediate delivery, is the sale void as to an attaching creditor of the vendor, if the vendee, before the institution of the attachment suit, takes and retains actual possession of the property? So far as our investigation discloses, California and Colorado are the only states in which this question is answered in the affirmative. Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 401; Edwards v. Sonoma Valley Bank, 59 Cal. 148; Autrey v. Bowen, 7 Colo. App. 408, 43 Pac. 908. There is not any reason advanced in any of these cases for the conclusion reached. Counsel for defendants also cite Stewart v. Hoffman, 31 Mont. 184, 77 Pac. 689, as indicating the same view; but an examination of the opinion of this court on rehearing (31 Mont. 190, 81 Pac. 3) will disclose that the question was not before the court at all.

Prior to 1888 the court of appeals of Missouri held as do the courts of California and Colorado. Cabanne v. Bay, 10 Mo. App. 594; Franklin v. Gumersell, 11 Mo. App. 306. But in McIntosh v. Smiley, 32 Mo. App. 125, the precise question which we now have before us came before the same court. Section 2505, Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, is substantially the same as our § 6128 above. Our statute requires an immediate delivery; the Missouri statute requires a delivery within a reasonable time. In other respects the statutes are the same. In the McIntosh Case, however, the court found or assumed that the delivery was not made within a reasonable time after the sale, but was made before the attachment was levied; so that the question presented there was the same as the one which we are called upon to decide. The Missouri court makes a careful analysis of the statute, and points out the object to be obtained, as well as some of the objects to be avoided, by its enactment. It refers to the familiar rule that, as between the parties to the sale, the transaction would be equally valid whether there was or was not a delivery. It propounds the question for solution as we have stated it, and, among other things, says: "Under this statute we think that actual possession taken and retained by the vendee of the things sold completes his title against all persons except those whose rights may have intervened between the sale and the taking of possession. . . .

The vendor having made a sale, another sale is not needed (in fact he has nothing to sell); and he may complete the sale by a delivery of the things sold, to take effect against others from the time that the delivery is made. In such a case the sale runs, as between the vendor and vendee, from the time of the sale; but, as against creditors of and purchasers in good faith from the vendor, from the time of delivery. This we think is the clear meaning of the statute. To hold otherwise would be to prevent a sale unaccompanied by a delivery within a reasonable time from ever becoming perfected as against creditors and subsequent purchasers in good faith. To do this would be to perpetrate wrong, to prevent which was the object of the statute. The want of a delivery places the vendee, as to creditors and subsequent purchasers in good faith, in the same position he would have been in if he had not purchased the property, but in no worse position. While the possession remains in the vendor, after the lapse of a reasonable time for a delivery, as to such creditors and purchasers there is no sale, but the vendee is not disqualified from becoming the purchaser of the property; and taking actual possession and retaining it makes him a purchaser even against such parties, if, at the time of the taking of possession, they have no existing rights. An attaching creditor, as such, has no rights in the debtor's property until after levy under the writ of attachment. Therefore the question in this case must be answered in the negative." Because the court of appeals of Missouri is not a court of last resort, and because of the importance of the question decided, the case was certified to the supreme court, where it is said: "This case is certified here from the Kansas City court of appeals as being in conflict with previous decisions rendered by the St. Louis court of appeals. It is reported in 32 Mo. App. 125. The conclusion reached by the Kansas City court of appeals in this case, that a bona fide sale of goods and chattels, the possession of which is not taken within a reasonable time after the sale, within the meaning of § 2505, Rev. Stat. 1879, is not void, as to an existing creditor at the time of the sale, if, before the institution of an attachment suit by such creditor, the vendee takes and retains actual, continuous possession of the property, and remains in possession thereof at the time of the levy of the writ in such suit upon such property, meets with our approval. The precise question under that section of the statute has not hitherto been passed upon by this court, but the decision of the court of appeals finds support in the rulings of this court in the following cases: Dobyns v. Meyer, 95 Mo. 132, 6 Am. St. Rep. 32, 8 S. W. 251; Petring v. Chrisler, 90 Mo. 650, 3 S. W. 405. The judgment of the Kansas City court of appeals is affirmed." McIntosh v. Smiley, 107 Mo. 377, 17 S. W. 979.

In Clute v. Steele, 6 Nev. 335, this same question came before the supreme court of Nevada, under a statute substantially the same as our own. After speaking of the presumptions arising from nondelivery, as deduced by the courts and text writers, the court says: "While, however, decisions have been thus various, there has been a uniformity of holding upon the necessary status of those who might question such a sale; and the conclusion is that no creditor at large may do so, and that a delivery before the attachment of any lien of a creditor will satisfy the law and validate the sale." And the following is quoted, with approval, from Hilliard on Sales: "And the general rule may be laid down that where a vendee takes possession at a time subsequent to the sale, but before the rights of creditors accrue, by attachment or otherwise, he shall hold against creditors." Page 183, note.

Section 2663, Okla. Stat. 1893, is identical in terms with our § 6128 above, and in Woods v. Faurot, 14 Okla. 171, 77 Pac. 346, the court held that, under the statute above, if delivery was not made until some months after the sale, but was made before the attachment was levied, the sale was valid as against the attaching creditor. In Tiedeman on Sales, p. 115, it is said: "Mere delay in the delivery of the possession is ordinarily not considered fraudulent as to creditors, as long as delivery is actually made before attachment." In 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 382, it is said: "As a general rule, it is considered to be sufficient that the purchaser take possession of the property before any creditors of the vendor have obtained specific rights to, or liens upon, the property sold, as by the levy of attachments or executions or otherwise." The following authorities, in addition to those mentioned, fully support the rule thus announced: Gilbert v. Decker, 53 Conn. 401, 4 Atl. 685; Cruikshank v. Cogswell, 26 Ill. 366; Blake v. Graves, 18 Iowa, 312; Bartlett v. Williams, 1 Pick. 288; Waite v. Mathews, 50 Mich. 392, 15 N. W. 524; Weeks v. Fowler, 71 N. H. 518, 53 Atl. 543; Levin v. Russell, 42 N. Y. 251; Wilson v. Leslie, 20 Ohio, 161; Rule v. Bolles, 27 Or. 368, 41 Pac. 691; Smith v. Stern, 17 Pa.

360; Coty v. Barnes, 20 Vt. 78; Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh, 535. See also Sayward v. Nunan, 6 Wash. 87, 32 Pac. 1022; Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. 685.

As between the parties to a sale of personal property, it is wholly immaterial whether there is any delivery of the thing sold. It is equally true that a mere creditor, as such, does not have any interest whatever in his debtor's property. If the Shackleton & Whiteway Construction Company had in good faith sold all this property to Farnham and others on June 26th, and had accompanied the sale by an immediate delivery, Parr could not complain, even though such sale might operate to defeat him in the collection of his debt. On the contrary, if Parr had commenced his action and procured a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon the property while still in the possession of the construction company, Farnham and others could not complain, even though they had parted with value which would be lost to them. Manifestly, the purpose of the statute is not to hinder the transfer of personal property, but to prevent such property of debtors being fraudulently put beyond the reach of creditors by secret transfers. When, however, the delivery has been made before a creditor has moved to collect his debt, he is not placed at any greater disadvantage than he would have been had delivery accompanied the sale. Even if Parr had extended credit to the construction company upon the strength of its ownership of the property in controversy,—which he did not do,—he could not assert a right to have the particular property subjected to the payment of his debt, unless by mortgage or some other lien he had burdened it with his claim; for at any time after extending such credit, and before he fixed a lien upon it, the construction company, by a bona fide sale, accompanied by immediate delivery, could have put the property beyond the reach of Parr. It would seem that the legislature did not intend to go further than to declare that, during the time the vendor of personal property remains in possession after sale, his creditors may seize the property in satisfaction of their claims, notwithstanding such sale. This view accords with the overwhelming weight of authority. Instruction 6a, as given by the court, did not correctly state the law.

4. There is not any substantial evidence in this record of actual fraud in the transaction between the construction company and Farnham and others, and therefore instruction 7a should not have been given. We are not able to find any evidence to justify the giving of instructions 8a and 9a.

For the errors in giving these instructions, the District Court properly granted a new trial, and the order is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

AMPERSAND HOTEL COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

HOME INSURANCE COMPANY, Respt.

(198 N. Y. 495, 91 N. E. 1099.)

Appeal—striking out defense—error.

1. It is not reversible error to entertain a motion to strike out a separate defense to an action at the trial, if the defense is insufficient in law and has not been demurred to.

Insurance—conspiracy to destroy property—effect.

2. A conspiracy, unaccompanied by an overt act, to burn insured property, in which the owner joins, does not, although it is in process of accomplishment at the time the property is destroyed by fire, avoid the policy, under provisions that the policy shall be void in case of any fraud touching any matter relating to the subject of the insurance, or if the hazard is increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, reversing a judgment of a Trial Term for Franklin County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certain fire insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Ellison and Arnold L. Davis, with Messrs. Ellison, MacIntyre, & Davis, for appellant:

The conspiracy to burn did not constitute a fraud on the part of the plaintiff within the meaning of the policy.

People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 79, 59 Am. Dec.

Note.—The above decision seems to be one of first impression upon the question whether a conspiracy to burn insured property in which the owner takes part, unaccompanied by an overt act in furtherance thereof, would defeat recovery for a loss of the insured premises by a fire not the result of the conspiracy.

A conspiracy to burn the insured property, entered into by and with the knowledge of the assured, constitutes such an "increase of hazard" as will avoid the policy, under the provision declaring it void "if the hazard be increased by any means within the knowledge or control of the insured."

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of a policy of insurance issued by the defendant, the Home Insurance Company, upon its hotel buildings and contents, which were destroyed by fire. Among other defenses interposed by the answer of the insurer was this, in brief: That the principal stockholder of the plaintiff, who was also its treasurer and a director and who had the management of its affairs, at a time shortly prior to the occurrence of the fire, had entered into a fraudulent conspiracy with one Van de Wall and others, "wherein it was planned that said Van de Wall should procure some person or persons to cause the destruction of the property by fire, to enable the plaintiff to recover . . . the insurance; . . . and that while said plan and conspiracy was still in existence, and in process of accomplishment, the said fire occurred." When the case came on for trial, the plaintiff moved to strike out this separate defense as insufficient in law, and the motion was granted. The trial resulted in a decision in favor of the plaintiff; but the appellate division reversed the judgment, and ordered a new trial of the action. By reference to the opinion below, it appears that the reason moving the learned justices to the reversal was the action of the trial court in striking out the defense to which I have alluded.

That presents the serious question in this case, upon which alone a difference of opinion exists in this court. So far as the practice is concerned, I may say that we do not think that the trial court committed any error in entertaining the plaintiff's motion. If the defense was insufficient in law, it was proper, when it had not been demurred to, to object to it at that time and to move for its dismissal. The advantage in such practice is that the ground to be covered by the evidence upon the trial is seasonably restricted.

The question whether the defense was a good one turns upon two provisions of the policy. The first one provides that the policy should be void "in case of any fraud . . . touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof." I do not think that there was any actionable fraud, within the meaning of the policy, in the fact alleged in this defense, because, whatever the evil design, nothing—no act—was done touching the insured property, or the contract of insurance. There was neither some fraudulent transaction working, or tending to work, wrong or injury; nor did the conspiracy to defraud get beyond the stage of a mere plan to do something. A fraud was intended, as we must assume; but the intention, not being connected with any injury, remained a mere mental project. A conspiracy, to be the subject of legal complaint, must reach the stage of development where an overt act is committed, or some actual damage is occasioned. It must be put in execution, and not remain in plan. It is not like a case where insurance is procured with a fraudulent intent on the part of the assured; for that would be insurance against knavery. If this defense asserts the truth, the question is, How could an afterthought, an evil design later conceived to burn up the property, which never reached the point of anything done in accomplishment, be deemed to have affected the risk? The contract was unaffected, the subject of the insurance remained the same, and no liability of the insurer was increased.

The other provision of the policy is that it should be void "if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured." I do not think that there was any increase in the hazard. I take that language as limiting the meaning of the provision to a case where by some act done to the property, which the assured knew of, or could have prevented, the company's risk had been increased. Ordinarily, we understand, and so the decisions run, that the hazard of insurance is increased when the risk is changed by some new use of, or some other burden placed upon, the property; that is to say, when the physical status or condition of the subject of insurance is rendered by some act of the insured other than what it was when the insurance was applied for and the application acted upon. It is said in May on Insurance (§ 219) that the insurance "must be presumed to be made with reference to the character of the property insured, and to the owner's use of it in the ordinary way, and for the purpose for which such property is ordinarily held and used, or to cover risks incident to such use." Again, the same author, in speaking of the provision against any alteration or change in the situation or circumstances affecting the risk, says (§ 218) that it "binds the assured not only not to make any alteration or change in the structure or use of the property, which will increase the risk, but prohibits him from introducing any practice, custom, or mode of conducting his business which would materially increase the risk, and also from discontinuing any precaution represented in the application to have been adopted and practised with a view to diminish the risk." In Joyce on Insurance (§ 2207), the author, when referring to the provision against an increase of risk by the acts of the insured, speaks of "an act done by the insured," which, "although not included in the class of specific hazards, nevertheless avoids the policy if it increases the risk." Here, though a conspiracy, as we must assume, was entered into, it was to execute a plan for defrauding the insurer. The conspiracy did not come to a head. The property and the contract to insure it were unchanged and unaffected by what was a mere proposal to affect them. The purpose to burn up the property never had ceased to be a purpose within the domain of thought. It is not even alleged that the person was procured to execute the plan that was conceived. As the trial judge well suggested, the conspiracy remained but a mental conception. It was not the cause of the fire, and it had no connection with it. The parties charged with conspiring had not got beyond the stage where they might change their minds and repent them of their wicked design. They might conclude eventually to do nothing in completion of their conspiracy.

I think that a mere intention or plan to do an injury is of no consequence, where no act is done to effectuate it, and the party whose interests are aimed at is neither injured, nor exposed to loss, as the result of having put the plan into some way of execution. To allege that the conspiracy was in "process of accomplishment" when the fire actually occurred is not equivalent to the allegation of an overt act. It was nothing more than saying that the conspiracy was proceeding toward accomplishment. I am not aware of any case which holds that the hazard of insurance has been increased, unless some act has been done to, or about, the property, which changes it physically, or the burdens upon it, or affects its ownership.

The defendant could not sue for damages by reason of the conspiracy, and, if that be true, I think it could not set it up as a defense to the performance of its contract.

Upon no other questions affecting the judgment are we divided in opinion, and, for the reasons given, I advise that the order and judgment of the Appellate Division be reversed and that the judgment of the Trial Term be affirmed, with costs in both courts to the appellant.

Willard Bartlett, J., dissenting:

I cannot assent to the proposition that the formation of a conspiracy to burn an insured building, which conspiracy is in process of accomplishment, does not increase the hazard. The hazard referred to is the risk of destruction by fire; and, according to the prevailing opinion, this risk is not increased by taking steps to carry into execution a plan to destroy the building by fire. The phrase "in process of accomplishment" in the answer can only mean that steps were being taken to effect the purpose of the conspiracy. It seems to me so clear that the hazard was thereby increased that I will simply record my dissent without further discussion.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

NEBRASKA TELEPHONE COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
CITY OF LINCOLN.

(82 Neb. 59, 117 N. W. 284.)

Telephone company — occupation of streets — business.

1. The franchise or right to occupy the streets of a city by a telephone company is not identical with the business or occupation of the company.

Double taxation — telephone company — gross earnings — franchise.

2. An occupation tax measured by a percentage of the gross earnings of a telephone company, whose franchise is also taxed in connection with its tangible property, according to its value as a going concern, does not tax the same property twice.

Taxation — telephone company — privilege of using streets.

3. The provision for an annual payment of $500 to the city of Lincoln in the respective franchise ordinances of two telephone companies, "in consideration of the rights and privileges granted," is a sum exacted by the city for the privilege of using the streets under its proprietorship of the streets, and while termed a "privilege tax," is in the nature of a rental charge or compensation for the use of the streets.

Same — gross earnings.

4. The exaction of a percentage of the gross earnings of its business in the ordinance granting a franchise to the Western Union Independent Telephone Company is an exercise of the taxing power of the city, and is a tax upon the business or occupation of conducting a telephone business within the city.

Telephone company — franchise provision — gross earnings tax — repeal.

5. Such provision is also legislative in its character, and subject to repeal.

Taxation — telephone companies — uniform operation.

6. A provision in an ordinance imposing an occupation tax that "the sum and amount

Note. — Does taxation of the business or occupation of a public-service corporation, and the taxation of its franchise or right to occupy the streets, amount to double taxation.

NEBRASKA TELEPH. CO. v. LINCOLN was followed and its principles applied in Lincoln Traction Co. v. Lincoln, 84 Neb. 327, 121 N. W. 435, in which the same court sustained an occupation tax imposed by the same city upon a street railway company, though the company's franchise was also taxed in connection with its tangible property, according to its value as a going concern.

On the other hand, in Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Hopkins, 121 Ky. 850, 90 S. W. 594, it was held to be double taxation, and therefore beyond the power of a city, to exact a tax upon the business of selling railroad tickets, or of handling freight for pay within the city, from a railroad company which had already paid a tax on its franchise (which franchise included the right to occupy the streets of the city). The court refused to accede to the proposition that the franchise tax which was collected from the railroad company under the general assessment of its franchise, being a property tax, was quite distinct from the occupation tax which the city sought to impose. The same conclusion was reached as to an occupation tax imposed upon a telephone company by the same city, where the city had sold the company a franchise for a certain price per year, payable annually.

of the occupation tax or taxes on the gross receipts required to be paid under existing ordinances" may be deducted from the amount of the tax is not void because not uniform as to persons or property, since by its operation all persons engaged in the same occupation are taxed upon the same basis and in the same manner.

Occupation tax — telephone company — business outside city.

7. Under its charter, the city of Lincoln may lawfully enact an ordinance imposing upon telephone companies a business or occupation tax measured by the gross receipts within the city, and the fact that tolls and rentals collected within the city are in part for messages over lines lying in part beyond the city limits does not invalidate the tax.

(June 26, 1908.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County in defendant's favor in a suit to restrain the enforcement of a municipal ordinance imposing an occupation tax on telephone companies. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. F. Rose and W. W. Morsman for appellant.

Messrs. John M. Stewart and T. F. A. Williams for appellee.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Nebraska Telephone Company is a corporation operating a telephone system in the city of Lincoln with local and long-distance connections. In 1885 it obtained a franchise to transact business within the city. No provision was made in the ordinance for the payment of any consideration for the privilege. In 1894 an ordinance was passed giving it the right, for a term of fifty years, to construct and maintain subsurface conduits for carrying its wires and cables under ground. This ordinance provided for the payment of $500 annually to the city "as a privilege tax," in consideration of the rights and privileges thereby granted. In 1903 the city granted to the Western Union Independent Telephone Company a like franchise to operate a telephone system. This ordinance provided that the grantee should pay the city $500 annually, "in accordance with the terms and conditions of the existing ordinances fixing the occupation tax upon telephone companies." The grantee was also required to pay a further sum annually, equal to 1 per cent of its gross earnings, during the first term of five years after the commencement of its business, and 2 per cent for the next five years, and 3 per cent annually thereafter during the term of the grant, which was for fifty years. The grantee transferred its rights under this ordinance to the Lincoln Telephone Company, which constructed and has operated a telephone system in Lincoln for several years. In 1907 ordinance No. 448 was passed, providing that all telephone companies doing business in the city should pay an occupation tax "equal to 2 per cent of the gross receipts of such companies from exchange rentals and tolls taken within the city, not including any interstate service or services for the United States government;" and after providing for penalties for delinquencies and for the filing of proper statements, the ordinance further provided that, in the payment of said occupation tax, any such company shall have the right to deduct therefrom "the sum and amount of the occupation tax or taxes on the gross receipts required to be paid by such company or companies to the city of Lincoln under existing ordinances." The Nebraska Telephone Company began this action, praying that the latter ordinance be declared void, and praying for an injunction to restrain the city of Lincoln from attempting to enforce the same or collect the tax imposed thereby. As grounds for the action, it alleged in the petition that the two telephone companies named are the only companies doing business in said city, and that there is no probability there will ever be more; that the ordinance was framed and passed with reference to these companies; that there was not at that time any ordinance imposing any occupation tax or taxes on the gross receipts of telephone companies, or any other ordinance imposing obligations upon such companies, except those named, and that the purpose and object of the provision permitting the companies to deduct from the amount of the tax "the sum and amount of the occupation tax or taxes on the gross receipts required to be paid by such companies to the city of Lincoln under existing ordinances" was to permit each company to deduct the sum which they had severally agreed to pay by the respective franchise ordinances, and was a device, under the pretense of taxation, to impose an unequal burden on the plaintiff by permitting the Lincoln Telephone Company to subtract payments made in performance of its contractual obligations from the amount of the occupation tax ostensibly imposed upon it by the ordinance. The plaintiff alleges, further, that the tax imposed by the ordinance is not uniform in its operation, and imposes unequal taxation, and is in violation of the charter of the city, the Constitution of Nebraska and of the United States. The city answered, admitting the passage of the ordinance, but denying the other facts alleged, and praying for an accounting of the amount of taxes due under the ordinance from the plaintiff, and a decree for their payment. The district court found the ordinance to be legal and valid, refused an injunction, and ordered the plaintiff to file a statement and pay the tax, as required by the ordinance. From this judgment, the Nebraska Telephone Company has appealed.

The plaintiff first contends that the ordinance creating the occupation tax is void because it imposes double taxation upon it by taxing the same thing for the same purpose twice, but under different names. The argument is that because, under the law in this state with reference to taxation of public-service corporations, their tangible property and their franchises, including all intangible rights and interests, are to be taken together, and the value of the whole be taken as a going concern, the right or privilege of doing business or carrying on the occupation is therefore taxed, and cannot be again taxed by virtue of an impost laid upon the right to carry on the occupation within the city; citing Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Omaha, 73 Neb. 527, 103 N. W. 84; Nebraska Teleph. Co. v. Hall County, 75 Neb. 405, 106 N. W. 471; State ex rel. Bee Bldg. Co. v. Savage, 65 Neb. 714, 91 N. W. 716. The plaintiff, in its brief, says: "We fully concede that the fact that the property employed in a business is taxed as property and ad valorem is no objection to a separate tax upon the business in which the property is employed, provided the business or occupation has not in fact been, or is not required by the law to be, taxed in taxing the property and franchises 'by valuation.'" So that the whole argument of the plaintiff on this point is based upon the proposition that the franchise and the business or occupation of the telephone company are identical.

But there is a distinction between the right or privilege to transact or carry on business within the corporate limits of a city and the actual operation of the business itself. It is the franchise, the grant of the right to do business, which must be taxed according to value, the same as other property. It is property and is susceptible of valuation. It is well known that the right to occupy the streets of a city by a corporation, either for gas, water, lighting, street railway, telegraph, or telephone purposes, often constitutes an exceedingly valuable property even before the construction of the operating plant, or the doing of any business whatsoever. Such unavailed of franchises, as a matter of common knowledge, have in some instances been valued and sold at many thousands of dollars before one cent has been realized from the enterprise. On the other hand, the corporation owning a franchise and carrying on a business might be conducting its operations at an actual loss, its earnings being insufficient to pay running expenses, with no better prospects in the future, and therefore its franchise of little or no value. While its gross earnings might amount to a large sum of money, yet a tax upon the business, measured by the gross earnings, would be upheld as a business tax. A business tax measured by gross earnings is a tax upon the business which is actually performed, and is not a tax upon property in any sense; while a tax levied by valuation on the right to do business is a tax upon property, irrespective of whether or not any business or occupation has been actually carried on. It seems clear that a property tax based upon the value of the franchise, and a business or occupation tax based upon the gross earnings of a public-service corporation, are in no wise identical as to the subject of taxation, and do not constitute double taxation in any sense. On the contrary, it requires no argument to show that the exaction of a heavy business tax upon the gross revenues of a corporation would inevitably have the effect to lower the value of a franchise, and to reduce its assessed value for the purpose of taxation as property. New York ex rel. Brooklyn City R. Co. v. New York Tax Comrs. 199 U. S. 50, 50 L. ed. 84, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 713; Wiggins v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 372; Goldsmith v. Huntsville, 120 Ala. 182, 24 So. 509; St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 360, 8 S. W. 558; York v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 56 Neb. 572, 76 N. W. 1065; Producers' Oil Co. v. Stephens, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 99 S. W. 157; State v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. 100 Tex. 153, 97 S. W. 71; Browne v. Mobile, 122 Ala. 159, 25 So. 223; South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue, 57 L.R.A. 50 and note (105 Ky. 283, 49 S. W. 23); Gray, Limitations of Taxing Power & Pub. Indebtedness, § 1373. We think there is no merit in the plaintiff's contention.

2. The plaintiff next contends that the tax imposed is not equal and uniform, as required by the Constitution of the state and by the charter of the city. The constitutional provision involved is contained in § 6, art. 9, Const., vesting municipal corporations with authority to assess and collect taxes, and providing that "such taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same." The ordinances granting the franchise to the Nebraska Telephone Company (aside from the requirements of a $500 privilege tax) contain no provision for the payment of any portion of its gross earnings to the city, while the ordinance granting the franchise under which the Lincoln Telephone Company operates provides for a payment annually of a portion of its gross earnings. The plaintiff's argument is that, though upon its face the taxing ordinance No. 448 seems to be uniform in respect to the telephone companies within the city, yet, in reality, it is a gross discrimination against it, for the reason that its effect is to deprive it of the advantage of its contract with the city; that by a contractual relation of the Lincoln Telephone Company, it is compelled to pay the city a definite amount each year, and that by this ordinance it is allowed to deduct the amount of this contractual obligation from the tax, thus creating a gross lack of uniformity; that since by virtue of its franchise obligation the Lincoln Telephone Company must, for the greater portion of its franchise term, pay 2 or 3 per cent of its gross receipts to the city, if it is permitted to deduct these annual payments from the amount of the tax imposed by this ordinance, it will pay no occupation tax whatever, since the amount of its contract obligation will equal or exceed the tax. On the other hand, the city contends that the annual payments required to be made by the Lincoln Telephone Company by the terms of the franchise ordinance are in the nature of an occupation tax, and that the ordinance under consideration, instead of being subject to the objection of lack of uniformity, does in fact make 'hat uniform which was not so before, since it requires each telephone company to pay an equal tax to the city upon the same occupation. The difference seems to be in the view taken as to the obligations imposed upon the Lincoln Telephone Company by the franchise ordinance. If they are mere payments under contract in return for the privilege of using the streets, we would be inclined to hold with the plaintiff. To determine this question requires us to set out and examine the various provisions of the ordinances referred to, bearing upon the payment of money to the city by each of these companies and by telephone companies generally. The ordinance granting the Nebraska Telephone Company the right to lay underground conduits provides that, "in consideration of the rights and privileges granted to the Nebraska Telephone Company by this and prior ordinances, the said Nebraska Telephone Company shall, so long as it exercises such rights and privileges, pay into the city treasury of the city of Lincoln annually, as a privilege tax, the sum of $500, said sum to be paid on or before the 1st day of April in each year." The ordinance granting the franchise to the grantor of the Lincoln Telephone Company provides: "In consideration of the rights, privileges, and franchise hereby granted, the Western Union Independent Telephone Company . . . shall pay into the city treasury of the city of Lincoln annually, the sum of $500, said sum to be paid on or before the 1st day of April in each year . . . under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of the existing ordinance, fixing an occupation tax upon telephone companies." The only "existing ordinance fixing an occupation tax upon telephone companies" was that granting the Nebraska Telephone Company the right to lay subsurface conduits, a portion of which is quoted. After this provision referring to the previously existing ordinance, it is provided: "And said Western Union Independent Telephone Company shall pay annually into the treasury of the city of Lincoln, on the 1st day of April in each year, a per cent of its gross annual earnings from its plant in the city of Lincoln, as follows: 1 per cent of its said gross earnings each year for the first five years, 2 per cent of its said gross annual earnings each year for the next five years, and 3 per cent of its gross annual earnings annually thereafter during the remaining period granted by this ordinance." The ordinance granting to the Nebraska Telephone Company the right to place subsurface conduits was the only prior ordinance which could be referred to, and the fact that the tax is named therein as a "privilege tax," and not as "an occupation tax," as is stated in the later ordinance, does not, we think, change the legal effect or meaning of the latter. The $500 was exacted each year from both companies in compensation for the privilege of using the streets. It is not, strictly speaking, an exercise of the taxing power, but is exacted by virtue of the right of proprietorship in the public streets possessed by the city, and, as provided in the first of these two ordinances, is to be paid "in consideration of the rights and privileges granted." The exaction is not a tax upon the property of the corporations nor upon their business, but is in the nature of a rental charge or recompense for the use of the streets. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485. In that case a charge of $5 per annum for each telegraph pole placed in the city of St. Louis was held to be of the nature of a rental charge, and not a tax, and was upheld as to the right of the city to impose a reasonable charge for such use.

The provision of the ordinance which follows, requiring a percentage of the gross earnings of the company to be paid to the city, is apparently an exercise of the taxing power pure and simple, and is clearly a business or occupation tax. No part of it became due or payable until the business of receiving and transmitting messages had actually been transacted. The $500 privilege tax is payable as long as the respective companies exercise the right and privileges in the public streets granted to them by the ordinances, and not exceeding fifty years, while the tax upon the business does not begin to operate until business is transacted. The tax is similar in its operation to a tax upon the business of an auctioneer, based upon his gross annual sales, or one estimated by the number of passengers carried by a street car company, or the number of messages delivered by a telegraph company. The privilege to use the streets might have been granted gratuitously or in return for a lump sum, or possibly it might have been sold to the highest bidder, but the exaction of a tax upon the business of the corporation stands upon the same footing as a tax upon other occupations. It was within the power of the city to impose the burden upon the corporation in the same ordinance that granted the franchise; and, though ineffective as an occupation tax against other telephone companies, in all probability the grantee, having accepted the benefits of the ordinance, would be estopped to repudiate its burdens. But that company is not here complaining. There can be no doubt that the city has the power to repeal that portion of the ordinance imposing this obligation, and if it had done so before it enacted ordinance No. 448, no objections on the score of lack of uniformity could possibly arise. The fact that a contract was embraced in the ordinance does not make it any less legislative in character, nor less subject to appeal so far as the imposition of the tax is concerned. Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 44 Iowa, 505, 24 Am. Rep. 756; New Orleans City & Lake R. Co. v. New Orleans, 143 U. S. 192, 36 L. ed. 121, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 406; Stanislaus County v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. 192 U. S. 201, 48 L. ed. 406, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241. Moreover, the Nebraska Telephone Company accepted its franchise subject to the exercise of the taxing power of the city, which was liable to be used at any time. It has no standing in court to complain of the fact that an occupation tax is imposed upon it. It has always been subject to this contingency. Neither has it any right to object to the repeal of an ordinance imposing a tax upon its rival and competitor, or to the enactment of one that may have the same effect, even though the result may be to equalize the burdens of taxation, and thus deprive it of an advantage it possessed over the competing company. The fact that in these ordinances the payments are variously denominated privilege tax or occupation tax does not change their nature, nor does the fact that the payment required by the franchise ordinance is not dignified with any title whatever change its character. The tax upon gross receipts imposed upon the Lincoln Telephone Company is nothing more or less than a tax upon the business transacted by the company, although it is embraced within the terms of an ordinance which grants a franchise. The exaction is one made under the taxing power of the city, for revenue purposes, and not under the proprietary interest in the streets, and this fact in no wise interferes with the power of the city to impose an equal tax upon the Nebraska Telephone Company. The purpose of the present ordinance is to impose a uniform business or occupation tax upon both telephone companies; and, while a better or less cumbersome method might have been chosen to effectuate the purpose, the law will look to the substance of things rather than to their appearance.

It is probable that the tax may also be upheld upon the principle of classification. We see no reason why telephone companies may not be placed in classes depending upon whether they are required by the term of their franchise to pay a percentage of their gross receipts to the city or not, and requiring a lesser payment from those in the former class than from those in the latter. In the New York franchise tax law such a distinction is made, and those corporations which are required to pay any amount for a special franchise to a municipality are allowed to deduct that amount from the franchise tax levied by the state. These provisions were upheld both by the court of appeals of New York and by the Supreme Court of the United States (People ex rel. Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. State Tax Comrs. 174 N. Y. 417, 63 L.R.A. 884, 105 Am. St. Rep. 674, 67 N. E. 69; Id., 199 U. S. 1, 50 L. ed. 65, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 381); both courts holding that they did not deny the holders of some franchises the equal protection of the law, or deprive them of their property without due process of law. These are not the specific objections made in this case, but the rulings are worthy of mention and the opinions are enlightening.

3. The plaintiff's last contention is that this is an occupation tax upon business conducted beyond the corporate limits of the city, and that the city has no power to levy an occupation tax upon a business partially conducted beyond its corporate limits. The tax provided for by the ordinance is "the sum and amount of 2 per cent of the gross receipts resulting from rentals and tolls of such company or companies on the business of such company or companies in the city of Lincoln, including the rental charges resulting from business in the city of Lincoln, and all toll service and charges resulting from toll service from persons within this city to persons within this state, and all toll service paid at the office of any such company or companies in the city of Lincoln for toll service between the persons within this state and persons within this city. There shall be excepted from the provisions of this ordinance all toll service between persons in this city and persons outside of this state, and all toll service interstate, and all interstate business and all toll service or rental charges on account of the United States government service or any of its departments, or state service or any of its departments; and no part or portion of the tax provided for in this ordinance shall be levied upon or assessed against or taken from any such business so excepted from the provisions hereof." The plaintiff argues that in the transmission of messages from the city of Lincoln to points outside of the city, a portion of the business transacted must necessarily be beyond the limits of the city, and that the city, therefore, has no power to tax the same, relying upon certain language in the opinion in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Fremont, 39 Neb. 692, 26 L.R.A. 698, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 46, 58 N. W. 415, and on the dissenting opinion of Irvine, C., in that case. Whatever language might have been used in the argument in the opinion in that case, the law is squarely laid down by the decision that the license tax imposed upon the telegraph company is not invalidated by the fact that the telegrams received and delivered within the city were transmitted over the lines of the telegraph company from other points within the state, or that the messages received by it at its office or place of business in the city were transmitted to various other places in the state. It may be observed in this connection that the tax is not a tax upon the gross receipts, but it is a tax upon the occupation or business, the volume of which is measured by the gross amount of money received in the city of Lincoln for all business transacted, except United States, state, and interstate. The principles involved are discussed in Sacramento v. California Stage Co. 12 Cal. 134; Los Angeles v. Southern P. R. Co. 61 Cal. 59. Moreover, the argument of the plaintiff, carried to its ultimate conclusion, would result in making it impossible to collect any occupation tax whatever based upon the receipts of telephone companies engaged in long-distance business within the limits of the state. To illustrate, if the city of Lincoln may not base an occupation tax upon the receipts in this city of tolls paid for the use of the telephone company's instruments and wires from Lincoln to Omaha, on account of a portion of the business being transacted without the limits of the city, neither could the city of Omaha collect or impose such a tax upon the same messages for the same reason; and so with every other connection over long-distance lines radiating from the city in every direction. It would be equally impossible to impose or collect such a tax upon the receipts from rural telephones, whose principal value depends upon their connection with the city exchange. It is evident that a large portion of the business of the telephone companies in the city is concerned with the transmission of long-distance messages and the collection of the tolls therefor, and the switchboard connections furnished rural subscribers, and the collection of the rentals for their connection with the exchange. Since the volume of the business transacted in Lincoln is increased by the rural and long-distance lines, we see no reason why the amount of the occupation tax should not be increased in proportion to such volume as measured and ascertained by a percentage of the gross receipts. There is no levy on the receipts themselves, but they are considered merely as a means of ascertaining the volume of the business transacted. Such a tax has been supported in Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Charleston, 153 U. S. 692, 38 L. ed. 871, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 637, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1094; State v. Hayne, 4 S. C. 403; Maine v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 142 U. S. 217, 35 L. ed. 994, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 807, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121, 163; York v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 56 Neb. 572, 76 N. W. 1065; Horn Silver Min. Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 36 L. ed. 164, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 57, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403. In conclusion, the new ordinance deprives the plaintiff of none of its rights under its grant. It neither takes away nor changes any part of its several franchises. It is true it imposes a tax upon its business, but it does the same upon all other telephone companies. The provision for deduction is of the amount of a like imposition, and is made to secure uniformity and equality of burden, which is what just taxation requires.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment of the District Court was correct, and the same is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down May 7, 1909:

On the argument of the motion for a rehearing two propositions were vigorously discussed: First, that the occupation tax, which the plaintiff asks us to declare void, is double taxation; second, that the tax is void for want of uniformity.

Considering the first proposition, we are unable to say that the ordinance results in double taxation. It is claimed that it has that effect because, in assessing the property of telephone companies for the purpose of general state and municipal taxation, the value of the property of each company is fixed by taking into consideration its tangible property, such as poles, wires, instruments, office fixtures, etc., and the value of its franchise or intangible property, and in determining that value the gross receipts of the company may be taken into consideration. The evidence in this case does not clearly and conclusively show that the plaintiff's gross receipts were taxed, as such, for the purposes above mentioned, but rather that in fixing the value of the plaintiff's franchise its gross receipts were merely taken into consideration. It is probable that to some extent a consideration of this item may result in double taxation, but we must remember that as yet no system of raising revenue has been devised which will entirely eliminate the matter of double taxation, and in this instance such taxation does not necessarily follow the enforcement of the law. Therefore this contention cannot be sustained.

On the question of lack of uniformity, which is required by our Constitution, it would seem at first blush that plaintiff's objection is well founded, but a careful examination of existing conditions does not bear out that inference. It appears that when the plaintiff applied to the city of Lincoln to obtain its franchise or charter, an ordinance was passed granting it the privilege sought, without exacting any payment on the part of plaintiff therefor. At a later period, when plaintiff applied for the privilege of laying its wires underground, it was agreed between plaintiff and the city that it should pay to the city the sum of $500 per year for that privilege. It further appears that when its rival, which, for convenience, we will call the Lincoln Telephone Company, made application for its charter, the city had become aware of the fact that it had something valuable to sell, and therefore it required first that that company should pay yearly to the city $500 for its franchise, and in addition thereto 1 per cent each year of its gross receipts for the first five years of its existence, 2 per cent for the second five years, and after that, for the remaining period of forty years, it should pay to the city 3 per cent of its gross receipts. Matters stood in that condition until the ordinance in question was passed, which provides that all telephone companies doing business in the city of Lincoln shall pay an occupation tax to the city each year, amounting to 2 per cent of their gross receipts. If matters had been left in that condition, it is plain to be seen that the Lincoln Telephone Company would have been required to pay to the city, by way of taxation, a much larger sum proportionately to its business transacted than would the plaintiff company. Therefore, instead of repealing so much of the former ordinance as provided for the payment to the city of 1, 2, and 3 per cent of the gross receipts of the Lincoln Telephone Company, it was provided by the ordinance complained of that any sum required to be paid by way of taxation, based upon gross receipts, by any company under existing ordinances, might be deducted from the amount of the occupation tax in question.

This provision has been construed by the city to operate as a repeal of so much of the former ordinance as required the Lincoln Telephone Company to pay 1, 2, and 3 per cent of its gross receipts, and so both of said telephone companies, which are the only ones doing business in the city, are placed on an equal footing. As the ordinance is interpreted by the taxing authorities, each company now pays to the city $500 per year for its franchise or right to do business, and each company pays as an occupation tax 2 per cent of its gross yearly receipts. So that the ordinance complained of, as thus interpreted, results, as a matter of fact, in a uniformity of the occupation tax. While the inhabitants of the city may be thus afforded a cause of complaint, we fail to see any discrimination against the plaintiff herein.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the motion for rehearing should be overruled, and it is so ordered.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE C. ELDRIDGE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

C. A. FINNINGER.

(— Okla. —, 105 Pac. 334.)

Sale — payment to agent of undisclosed principal — right to credit for.

1. If the purchaser of coal does not know, and has no good reason to know, that he is dealing with the agent of the owner, he is

Headnotes by TURNER, J.

Note. — Right of defendant in action by undisclosed principal on the contract made by the agent to avail himself of defenses that would have been available in an action by the agent in his own right on the contract.

This note, of course, presupposes that the defendant was originally justified in entering into the contract with the agent, and justified in treating the agent as owner, and in a suit by the owner for the purchase price, he must take the contract of sale as he finds it, subject to such rights as the purchaser might avail himself of against the agent, assuming him to be the owner. Same — treating agent as owner.

2. If the purchaser of coal does not know, and has not good reason to know, that he is dealing with the agent of the owner, he is justified in treating the agent as owner, and in a suit by the owner for the purchase price is entitled to credit thereon for the amount of loss by said purchaser sustained on the sale of a suit of clothes, agreed by the agent to be by him received in part payment therefor, but which was not delivered, on account of said agent's death.

that the action by the undisclosed principal is in affirmation of, and based upon, the contract made by the agent. It therefore excludes cases where the action, whether ex delicto or not, is in repudiation of the contract made by the agent. This limitation excludes cases where an agent, without actual or ostensible authority, assumed to sell in his own name property belonging to the principal, and the purchaser seeks to set off a claim held by him against the agent in an action of trover by the principal.

So this limitation excludes cases like Kimmel v. Bean, 68 Kan. 598, 64 L.R.A. 785, 104 Am. St. Rep. 415, 75 Pac. 1118; Wood v. Boylston Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 358, 37 Am. Rep. 366; Burnett v. First Nat. Bank, 38 Mich. 630; and Hutchinson v. Manhattan Co. 150 N. Y. 250, 44 N. E. 775, as to the right of a bank to apply a deposit of one person's funds, made by another in his own name, to a claim of the bank against the latter, as against the owner of the funds, who repudiates the act of the person by whom the deposit was made.

Cases like Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kerr, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 280, 23 S. W. 564, and Pacific Exp. Co. v. Redman (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 677, involving the right of the undisclosed principal to recover special damages upon breach of the contract, are also beyond the scope of this note.

Defenses generally.

Where an agent contracts with a third person, without disclosing that he is acting for a principal, and the third person supposes that the agent is the real party in interest, and is not chargeable with notice of the existence of the principal, and such principal sues the third person on the contract, he must accept the contract as it was made by the agent and the third party, subject to all the burdens and conditions attached thereto. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 380, 12 L. ed. 481; Sellers v. Malone-Pilcher Co. 151 Ala. 426, 44 So. 414; Woodruff v. McGehee, 30 Ga. 158 (including warranty of 28 L.R.A. (N.S.))

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On February 4, 1908, George C. Eldridge, trading in Oklahoma City as the "Eldridge Coal Company," sued C. A. Finninger, defendant in error, before a justice of the peace of that township, on account for coal to him sold and delivered, in the sum of $25.30. After set-off pleaded and offer to confess judgment for $2.30 and costs, there was judgment for plaintiff for that amount, from which plaintiff appealed to the county court. There, by leave, defendant, by amended answer, in substance admitted plaintiff to be the owner of the coal, but alleged that he had bought said coal direct from Lloyd Eldridge, believing him so to be, and that, too, without notice for a long time thereafter that plaintiff was interested therein, whereas, in truth, said Lloyd Eldridge was only the general agent and manager for plaintiff; that in part payment therefor defendant agreed with said agent to and did make him a suit of clothes for $38, which, by said agreement, should have been credited on the account, but which said suit, because of the death of said Eldridge, was never by him received, but was by de-

But it is no defense to an action by an undisclosed principal on a contract made by his agent, that the agent stipulated that he would not assign the contract without the consent of the other party. Prichard v. Budd, 22 C. C. A. 504, 42 U. S. App. 186, 76 Fed. 710.

The claim may be set off, though defendant purchased it for the express purpose of setting it off. Pratt v. Collins, 20 Hun, 126.

fendant, after his death, sold for $15, leaving $23 due thereon, for which he claimed credit on the account sued, and tendered $2.30 and costs in full of the demand. There was trial to the court and judgment for defendant, and that he, "having made tender of $2.30 in court below, and having kept said tender good," was released from costs subsequent thereto.

After motion for a new trial filed and overruled, plaintiff brings the case here, and assigns as error that said judgment is contrary to the evidence. There is no conflict therein. It, in substance, discloses: That plaintiff, George C. Eldridge, was, at the time of the sale to defendant, in the coal business in Oklahoma City under the name of the "Eldridge Coal Company;" that he had in his employ one Lloyd Eldridge, whose duties were to solicit orders and sell coal for cash. At that time, known to both plaintiff and defendant, there was in the city telephone directory the following:

"Eldridge Coal Company, G. C., L. E. Eldridge, proprietor. Coal, wood, and feed. 228 West First street

"Eldridge, George C. Eldridge Coal Company, R. 210 W. First.

"Eldridge, Lloyd E. wife, Ruth. Eldridge Coal Company, R. 26 E. Fourth."

On the day of the sale, Lloyd Eldridge, acting as agent aforesaid, but supposed by defendant to be the owner of the Eldridge Coal Company, solicited and obtained from defendant an order for the coal in question, concerning which he testified: "In the first

Where the purchaser learns before delivery that the goods he had contracted to purchase are not the goods of the agent, but of another, he cannot thereafter receive the goods, and at the same time set off a debt of the agent, due him at the time of the making of the contract. McLachlin v. Brett, 105 N. Y. 391, 12 N. E. 17; Belfield v. National Supply Co. supra; Moore v. Clementson, 2 Campb. 22.

But he may refuse the substituted performance by another in any case where his rights or interests would be injuriously affected by the change. McLachlin v. Brett and Belfield v. National Supply Co. supra.

Where an agent, employed to collect money and to remit it, when collected, to the principal, wrongfully loaned it to one to whom he was indebted in a larger amount, but who was ignorant of the agency, such borrower, when sued by the principal in assumpsit, may set off the indebtedness of the agent to him. Lime Rock Bank v. Plimpton, 17 Pick. 159, 28 Am. Dec. 286.

Where an agent sells to another who is ignorant that his vendor is but an agent, and gives in payment an order on a third person who owed him money, and who, likewise, in ignorance of the agency, accepts such order, such third person cannot set off against the principal a debt due him by the agent. Stevenson v. Kyle, 42 W. Va. 229, 57 Am. St. Rep. 854, 24 S. E. 886.

It was held in Kennedy v. Turnbull, 15 N. B. 378, that one purchasing goods of a factor, not knowing that he was a factor, when sued by the principal for the price, will not be allowed to set off a note made in his favor by the factor, which was not due until after he received notice of the true ownership of the property. But see, contra, Hogan v. Shorb, 24 Wend. 458, where suit was not brought until after the note became due.

Under an answer consisting only of a general denial and a plea of payment, the right of a purchaser to set off an indebtedness to him of the agent of the undisclosed principal cannot be determined. Foster v. Graham, 166 Mass. 202, 44 N. E. 129.

part of August, Mr. Lloyd Eldridge asked me and wanted to know if I didn't want to put in some coal, as it would be a pretty good time, as I could save so much on the ton, and he said he wanted a suit of clothes after a while, and wanted to know how much coal I could use. I told him I only had room for about $25 worth, and he said, 'I will send it up to you, and after a while I will come in and have my measure taken for a suit of clothes,' and on the 15th of September, 1905, he came in, and I took his measure for the clothes, and I made up that suit of clothes, and they were finished at the time he died; but before that they delivered the coal." When the coal was delivered, he further testified that said agent "came in with a duplicate slip, and told me to give him credit for $25.50, which I did." After his death, defendant sold the suit for $15. Thereafter plaintiff presented his bill for the coal, at which time defendant explained the transaction, and asked credit on the account for $23 loss on the suit. The trial court, in effect, held that said sum was a proper item of credit, and therein we see no error. The evidence fairly discloses that defendant believed at the time the coal was sold and delivered that he was dealing with the owner thereof, and that he had not good reason to believe otherwise. He so testified, and that he had good reason so to believe appears from the entry in the city telephone directory, introduced in evidence, wherein said agent appears as "proprietor" of the "Eldridge Coal Company."

But the principal cannot recover from the third party money paid to the agent after the name of his principal was disclosed, if the agency and the right of the agent to receive payment were still unrevoked at the time of payment. Conklin v. Raymond, 127 App. Div. 663, 112 N. Y. Supp. 77, affirmed without opinion in 197 N. Y. 509, 90 N. E. 1158.

But in Argenti v. Brannan, 5 Cal. 351, where an agent sold goods without disclosing the fact of agency, and the vendee was notified of the agency by the principal after payment had been made to the agent, it was held that the principal could not collect the balance from the vendee, who, after such notification, paid the balance to the agent. The court said that "there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant," and that "the mere notice of . . . [the principal] to the . . . [vendee] was insufficient to interrupt the completion of the performance of the contract. The defendant had the right to disbelieve it and disregard it. He had assumed a liability to another. His duty was to fulfil it, unless legal steps had been taken to prevent him."

A recovery by the agent of an undisclosed principal is a complete protection to the defendant against any claim of the principal, arising upon the contract. Ludwig v. Gillespie, 105 N. Y. 653, 11 N. E. 835.

Where a factor sells the goods of his principal without disclosing his agency, and takes the note of the purchaser, payable to himself or bearer at a future day, and before maturity transfers the note to his principal, payment by the purchaser to the factor after such transfer, and before the note falls due, without requiring the production of the note, is no bar to a recovery in an action by the principal, as indorsee, against the purchaser, as maker of the note. Mitchell v. Bristol, 10 Wend. 492.

As to effect of notice of agency on right of defendant to avail himself of payment made to agent, see next division.

Effect of notice of agency.

But if the party who dealt with the agent, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

acting in his own name, knew or had reason to believe that he was dealing with one who was an agent for some third person, he cannot successfully plead a payment, set-off, or other defense. He must, in order to be protected, be innocent of any knowledge of facts and circumstances which would put a reasonably prudent person on inquiry that he was dealing with an agent. *Whelan v. Webster's International Dictionary 1907 defines the word "proprietor" to mean: "One who has the legal right or exclusive title in anything, whether in possession or not; an owner; the proprietor of a farm or of a mill." Defendant did not know plaintiff before he presented his bill, or that he had any interest in the property. If the purchaser of property does not know, and has not good reason to know, that he is dealing with the agent of the owner, he is justified in treating the agent as owner; and payment of the purchase price to him is a good defense to an action of the owner for the amount.

Eclipse Windmill Co. v. Thorson, 46 Iowa, 181, was an action on account for a balance due upon the sale of a windmill. Defendant purchased it from Blackmarr & Son, agents for plaintiff. Subsequently he was garnished upon an execution against said agents. He being ignorant of the agency, and supposing he owed said agents for the mill, answered as garnishee that he was so indebted, and judgment was rendered against him on his answer. He pleaded said facts in defense, and judgment was rendered in his favor. Plaintiff appealed. The trial court instructed the jury that, "if you find that Blackmarr & Son, in negotiating the sale of the mill to the defendant, did not disclose the fact that they were acting as agents for the Eclipse Windmill Company, and if you find that defendant did not have good reason to know such fact, then, if Blackmarr & Son have been paid for the 874; Moore v. Clementson, 2 Campb. 22 (set-off).

Hence, if the character of the seller is equivocal,—if he is known to be in the habit of selling sometimes as principal and sometimes as agent,—a purchaser who buys with a view of covering his own debt and availing himself of a set-off is bound to inquire in what character he acts in the particular transaction; and if the buyer chooses to make no inquiry, and it should turn out that he bought of an undisclosed principal, he will be denied the benefit of his set-off. Miller v. Lea and Baxter v. Sherman, supra; Cooke v. Eshelby, L. R. 12 App. Cas. 271.

The set-off is not allowable where purchaser knows that the one with whom he deals is an agent, though he does not know who his principal is. Semenza v. Brinsley and New Zealand & A. Land Co. v. Ruston, supra.

The purchaser of goods from a factor, who is himself a factor in the same place, and who was put on notice that his vendor acted for another, cannot set off a debt due him by the factor when sued by the principal, notwithstanding a local custom among factors to settle among each other once a week, and set off debts due one another. Baxter v. Sherman, supra.

Where the agent has not been given the possession of the goods nor intrusted with the indicia of ownership, the purchaser cannot set off a debt due him from the agent. Bernshouse v. Abbott, 45 N. J. L. 531, 46 Am. Rep. 789; Bertoli v. Smith, 69 Vt. 425, 38 Atl. 76.

A distinction has been made between the effect of sales by factors and those by brokers in regard to the right of the purchaser to set off a debt due him by the factor or broker where the principal is undisclosed; and it has been held that, although the set-off will be allowed in case of the factor, it will not be allowed in case of a broker. Bernshouse v. Abbott and Bliss v. Bliss, supra; White v. Jaudon, 9 Bosw. 415; Dunn v. Wright, 51 Barb. 244; Crosby v. Hill, 39 Ohio St. 100.

explained in Baring v. Corrie, 2 Barn. & Ald. 138: "A factor, who has the possession of goods, differs materially from a broker. The former is a person to whom goods are sent or consigned, and he has not only the possession, but, in consequence of its being usual to advance money upon them, has also a special property in them, and a general lien upon them. When, therefore, he sells in his own name, it is within the scope of his authority, and it may be right, therefore, that the principal should be bound by the consequences of such sale, amongst which, the right of setting off a debt due from the factor is one. But the case of a broker is different; he has not the possession of the goods, and so the vendee cannot be deceived by that circumstance; and besides, the employing of a person to sell goods as a broker does not authorize him to sell in his own name. If, therefore, he sells in his own name, he acts beyond the scope of his authority, and his principal is not bound. But it is said that by these means, the broker would be enabled by his principal to deceive innocent persons. The answer, however, is obvious, that that cannot be so, unless the principal delivers over to him the possession and indicia of property."

A payment by a vendee of goods is good, although the vendee knows that the broker sells for some unknown principal. Campbell v. Hassell, 1 Starkie, 233.

And it makes no difference in such case whether the agent acts under a del credere commission. Ibid.

But payment in such case would not be good if it varied from the terms of the original contract. Ibid.

Where an agent sells goods, at the same time disclosing to the purchaser the fact that he is acting for a principal residing without the state, such purchaser, when thereafter sued by the principal for the price, cannot set up as a defense a discharge in state insolvency proceedings subsequent to the sale, even though the name of the principal was not disclosed to him. Ilsley v. Merriam, 7 Cush. 242, 54 Am. Dec. 721.

mill, the plaintiff cannot recover." This was assigned as error. The following bill was sent to and received by defendant:

Beloit, Wis., Jan. 5, 1876.

Paul Thorson bought of Eclipse Windmill Company one 10-foot mill, 100 feet tin galvanized pipe, one tower, $107.50.

Paul Thorson.

Pay the account to M. V. Blackmarr, who will remit it with other collections to us.

C. B. Salmon, Treasurer.

The court held the instruction good, and in passing said: "We cannot say that the defendant ought to be held to pay for the property twice, if he neither knew nor had good reason to know the plaintiff in the transaction." And in answering the alleged error that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, said that, inasmuch as the testimony disclosed defendant could not read English, the assignment was not well taken; and as the jury declared by their verdict that he did not have any reason to know, notwithstanding the receipt of the bill, who the vendor of the mill was, the court would not be justified in setting the verdict aside.

But let that be as it may, in this case it appears, as stated, that defendant dealt with the agent believing him to be the principal, and made the contract accordingly. As the principal, by this action, now seeks to enforce said contract, he must take it as the agent and the purchaser left it. He must take his pay as the agent agreed to receive it. Hook v. Crowe, 100 Me. 399, 61 Atl. 1080, was assumpsit to recover the price of awnings and sash curtains sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendants. Plaintiffs recovered, to which ruling defendants excepted, and an agreed statement of facts was certified to the law court. The facts were that one Hook, as selling agent of plaintiffs, applied to defendants for an order, which was given for the articles named, on consideration that Hook would take pay therefor in clothes and work out of the store, which he agreed to do. Hook sent an unsigned order to plaintiffs, who later shipped the goods, which were by defendants received, and also mailed them a bill the same day. Plaintiffs had no knowledge of the arrangement for pay between Hook and defendants. On the day of the arrangement, Hook had $1.50 worth of work done by them, and later $8.50, all pursuant to said arrangement. Defendants in the action sought to have these items allowed as a credit on the bill. The court below disallowed it. The supreme court, although sustaining the exceptions on other grounds, in passing said: "If the defendants dealt with Hook, the agent, believing him to be a principal, the plaintiffs, who were undisclosed principals, must take the contract, if they seek to enforce it, as their agent and defendants left it. If they seek the advantages of the contract, they must suffer its burdens, and must allow the defendants by way of payment for the goods sold and services rendered to the agent." And in the syllabus said: "If the purchaser, in dealing with the agent, believes him to be a principal, the undisclosed principal must take the contract, if he seeks to enforce it, as his agent and the purchaser left it. If he seeks the advantages of the contract, he must suffer its burdens. He must take his pay as the agent agreed to take it." See also Miller v. Sullivan, 39 Ohio St. 79; Johnson v. Hoover, 72 Ind. 395; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 66.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment of the trial court is supported by the evidence, unless it is true, as contended by plaintiff in error, that the court erred in permitting defendant to testify as to the transaction between himself and the deceased agent. He relies on Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. (Okla.) 1903, § 4509, as follows: "No party shall be allowed to testify in his own behalf, in respect to any transaction or communication had personally by such party with a deceased person, when the adverse party is the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of such deceased person, where they have acquired title to the cause of action immediately from such deceased person." We have examined the cases cited in support of this contention, none of which are in point. As the plaintiff is in no sense the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, surviving partner, or assignee of his agent, nor derived title to this cause of action from him, there is nothing in this contention.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

CROOK-HORNER COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY, Appt.,
v.
CHARLES GILPIN.

(112 Md. 1, 75 Atl. 1049.)

Bankruptcy — effect on attachment bond.

A discharge in bankruptcy releases liability on a bond executed to release property of the bankrupt attached less than four months before the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings, where the bankruptcy statute makes attachments levied against the bankrupt within that time void, although the giving of the bond had released the attachment before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings.

(January 12, 1910.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Baltimore City in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a building contract, which was commenced by attachment, to secure the release of which a bond was given. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert H. Smith, for appellant:

The discharge in bankruptcy did not release liability on the bond, as a qualified judgment with a stay of execution as to the bankrupt could be entered.

McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 116; Re Marshall Paper Co. 2 Am. Bankr. Rep. 653; Kendrick & Roberts v. Warren Bros. Co. 110 Md. 47, 72 Atl. 461.

Mr. J. Craig McLanahan also for appellant.

Messrs. Charles F. Harley and John B. A. Whittle, for appellee:

The bankruptcy having occurred within four months after the issuing of the attachment, the attachment lien cannot be enforced by judgment, and the surety on the attachment bond is released.

House v. Schnadig, 235 Ill. 301, 85 N. E. 395; A. Klipstein & Co. v. Allen-Miles Co. 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 15, 69 C. C. Co. 110 Md. 47, 72 Atl. 461; Re Richards, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 145.

The bond stands in the place of the property or money attached.

If the surety has to pay the money, the defendant will have to pay it to the surety, and his discharge in bankruptcy, intended to mean something, will avail him nothing.

Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699, 32 L. ed.

Note. — When will discharge of principal in bankruptcy release surety on a bond given by the principal in an action at law.

The earlier decisions on this question may be found in a note to Stull v. Beddeo, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 507, to which the cases following are supplemental.

In National Surety Co. v. Medlock, 2 Ga. App. 665, 58 S. E. 1131, where the plaintiff in an action for libel had, more than four months before the adjudication of bankruptcy, sued out process of garnishment, which was dissolved by the filing of a statutory bond conditioned for the payment of the judgment that should be rendered on said garnishment, it was held that as under § 16 of the bankruptcy act the liability of the surety is not altered by the bankruptcy of the principal, and judgment having been regularly obtained, both against the defendant in the main action and against the fund impounded by the garnishment, the contingency upon which the liability of the surety depended had happened. The case of A. Klipstein & Co. v. Allen-Miles Co. 69 C. C. A. 229, 136 Fed. 385, was distinguished upon the ground that, the original action in that case being founded on a debt dischargeable in bankruptcy, and the lien of the garnishment upon the funds in the hands of the garnishee having arisen within four months prior to the adjudication of bankruptcy, so that no judgment could be had upon the answer of the garnishee without working a preference under the bankruptcy act, the contingency upon which the liability of the surety depended became impossible of performance, while in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the present case the main action was founded upon a claim from liability for which a discharge in bankruptcy did not release the bankrupt.

In King v. Block Amusement Co. 126 App. Div. 48, 111 N. Y. Supp. 102 (affirmed in 193 N. Y. 608, 86 N. E. 1126), it was held, upon the authority of McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 114, that a warrant of attachment would not be vacated, on account of the defendant's discharge in bankruptcy, so as to discharge a surety from liability on an undertaking given to discharge the attachment, the surety having received no property of the defendant, even though, the attachment having been issued within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy, the lien thereof, if the undertaking had not been given, would have been discharged.

In United States Wind Engine & Pump Co. v. North Penn Iron Co. 227 Pa. 262, 75 Atl. 1094, it was held that the discharge in bankruptcy of a defendant in a writ of foreign attachment issued and served more than four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy would not prevent the entering of a judgment, with perpetual stay of execution, against the defendant, for the purpose of fixing the liability of the surety on a bond given to discharge such attachment, and conditioned for the payment of such judgment as might be recovered. The earlier Pennsylvania cases of Com. v. Huber, 3 Clark (Pa.) 383; Nesbit v. Greaves, 6 Watts & S. 120; Barber v. Rodgers, 71 Pa. 362; and Hubert v. Horter, 81 Pa. 39, are distinguished as not turning on any general principle making them applicable to all bonds given in actions commenced by capias

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued out of the court of common pleas of Baltimore city, on the 19th day of December, 1905, an attachment against the defendant, a nonresident of the state, to recover the sum of $3,906, due and owing for work done and materials furnished in the erection of the heating apparatus of the Hotel Caswell, Baltimore city. The defendant appeared to the suit, and on the 28th day of December, 1905, a bond was filed by the Scranton Trust Company as surety, and the attachment was dissolved. On the 26th day of February, 1906, the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt by the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, sitting in bankruptcy, and on the 11th day of January, 1909, by an order and decree of that court, was discharged from all debts owing by him and provable under the bankrupt act. The declaration in the short-note case is in assumpsit, and contains the usual money counts. The precise question is presented on the pleadings, and it arose in this way: The defendant, on the 28th day of December, 1905, pleaded to the declaration in the short-note case the usual pleas of never indebted as alleged, and did not promise as alleged, and issue was joined thereon. On the 13th day of January, 1909, the defendant, by leave of court, filed an additional plea to the declaration, wherein he sets up and pleads his discharge in bankruptcy by a court of competent jurisdiction from all his debts, and that the adjudication was upon a petition filed less than four months after the issuing of the attachment. In other words, it appears that the attachment was issued on the 19th day of December, 1905, and the decree in bankruptcy was passed on the 26th day of February, 1906, so it is clear that the attachment proceeding was begun against the defendant within four months before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. To this plea of discharge in bank-ad respondendum; but as being decided on the theory that the obligation in an insolvent bond is practically complied with when the debtor secures a discharge under the national bankruptcy act; which is not in any sense the case with regard to the obligation in a bond to discharge an attachment.

In Rice v. Nirdlinger, 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 238, it was held that the liability of a surety on a bond given to secure the dissolution of a foreign attachment, conditioned for the payment of whatever sum might be recovered in the main action, was not affected by the principal's being adjudged a bankrupt, and obtaining a discharge, even though the attachment, having been levied within four months prior to the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings, would have become void, where the attachment plaintiff was permitted to prosecute his claim to judgment without any steps being taken to bring the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings to the attention of the state court.

In Re Mercedes Import. Co. 20 Am. Bankr. Rep. 648, in which the point arose in connection with a motion for a stay of an action on a claim from liability for which the debtor might become released by his discharge in bankruptcy, and in which the precise character of the bond is not stated, it was said that should the principal debtor obtain a discharge, there never could be a judgment against it, and consequently no judgment against a surety whose liability was conditioned upon entry of judgment against the principal.

In House v. Schnadig, 235 Ill. 301, 85 N. E. 395, affirming 138 Ill. App. 498, in which a creditor of the bankrupt sought to obtain a judgment with perpetual stay of execution in order to establish a liability against the surety on an appeal bond given in appealing a case from a justice of the peace to the circuit court, conditioned for the principal's payment of whatever judgment might be rendered against him in the circuit court, or, in case the appeal was dismissed, his payment of the judgment rendered against him by the justice of the peace, it was held that, the original judgment having been rendered within the four months period, the plaintiff could not claim the special judgment sought upon the ground of necessity for preserving rights that had accrued more than four months before the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted; and that, the discharge in bankruptcy being a bar to the rendition of a judgment against the bankrupt, and the surety's liability not being for the debt, but contingent upon a judgment being rendered against the principal in the bond, the discharge in bankruptcy released the surety.

In Almon H. Fogg Co. v. Bartlett (Me.) 75 Atl. 380, which was an action against the sureties on a statutory bond for the release of their principal from arrest on execution on a judgment for a debt provable in bankruptcy, and conditioned upon the debtor's payment of the judgment, his taking of the poor debtors' oath, or his delivering himself into custody within six months,—it was held that, the principal having obtained a discharge in bankruptcy within the period in which the conditions of the bond were to be fulfilled, such discharge constituted an equitable defense to a suit on the bond.

ruptcy the plaintiff replied: "That the adjudication of the defendant a bankrupt, and his discharge in bankruptcy by order or decree of the United States district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, does not release or discharge the surety on the bond filed in this case by the defendant to dissolve the attachment which had been previously issued and levied by the plaintiff on the moneys and credits of the defendant, which bond had been executed and filed in the case before the filing in the district court of the defendant's petition to be adjudged a bankrupt; that the judgment sought to be obtained in this case against the defendant is solely and exclusively to bind the surety in the bond filed to dissolve the attachment issued and levied on the moneys and credits of the defendant, and if a judgment is had in this case against the defendant, the court will be asked by the plaintiff by its order to restrain the plaintiff from ever issuing an execution on said judgment against the defendant." The defendant demurred to this replication, and the court below sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment thereon in favor of the defendant. And from this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The validity of the plaintiff's replication to the defendant's plea, it will be seen, must depend upon the effect to be given, and the proper construction to be placed on, § 67f of bankr. act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 565, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3450. The language of the act is to this effect: "That all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens, obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt, and the property affected by the levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same, and shall pass to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt, unless the court shall, on due notice, order that the right under such levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien shall be preserved for the benefit of the estate; and thereupon the same may pass to and shall be preserved by the trustee for the benefit of the estate, as aforesaid, . . . provided that nothing herein contained shall have the effect to destroy or impair the title obtained by such levy, judgment, attachment, or other lien, of a bona fide purchaser for value who shall have acquired the same without notice or reasonable cause for inquiry."

of execution, in order to establish a liability against the surety, notwithstanding the fact that the bankruptcy proceeding was begun within four months after the attachment was instituted, because a bond was given to dissolve the attachment, and the lien was released, before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced; and, further, as no lien existed when the petition was filed, there was nothing upon which the bankrupt law was to act. On the other hand, the defendant contends that, the proceedings in bankruptcy having been instituted within four months after the issuing of the attachment, the courts of this state have no jurisdiction to enter up a qualified judgment, with stay of execution against the defendant, to bind the surety, because, under the bankrupt act, supra, such attachment proceedings are declared to be null and void.

While the main question here raised has not been heretofore passed upon by this court, it is, at least, answered in part by the recent case of Kendrick & Roberts v. Warren Bros. Co. 110 Md. 47, 72 Atl. 461. In that case, the plaintiff had issued an attachment against the defendant, which was dissolved upon giving a bond. It appears that more than four months thereafter proceedings were had in bankruptcy against the defendant, and he was discharged. We there held that this discharge in bankruptcy did not prevent the plaintiff from obtaining a judgment in the attachment suit against the defendant, with a perpetual stay of execution. The object of the judgment was to allow the plaintiff to proceed against the sureties on the bond given to dissolve the attachment. It was further held, and we here quote from the opinion: "But it is earnestly insisted upon the part of the appellant there is no such practice in this state as to warrant a special or qualified judgment, to wit, a judgment with a perpetual stay of execution, and the courts are without power to so render them. We are unable to agree with this contention. A sufficient warrant, we think, can be found in § 14, art. 26, Code Pub. Gen. Laws 1904, wherein it is provided: The court shall give judgment in all actions according as the very right of the cause and matter in law shall appear to them, without regarding any matters of mere form, so as sufficient matter shall appear in the proceedings, upon which the court shall proceed to give judgment, and it shall appear that the action has been commenced after the cause thereof did accrue. When it appears a good and sufficient reason exists for a qualified judgment, as in this case, such a judgment can be rendered. 2 Evans's Harris, 345, 364; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612, 12 L. ed.

The ultimate inquiry, then, in the case at bar, and wherein it differs from the Kendrick & Roberts v. Warren Bros. Co. Case, supra, properly comes to this: Can the courts of this state enter a judgment, with a perpetual stay of execution, against a defendant in an attachment suit, instituted within four months before the defendant has filed a petition to be adjudicated a bankrupt, and when he is subsequently discharged as a bankrupt, for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to proceed against the surety on the bond given to dissolve the attachment? The decision of this question, as we have said, must depend upon the language and the effect to be given to § 67f of the bankrupt act, herein cited. The language of this section, we think, is quite clear and comprehensive, and broad enough to include within its terms the defendant and the surety we are here dealing with. It provides in terms that all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens obtained against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt.

In Kendrick & Roberts v. Warren Bros. Co. supra, we held, upon the authority of Hill v. Harding, supra, that, where the bond or recognizance was given to dissolve the attachment, issued more than four months before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, there was nothing in the provisions of the bankrupt act to prevent the state court from rendering a qualified judgment, with a stay of execution. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court, in Hill v. Harding, supra, said: "Such attachments being recognized as valid by the bankrupt act (Rev. Stat. § 5044), a discharge in bankruptcy does not prevent the attaching creditors from taking judgment against the debtor in such limited form as may enable them to reap the benefit of their attachment. . . . The judgment is not against the person or property of the bankrupt, and has no other effect than to enable the plaintiff to charge the sureties, in accordance with the express terms of their contract, and with the spirit of that provision of the bankrupt act which declares that 'no discharge shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt, for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise.' . . . If the bond was executed before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, the discharge of the bankrupt protects him from liability to the obligees, so that, in an action on the bond against him and his sureties, any judgment recovered by the plaintiffs must be accompanied with a perpetual stay of execution against him; but his discharge does not prevent that judgment from being rendered generally against them." Wolf v. Stix, 99 U. S. 1, 25 L. ed. 309; Metcalf Bros. v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 47 L. ed. 122, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Black, Bankr. 94.

But in the case now under consideration we are met with an entirely different proposition, because the bankrupt act (1908) declares that attachments or other liens obtained at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against an insolvent person shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudicated a bankrupt, and the property affected by the attachment or other lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same, and shall pass to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt. Now, it is quite clear, we think, if no bond had been filed, the attachment having issued within four months prior to the filing of the petition, the lien, attachment, and all the proceedings, would have been null and void, by the terms and operation of the bankrupt act. In Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 703, 32 L. ed. 1084, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725, it is said the bond or recognizance takes the place of the attachment as a security for the debt of the attaching creditor; they cannot dispute the election, given to the debtor by statute, of substituting the new security for the old one. In Corner v. Mallory, 31 Md. 468, this court said the period of four months was fixed as a period within which no preference should be gained by one creditor by attachment over the claims of other creditors of the bankrupt. And the law effects no hardships in dissolving such attachments, as the creditor's claim is not impaired, and he is only deprived of a lien and priority that he might otherwise obtain to the prejudice of other creditors, and in violation of the policy of the law, which is to effect a fair and equal distribution of the property of the bankrupt among all his creditors.

It is also quite certain, under both the decisions and the terms of the bankrupt act itself, that if the property had been attached within four months prior to the filing of the petition, and the defendant had been adjudged a bankrupt, it would have been released and discharged; and if this be so, there can be no reason why the bond which stands in the place of the attachment and the property should not be relieved and released. Metcalf Bros. v. Barker, 187 U. S. 174, 47 L. ed. 126, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699, 32 L. ed. 1083, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 725; Wolf v. Stix, 99

U. S. 1, 25 L. ed. 309; Randle v. Mellen, 67 Md. 181, 8 Atl. 573; Hutchins v. Taylor, 5 Law Rep. 289, Fed. Cas. No. 6,953; Swan v. Littlefield, 4 Cush. 574; Curtis v. Barnum, 25 Conn. 370. The recent cases of House v. Schnadig, 235 Ill. 304, 85 N. E. 395, and A. Klipstein & Co. v. Allen-Miles Co. 69 C. C. A. 232, 136 Fed. 388, are in point, and are somewhat analogous cases. They present a construction of § 67f of the bankrupt act of 1898, and support the conclusion we have reached in this case. In the Illinois case, supra, the court said that case was distinguishable from the Hill v. Harding Case, because in the Hill Case the attachment was sued out more than four months prior to his filing his petition in bankruptcy. The attachment became a lien in favor of the attaching creditor, upon a levy being made, and this lien would not have been affected by the bankruptcy proceedings. Its release was accomplished by the recognizance given in accordance with the provisions of the statute. In the case at bar (the Illinois case) the appeal bond was given on the 31st day of May, 1906, and the petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 8th of June following. If the appellants had secured a lien on property, by an execution or otherwise, at the time the appeal bond was given, it would have been rendered null and void by the bankruptcy proceedings. Section 67f, bankrupt act. The supreme court of Illinois held that the discharge in bankruptcy, on the facts of that case, was a bar to the rendition of a judgment against the bankrupt, and released the surety. In the Klipstein Case, the circuit court of appeals, fifth circuit, held that where the debt for which the plaintiff sued was provable in bankruptcy, and defendant was insolvent at the time suit was brought, and had since been insolvent, its discharge in bankruptcy pending such suit released it from liability, as provided by the bankrupt act of 1898, and plaintiff cannot have judgment on it against the defendant. This case was based upon a garnishment proceeding, and it was admitted as a fact that the defendant had been discharged in bankruptcy, and that within four months prior to the proceedings garnishment was taken out, and these proceedings had been dissolved by a bond signed as surety by the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. The court held, upon the facts of the case, that judgment could not be entered against the defendant for the purpose of taking final judgment on the bond given to dissolve the garnishment, because the discharge prevents the surety from incurring the liability. And this was so, independent of the statute of Georgia, because the garnishment proceedings being had within four months prior to the bankruptcy proceedings, they were invalidated by the adjudication in bankruptcy. The facts of the case, said the court, clearly distinguish it from the case of Hill v. Harding, supra, and from the other cases cited.

Our conclusion, then, is that the case at bar is distinguishable from the case of Kendrick & Roberts v. Warren Bros. Co. 110 Md. 47, 72 Atl. 461, and for the reasons given, the defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's replication was properly sustained, and the judgment on the demurrer in favor of the defendant will be affirmed. This conclusion, it seems to us, is sanctioned by the weight of authority, as declared by the courts and by the text writers. Y. 115, cited and relied upon by the appellant in its brief, cannot be regarded as a controlling authority, if an authority at all, to sustain the appellant's position, under the facts of this case. In that case the court held that the proceeding in bankruptcy was no defense, as there was at the time no attachment lien or attachment in force upon which the proceeding could operate, and that neither the letter nor the policy of the bankrupt act was infringed by holding the defendants liable.

For the reasons given, the judgment will be affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

THOMAS F. HURLEY, Respt.,

v.

J. VAN V. OLCOTT et al., Receivers, etc.,
Appts.

(198 N. Y. 132, 91 N. E. 270.)

Servant — injury — notice — service by mail.

Failure of the employer to receive the notice is immaterial where a statute providing for service of notice of injury for which the master is to be held liable states that it may be served by post, by letter addressed to the person on whom it is to be served.

(March 15, 1910.)

Note. — Service by mail of notice required by employers' liability acts.

This appears to be a question which as yet has had little attention from the courts.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Westchester County in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries under the employers' liability act. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Eugene Lamb Richards, Jr., and Rutherford B. Meyer, with Mr. Frank Verner Johnson, for appellants:

The mailing of the notice, properly addressed and postpaid, merely raised a presumption that it had been received by the person to whom it was directed.

Moyle v. Jenkins, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 116; McCoy v. New York, 46 Hun, 268; Rosenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 193, 28 L. ed. 398, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 382; Huntley v. Whittier, 105 Mass. 393, 7 Am. Rep. 536; Austin v. Holland, 69 N. Y. 576, 25 Am. Rep. 246.

Mr. L. F. Fish, with Mr. Thomas J. O'Neill, for respondent.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is brought under the employers' liability act (Laws 1902, chap. 600), servant against master, to recover damages for personal injuries. The notice alleged to have been served seems, under our recent decision in Bertolami v. United Engineering & Contracting Co. 198 N. Y. 71, 91 N. E. 267, to be sufficient, and the only question necessary to consider on this appeal is as to the service of the notice. The plaintiff claimed to have made the service by mail; defendants denied receipt of the notice. The trial court charged the jury that if they found that the notice "was actually written as the plaintiff's wife says it was, and plainly addressed to the defendants, and the postage prepaid, and deposited by her in a postoffice box, it was sufficient, whether defendants received it or not." To this ruling the defendants excepted, and contend that it should have been left to the jury to decide whether in fact the defendants did receive the notice, and the jury instructed that if defendants failed to receive it, the service was insufficient.

In support of this position, counsel for the appellants cites many authorities to show that from the deposit of a letter in the postoffice there arises only a presumption of its delivery, which may be rebutted, and thus a question of fact be presented. This is, undoubtedly, the law; but it has no application to the case before us. In the cases cited by the counsel it was necessary for a party to show actual notice to the adverse party, or the actual receipt of the communication addressed to him. But such is not the requirement of the statute before us. It reads: "The notice may be served by post, by letter addressed to the person on whom it is to be served, at his last known place of residence or place of business; and if served by post shall be deemed to have been served at the time when the letter containing the same would be delivered in the ordinary course of the post." This provision is not anomalous. In many cases the statute provides that notice may be served by mail. Such is the provision as to service of papers on the attorneys in an action, and it has been uniformly held that the service was effective when the papers were properly mailed, regardless of their receipt by the adverse party. The risk of miscarriage is with the party to whom they are directed. Jacobs v. Hooker, 1 Barb. 71; Brown v. Briggs, 1 How. Pr. 152; Radcliff v. Van Benthuyssen, 3 How. Pr. 67. The law may prescribe other than personal service even of original process by which it is sought to bring a party into court, and bind him by its judgment. In United States Trust Co. v. United States F. Ins. Co. 18 N. Y. 199, it was held that personal service is not required to constitute due process of law, and that the legislature may prescribe "a kind of notice by which it is reasonably probable that the party proceeded against will be apprised of what is going on against him." (P. 215.) In that case the notice was by advertisement in a newspaper. To the same effect is Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 129, citing Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 404. The Code provides for service of a summons on persons without the state by advertisement and the mail, and the fact that unfortunately the party sought to be served does not receive notice in no wise affects the validity of the service or the jurisdiction of the court. In this case no constitutional ques-

No authorities have been found as to the sufficiency of service by mail of the notice which employers are entitled to receive under the provisions of liability statutes, where no specific mode of service is provided for in the act itself.

The New York employers' liability act allows service of the notice of injury by mail, and so the courts of that state recognize the sufficiency of such service without 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

question. See Eddington v. Union R. Co. 109 N. Y. Supp. 819.

Under a section of the English employers' liability act, notice of the injury may be served by registered letter; but a service by ordinary post has been held good, where there was evidence that the letter had actually been received. Previdi v. Gatti, 58 L. T. N. S. 762; Faul v. Fletcher (1881) 71 Law Times, 84.

tion is involved, because the legislature might have dispensed altogether with service of notice, either personally or by mail. The only question is the construction of the statute; and, in accordance with the uniform current of authority in analogous cases, it is clear that the proper deposit in the post is a complete compliance with the statutory requirement.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY

v.

MATTHEW J. READY, Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 75 Atl. 564.)

Evidence — will — declarations of intent — forgery.

In defense of a prosecution for forgery of a will, evidence is admissible of declarations of the testator indicating an intent to execute a will of the tenor of that alleged to have been forged, if made at a period not so remote from the date of the will as to render them immaterial.

(November —, 1909.)

Note. — Admissibility, upon issue of forgery, of declarations out of court by person whose name is charged to have been forged.

The decisions as to the admissibility, upon the question of forgery, of declarations out of court by persons whose names are charged to have been forged, are not entirely agreed. Some courts admit such declarations upon an issue as to forgery of a will, not as direct proof of the forgery, but as corroborative of other testimony.

Thus, in Hoppe v. Byers, 60 Md. 381, where it was claimed that an instrument presented as a will of personalty was a forgery, after direct proof of its genuineness and direct proof to the contrary had been introduced, declarations of the deceased, made after it was alleged to have been executed, that he had made no will, that he intended to leave his property to certain persons, etc., were held admissible, and declarations made prior to its execution, that he intended to give the beneficiary named a share of his estate, were admitted, as were also declarations made subsequently, that he had done what he said he would do. The court said: "But in thus sustaining the ruling excepted to, it must be distinctly understood that we hold that such declarations would not be admissible if they stood alone, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions for Essex County, convicting defendant of forgery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel Kallsch, for plaintiff in error:

The statements made by the deceased, that he intended to make a will and leave his property to Miss Calvin, were wrongfully excluded.

Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 292; Hunter v. State, 40 N. J. L. 537.

Mr. Thomas S. Henry, also for plaintiff in error:

Evidence as to testator's declaration in regard to the intended disposition of his property was admissible.

and had not been preceded by the direct proof of witnesses as to the genuineness of the handwriting. They are not to be taken as direct proof to establish the paper, but merely as corroborative of such direct proof, or as a circumstance in a case of this character, where such direct evidence had been first given, proper for the consideration of the jury."

And the same rule was applied in the following cases, where the declarations were admitted: Taylor Will Case, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 300 (declarations of one whose name appeared as testator, made subsequent to the date of the instrument, showing his affection for certain recipients under the will); Turner v. Hand, 3 Wall. Armentraut*, 27 Ohio C. C. 199 (declarations showing intention of making will).

In Turner v. Hand, supra, the court said: "Testimony of the sort proposed is, generally speaking, not admissible; but when you have strong proof that the paper offered as a will is a forgery, and the issue is fraud and forgery, I think it is competent, as tending to prove the issue. It is, however, a somewhat dangerous kind of evidence, and a court must hold a tight rein over it, in charging the jury as to its legal effect, in relation to the positive and unimpeached evidence of execution."

In Corbett v. State, 3 Ohio C. D. 79, which was a prosecution for forging a will, declarations of the supposed testatrix, made shortly before and after the date of the alleged forgery, showing her feelings as to the disposition of her estate, were admitted upon the question of the genuineness of the paper.

And to the same effect is Breck v. State, 2 Ohio C. D. 477.

And in Doe ex dem. Ellis v. Hardy, 1 Moody & R. 525, the declarations of a testator as to who he intended should have his property were held admissible, where a codicil was claimed to be forgery.

So, in Estate of Thomas, 155 Cal. 488, 101 Pac. 798, where an instrument undertaking to transfer all of deceased's property to one relative, and stating that he had only one relative, was claimed to be a forgery, the deceased's declarations that he had other relatives were held admissible to show that he had knowledge of other relatives

Messrs. Wilbur A. Mott and Frank E. Bradner for defendant in error.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was convicted in the Essex quarter sessions of the crime of forging the will of the late John W. Russell, who died on the 28th of November, 1905. The record of the conviction was removed into the supreme court for review, and numerous errors were there assigned and considered. The conclusion reached by the reviewing tribunal was that the assignments were, each of them, without legal support; and the conviction was thereupon affirmed. The present writ of error is sued out to test the validity of the judgment of affirmance.

We concur in the conclusion reached by the supreme court upon all of the assignments of error, except those which challenge rulings of the trial court excluding testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiff in error of declarations made by Mr. Russell to witnesses, who were called upon to prove those declarations. Their purport was that the deceased intended to make a will, and leave his property to Mary Calvin, who was his housekeeper, and had lived with him in that capacity for about six years preceding his death. They were objected to, and excluded, upon the ground that they were hearsay.

The will which was alleged to have been forged by the plaintiff in error bears date at the time the purported will was executed.

Such declarations are held by other decisions, both in cases of forgery of wills and of other instruments, to be inadmissible, on the ground of hearsay.

Thus, in Kennedy v. Upshaw, 64 Tex. 411, declarations of a testator, made several days after the date of a codicil which was claimed to be a forgery, that he had made no change in the disposition of his property, and intended to make none, were held inadmissible. The court said: "The true rule as to declarations of a testator, made before or after the execution of a testamentary paper, when such an issue is presented, we believe to be that summarized by Mr. Redfield from the case of Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274, thus: The conduct and declarations of the testator, both before and after he executed the will, are competent evidence to show his want of capacity at the time the will was executed, where the issue is upon the sanity of the testator; but after the will is made, such conduct and declarations, manifesting ignorance of the existence of the will, are not competent to show that the testator had never made the will in question. And where the execution of a will is proved in the mode required by law, the declarations of the testator, made before or after the 15th of November, 1905. By its terms it devised and bequeathed all of the testator's property, real and personal, to one M. Calvin, who was also created by it "executor or executrix" of the will. The declarations of Mr. Russell which were sought to be proved were made, one of them about three months before his death, and the other "shortly before" that event.

It cannot be doubted that if the decedent, shortly before the date of the controverted will, had made up his mind to leave his property to his housekeeper, Miss Calvin, this pre-existing testamentary design would not only have been relevant, but would have had great potency in determining the question whether the disputed instrument was a forgery, or his genuine will; for what a man determines to do, or not to do, he generally does or refrains from doing, unless something occurs before the time for executing his intention arrives which causes him to change his mind, or prevents him from carrying his intention into execution. To this extent I find no difference in judicial view. But on the question whether a person's intention to make a will, or to make a will of a particular purport, can be shown by his antecedent declarations of that intention, judicial sentiment is altogether out of harmony. In England it is entirely settled that declarations of this character are admissible. In the leading case of Doe ex dem. Shalcross v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747, an interlineation had been made by the testator in his will, by the terms of which an interest in a portion of his real estate was devised to A. B. Except in the interlined provision, she was not mentioned in the will, either as devisee or legatee. The question to be determined was whether this interlineation had been made before or after the execution of the will. It was held that antecedent declarations of the testator, expressing an intention to make provision by his will for A. B., were admissible for the purpose of showing the existence of that intention prior to the time of making the will. Lord Campbell, who delivered the opinion of the court, after reviewing the earlier cases, declared that they were none of them adverse to the admissibility of such declarations, and pointed out that, "in all cases where there is any imputation of fraud in the making of the will, the declarations of the testator are admitted respecting his dislike or affection for his relations, or those who appear in the will to be the objects of his bounty, and respecting his intentions either to benefit them or to pass them by in the disposition of his property." In the case of Sugden v. St. Leonards, L. R. 1 Prob. Div. 154, it was held by all of the judges that declarations of the testator antedating his will were competent evidence to prove his testamentary intentions. Their admissibility for that purpose was again affirmed in Dench v. Dench, L. R. 2 Prob. Div. 64. Woodward v. Goulstone, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 469, the latest case in the House of Lords upon the subject of the admissibility of the declarations of the testator contains the execution of the instrument, are not competent to prove fraud, duress, or forgery, or to disprove the execution; they are hearsay, merely; but such declarations, made at the time the instrument was executed, are admissible as part of the res gestæ. The rule upon these points is the same in the case of wills that it is in the case of deeds."

The same rule was applied in the following cases: Leslie v. McMurtry, 60 Ark. 301, 30 S. W. 33 (declarations after alleged will was executed, that he had made no will, held inadmissible to prove it a forgery); People v. Driggs, 12 Cal. App. 240, 108 Pac. 62, 64 (statements by purported lessor, who was deceased, to the effect that defendant was liable to present forged papers against his estate, and that she wanted him to sign a lease, but that he did not do it, and was deeding his property away so that she would not get it); People v. Alderdice, 120 App. Div. 368, 105 N. Y. Supp. 395 (declarations of one whose name has been forged to a deed, that he had given certain property to a relative of defendant); People v. Landis, 139 Cal. 426, 73 Pac. 153 (declarations by deceased person, against whose estate a note claimed to have been forged was presented, to the effect that defendant had swindled him and was a thief); State v. Allen, 56 S. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

C. 495, 35 S. E. 204 (holding, in indictment for forgery of a school claim against a school district, declarations of a deceased trustee whose name appeared thereon inadmissible).

Declarations of a supposed testatrix, made some months before the date of the will alleged to be a forgery, that she had executed a will, and declarations some years before, of an intention to make a will, have been held inadmissible as too vague and remote to be considered corroborative of the testimony of witnesses to the execution of the writing offered as a will. Swope v. Donnelly, 190 Pa. 417, 70 Am. St. Rep. 637, 42 Atl. 882.

In Beavan v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 142 Ill. 302, 31 N. E. 679, where it was claimed as a defense to a note that one of the names had been forged, evidence that such person, who was deceased, had said that she had assisted the defendant, and did not think she would lose anything by it, was admitted. The objection made here was that the testimony had no reference to the note.

For a note on the admissibility of antetestamentary declarations of a testator upon the issue of undue influence, see Hobson v. Moorman, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 749.

no intimation of a doubt as to the soundness of the earlier decisions I have referred to, so far as they relate to declarations of a testator antedating his will.

In this country courts are divided on the question of the admissibility of such evidence. The leading case against its admissibility is that of Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 45 L. ed. 663, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 474. In that case the litigation was over the admission to probate of a paper purporting to be the last will and testament of Judge Holt. One of the questions was whether or not the alleged will was a forgery. Some of the declarations of the testator were offered as tending to prove, and others as tending to disprove, the factum of the will. Mr. Justice Peckham, in an elaborate opinion, after referring to the fact that the state courts are not in accord upon this subject, cites in a marginal note those cases which he considers favor the exclusion of such evidence, and those which favor its admission. He concludes that the weight of authority, as well as the principles upon which the law of evidence is founded, necessitates the exclusion of such evidence for any purpose, except the determination of the mental capacity of the testator. The first three cases which he cites in support of his conclusion are Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274; Rusling v. Rusling, 36 N. J. Eq. 603; and Re Gordon, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268. I shall discuss these cases later. Others of those authorities are Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87, 21 Am. St. Rep. 430, 23 N. E. 828; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Robinson v. Hutchinson, 26 Vt. 38, 60 Am. Dec. 298; Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 69.

I am unable to agree that these decisions support the conclusion of the principal case. They seem to me rather to be opposed to it than to support it. In Shailer v. Bumstead, Colt, J., on page 126 of the opinion in 99 Mass., says: Such "evidence was not competent as a declaration or narrative to show the fact of fraud or undue influence at a previous period. But it was admissible not only to show retention or loss of memory, tenacity or vacillation of purpose existing at the date of the will, but also in proof of long-cherished purposes, settled convictions, deeply rooted feelings, opinions, affections, or prejudices, or other intrinsic or enduring peculiarities of mind inconsistent with the dispositions made in the instrument attempted to be set up as the . . . testatrix's will."

In Lane v. Moore, Allen, J. (151 Mass. 90), after referring to earlier Massachusetts cases in which declarations of the testator had been admitted, says: "The evidence is 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

received merely for the purpose of throwing light upon the state of mind of the person at the time in question, and not as tending to establish the truth of any facts which may have been stated by him. There are certain proper limitations to the admissibility of such evidence. One is . . . that the testimony should appear to have some natural bearing upon the mental condition of the person, or his intention at the particular time which is immediately involved in the issue."

In Marx v. McGlynn, Earl, J. (88 N. Y. 374), says that such declarations are in the nature of hearsay, and "are incompetent for the purpose of defeating or destroying the will or any of its provisions. They are competent only as bearing upon the condition of the mind of the testatrix at the time of the execution of the will. Such memoranda or declarations . . . are competent as bearing upon the testator's mental capacity. They are also competent as bearing upon the condition of the testator's mind with reference to the objects of his bounty."

In Robinson v. Hutchinson, Isham, J. (26 Vt. 47), expresses the conclusion reached by the court as to the admissibility of such declarations as follows: "The true rule and distinction on this subject we apprehend is given in 2 Phillipps on Evidence, in notes by Cowen & Hill, 648, in which the editor remarks 'that the difficulty seems to lie in acting upon the distinction between declarations going to develop the operations of the mind, and those containing the assertion merely of a distinct fact. The former are admissible, the latter not.'"

In Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 69, the conclusion reached by the court is thus expressed by Mr. Justice Brewer, on page 77 of the opinion: "While declarations are not admissible as mere impeachment of the validity of a will, they are admissible as evidence of the testator's state of mind." A man's words show his mental condition. It is common to prove insanity by the party's sayings as well as by his acts. One's likes and dislikes, fears and friendships, hopes and intentions, are shown by his utterances; so that it is generally true that, whenever a party's state of mind is a subject of inquiry, his declarations are admissible as evidence thereof. In other words, a declaration which is sought as mere evidence of an external fact, and whose force depends upon its credit for truth, is always mere hearsay, if not made upon oath; but a declaration which is sought as evidence of what the declarant thought or felt, or of his mental capacity, is of the best of evidence.

Turning now to the New Jersey decisions: An examination of them shows that there has been much vacillation of judicial view upon the admissibility of the declarations of a testator.

In the case of Den v. Vancleve, 5 N. J. L. 589, Justice Southard, on page 676 of the case, declared that antecedent declarations of the testator were competent to rebut a charge that the will was the result of fraud or imposition exercised upon him, saying: "The allegation and proof then were that testator was imposed on and did not speak his own will. Was it not a proper answer that he did what for twenty years he had intended to do, and therefore there could be no imposition? And if this be a proper answer, shall not the defendant be permitted to prove it? And can it be proved in a better way than by the testator's acts and declarations? I am aware of none." Chief Justice Kirkpatrick considered that the declarations were not competent for the purpose indicated, and Rossell, J., expressed no opinion upon the subject.

In Day v. Day, 3 N. J. Eq. 549, antecedent declarations of the deceased as to his testamentary intentions were received in evidence, and were considered by the prerogative court to support the conclusion that a paper offered for probate as his last will and testament was signed by him without being acquainted with its contents.

In Boylan v. Meeker, 15 N. J. Eq. 310, which was a controversy in the prerogative court over the probate of the will of Jonathan M. Meeker, and where the allegation of the caveators was that the paper offered for probate was not the genuine will of the deceased, it was held that it was competent for the caveators to show that the provisions of the contested will were contrary to the expressed intentions, views, and feelings of the deceased before the time at which it bore date.

In the later case of Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274, which was an action in ejectment between the same parties, and where one of the questions in issue was whether or not the alleged will of Meeker was a forgery, Whelpley, J., in delivering the leading opinion for the supreme court, refused to follow its earlier decision in Den v. Vancleve, and, after a review of many of the cases upon both sides of the question, concluded that "the decision of this case upon principle and the great weight of authority requires the rejection of evidence of the testator's declarations, whether made before or after the execution of a will, either to support or destroy its validity, when the declarations are offered as evidence of the facts declared, and not as showing soundness or unsoundness of mind." Opinion, page 294 of 5 N. J. L.

The first case where this question was mooted in this court, so far as my examination of our decisions has disclosed, was the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) celebrated litigation over the will of Dr. Vanderveer, decided ten years later than Boylan v. Meeker, reported sub nom. Harris v. Vanderveer, 21 N. J. Eq. 561. One of the questions litigated in that case was whether the signature of Dr. Vanderveer to his will had been fraudulently procured, without a full knowledge on his part of its contents. Both sides put in evidence declarations of the deceased, showing his testamentary intentions. Those declarations were received without objection, and were considered, not only by the court below, but by this court, in reaching a conclusion upon the merits. Van Syckel, J., who delivered the opinion of this court, was careful to guard against the conclusion that this court, by its action, affirmed the admissibility of such evidence, by the following statement: "It is proper to say that it is not intended to intimate any opinion as to the admissibility of the testator's declarations before and after the execution of the will; they have been used in the argument on both sides without objection, each party claiming a benefit from them." This statement was undoubtedly called forth by the fact that the prior decisions of the supreme court and the prerogative court were not in harmony upon this question, and that this court was not willing to declare itself upon the one side of it or the other, until appropriate occasion for doing so should arise.

In the case of Rusling v. Rusling, 36 N. J. Eq. 603, the question was again touched upon by this court. A caveat had been filed against the will of Gersham Rusling, deceased, upon the ground that it was the product of undue influence. The caveators offered to prove declarations of the testator respecting the conduct toward him of the favored legatees. The purpose of the offer was to prove the facts stated by the deceased. On the trial in the court of first instance, before the late Chief Justice Beasley and a jury, that distinguished jurist stated in his charge that the declarations were not competent for that purpose; that they were only competent for the purpose of showing the effect upon the testator of the exercise of the alleged power or dominion which the favored legatees were said to possess over him. Added weight is given to the chief justice's exposition of the law by the fact that he presided in this court when Harris v. Vanderveer was decided. Chancellor Runyon, when the case came into the prerogative court for review, thus dealt with the question: "That charge (i. e., the charge of the chief justice to the jury) was in accordance with the settled law on the subject in this state, although it has never been so declared, indeed, by the court of last resort." See his opinion, 35 N. J. Eq. 129. When the case came into this court, Dixon, J., delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, thus deals with the question (page 607 of 36 N. J. Eq.): "These declarations are not admissible as evidence of the facts which they were offered to prove. When undue influence is set up in impeachment of a will, the ground of invalidity to be established is that the conduct of others has so operated upon the testator's mind as to constrain him to execute an instrument to which, of his free will, he would not have assented. This involves two things: First, the conduct of those by whom the influence is said to have been exerted; second, the mental state of the testator, as produced by such conduct, which may require a disclosure of the strength of mind of the decedent and his testamentary purposes, both immediately before the conduct complained of, and while subjected to its influence. In order to show the testator's mental state at any given time, his declarations at that time are competent, because the conditions of the mind are revealed to us only by its external manifestations, of which speech is one. Likewise, the state of the mind at one time is competent evidence of its state at other times not too remote, because mental conditions have some degree of permanency. Hence, in an inquiry respecting the testator's state of mind before or pending the exertion of the alleged influence, his words, as well as his other behavior, may be shown for the purpose of bringing into view the mental condition which produced them, and, through that, the antecedent and subsequent conditions. To this extent his declarations have legal value. But for the purpose of proving matters not related to his existing mental state, the assertions of the testator are mere hearsay. . . . There is no legal principle upon which they can be treated as evidence of acts constituting undue influence. The weight of authority touching this matter is in accordance with true principle, but it is not necessary here to review the cases. In Boylan v. Meeker, 28 N. J. L. 274, Whelpley, J., refers to many of them, examining the point with much care, and more recently, in Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112, Colt, J., has discussed the subject with great clearness of discrimination; the conclusions in both opinions being that at which we have arrived."

From a cursory reading of the concluding portion of this extract it might be thought that this court concurred completely in the views expressed by Justice Whelpley in the Boylan v. Meeker Case. But this is clearly not so. The only question for determination in the Rusling Case was whether the declarations of a testator were evidential of the acts referred to in them. The conclusion reached was that they were not. This conclusion is identical with that reached both in Boylan v. Meeker and in Shailer v. Bumstead. The question whether such declarations were admissible to show the state of mind of a testator—his testamentary intentions—was not before the court, and what was said by Justice Dixon upon that point, as well as what was said by Chief Justice Beasley and Chancellor Runyon in the earlier stages of the case, was purely obiter. That Justice Dixon's view upon that point was no part of the conclusion, which he declared was the same as that expressed in Boylan v. Meeker, and Shailer v. Bumstead, is apparent, not only from the fact that those two cases are absolutely opposed to one another upon this question, as the above-cited extracts from the opinions in those cases show, but also from the further fact that the conclusion in the Boylan v. Meeker Case upon this point is opposed to his own obiter expressions in the case he was considering.

In Re Gordon, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 424, 26 Atl. 268, 278, declarations of the testator "which made for or against the authenticity of the disputed will" were held by Chancellor McGill, sitting as ordinary, to be incompetent, on the authority of Boylan v. Meeker and Rusling v. Rusling. The purpose for which the declarations were offered is not stated in the opinion of the court. It is impossible, therefore, to determine whether the case is an authority against the admissibility of the declarations of the testator for the purpose of proving his intention at the time they were made, with relation to the making or not making a testamentary disposition of his property. It is also to be observed that the decree of the prerogative court was affirmed, when the case came into this court, without any expression of opinion on the subject of the propriety of excluding these declarations. Gordon v. Old, 52 N. J. Eq. 317, 30 Atl. 19.

In Davis v. Elliott, 55 N. J. Eq. 473, 36 Atl. 1092, Chancellor McGill, sitting in the prerogative court, took into consideration declarations of the testatrix showing her testamentary intentions with relation to the caveator, in determining the question whether the alleged will was a forgery. This decision, rendered five years after that promulgated by him in the Gordon Case, would seem to justify the inference that the later case was not considered by him to be in conflict with the earlier one, and that the rejected declarations in the Gordon Case were not offered to prove the state of mind of the testator, but for the same purpose which led to their rejection in the Rusling Case, viz., as evidence of the facts declared.

From this résumé of the New Jersey cases it appears that the prerogative court, from its decision in Day v. Day, in the year 1831, down to that in Davis v. Elliott, in 1897, has consistently held to the view (with the possible exception of the Gordon Case) that antecedent declarations of the testator are competent for the purpose of showing that the provisions of a contested will are contrary to, or in harmony with, his intentions, views, and feelings, as exhibited by those declarations; that the supreme court at one time held the same view, but subsequently repudiated it, and held that such declarations were competent only for the purpose of showing mental capacity, or lack of it, in the testator; and that this court has not, up to this time, been called upon definitely to decide the question, but has obiter expressed the view that such declarations are competent for the purpose of showing the state of mind of the testator, when his state of mind at the time of making the declarations is germane to the issue being tried.

The present case now requires us to declare our conclusion upon this question, and it is this: That the true rule is that stated by Prof. Wigmore in his very able treatise on the Law of Evidence (§ 1735), viz., that where the issue is whether a will was executed, or whether a will was made to have a certain tenor or provision, the pre-existing testamentary design of the alleged testator is always relevant; and to evidence the existence of that design, his antecedent statements are admissible, when not too remote to be material.

The excluded declarations of Mr. Russell, tending to show his testamentary design, are those referred to in the opinion of the supreme court as being made the subject of the seventeenth and eighteenth assignments of error in that court, and those contained in the proffered testimony of Elisha Doremus. These declarations were not rejected as too remote in point of time, but solely upon the ground that they were hearsay. Under the rule which we have declared, they were not objectionable upon that ground, and should have been admitted, unless it had been made to appear that they were so remote as to be immaterial upon the issue whether the paper writing dated thirteen days before the death of Mr. Russell was, in fact, his last will and testament, or whether it was a forgery. Their exclusion was, we think, harmful error.

It is proper that we should say, before closing, that, in the state of our decisions as they existed at the time when this case was tried, the trial court was not only justified in following the decision of the supreme court in Boylan v. Mecker, but was under a legal obligation to do so; and that 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the supreme court itself was also required to pursue the same course, unless it considered that decision to be manifestly unsound.

The exclusion of the declarations of the testator makes it necessary to reverse the judgment under review, and to order a new trial.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
EX REL. WILLIAM A. BARTLETT et al., Appts.,

v.

FRED A. BUSSE et al.

(238 Ill. 593, 87 N. E. 840.)

Intoxicating liquors — Sunday law — operation of statute.

1. Illinois Crim. Code, § 259, providing punishment for one who keeps open on Sunday a place where intoxicating liquor is sold, is in force in Chicago.

Mandamus — enforcement of law.

2. Mandamus will not lie to compel the mayor of a city to enforce the Sunday closing law against a saloon keeper.

(February 19, 1909.)

Note. — Mandamus to compel public officials to enforce the liquor law.

The weight of authority seems to hold with the principal case, that public officers cannot be compelled by mandamus to enforce the liquor laws, since this would involve the ordering of a course of action which is, to some extent, discretionary, and which it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the courts to enforce.

In Gowan v. Smith, 157 Mich. 443, 122 N. W. 286 (decided since PEOPLE EX REL. BARTLETT v. BUSSE, it was held that mandamus would not issue to compel a police commissioner of a municipality to enforce the law of the state relating to the closing of saloons on Sunday, by making complaint for its violation, and obtaining the arrest of the offender, as that was a discretionary executive power, and should not be subjected to the control of the courts, except in cases of gross and manifest abuse. In that case it appeared that numerous complaints had been made because of previous violations of the law, and that the cases were then pending in the courts, which was also averred in the petition for the writ. After disposing of the contention that the police commissioner had the right summarily to close a saloon found open at times forbidden by law, upon the ground that the statute was unconstitutional, the court held that the only action which the relator could demand from the officer was that he proceed to collect evidence against that particular offending saloon keeper, and if such evidence was found by him to be sufficiently conclusive to warrant the making of a complaint, then to APPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County, dismissing a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the mayor of Chicago to enforce the Sunday closing law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Church & McMurdy and Walter J. Miller, for appellants:

The Sunday closing law of Illinois is in full force in the city of Chicago.

The mayor has no discretion as to the duty to enforce the law.

make such complaint, and to proceed in the ordinary orderly prosecution thereof. The court also said that should the writ issue in that case, the officer, in obeying the mandate of the court in that respect, would be bound to use the discretion with which he was clothed; that he was charged not alone with the execution of the liquor laws of the state within the city, but likewise with the suppression of all crime and the conservation of the peace; and that to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by law, he was supplied with certain limited means, and that it was entirely obvious that he must exercise sound discretion as to how those means should be applied for the good of the community; that he could not draw the entire police force at his command from their ordinary duties, and detail them to collect evidence against lawbreaking saloon keepers, lest other crimes should multiply; that a certain portion of his force was so employed was apparent from the averments of the petition, and that the writ should not issue unless the court was prepared to exercise a constant or recurring supervision over the daily acts of the police commissioner, and a definite control of the discretion with which he was clothed by law; and that that could not be done. An able dissenting opinion was also rendered in the case.

And in State ex rel. Hawes v. Brewer, 39 Wash. 65, 109 Am. St. Rep. 858, 80 Pac. 1001, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 197, mandamus to compel the sheriff of a county and the marshal of a city to make complaints and prosecute the persons who violated the laws of the state against keeping saloons open for trade on Sunday was denied on the ground that mandamus will not lie to compel a general course of official conduct, because it is impossible for the court to oversee the performance of such duties. The court also pointed out that the statute provided a remedy against public officers who refuse or neglect to inform against and prosecute such offenders, by fine and removal from office, which must be resorted to by the citizen in case of violation of duty by the officer.

Ohio C. C. 332 (reversing 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 256), it was held that mandamus would not lie to compel the superintendent of police of a city to enforce the Sunday closing laws, where the failure to perform such duties was a ground for his removal from office. The court said that mandamus would not lie to compel a general course of official conduct, and that the remedy provided (removal of the officer) was not only adequate, but was much more appropriate than mandamus to compel him to do his duty.

But in Goodell v. Woodbury, 71 N. H. 378, 52 Atl. 855, it was held that a remedy by removal of the officer would not prevent mandamus to compel a chief of police to prosecute violations of the liquor law. The court said: "This remedy is clearly not an adequate one. At most it cannot enforce the duty in question, and leaves the required act still unperformed. It is a fundamental rule that a remedy which does not compel specific performance is inadequate and constitutes no bar to a writ of mandamus. To supersede it a party must not only have a specific, adequate, legal remedy, but one competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of his application, and which is equally speedy, convenient, complete, and beneficial." In that case the petition requested the enforcement of the general public statutes relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, and especially the section which provided for fine and imprisonment of the certain named offenders. The contention was made that courts would not issue a writ where it involved a long series of continuous acts, and virtually amounted to a supervision by the court of the enforcement of the law by municipal officers. The court said: "Conceding that mandamus may not be an appropriate remedy to compel a long series of continuous acts, there is no reason to apprehend that such acts will be necessary in the present case, but quite the contrary. Neither the petition nor the order of the court necessarily requires continuous action by the defendant. He is merely required, and in accordance with his legal duty, to enforce the provisions of § 16 against the specified parties, but in no particular way; in other words, 'to put himself in motion,' to substitute action for nonaction, prohibition for permission, and to do a specific thing which experience has shown to be so efficacious against violators of that section that repeated prosecutions of them are rarely found to be necessary."

And in State ex rel. Lay v. Hoboken, 75 N. J. L. 315, 67 Atl. 1024, it was held that mandamus requiring a municipal board to order, upon resolution or otherwise, the exposure on Sunday of the interior of bars or business rooms in a city in which intoxicating liquors are sold, as required by state law, may issue upon application of a private relator who is a resident and taxpayer of the municipal district. The court said that the duty thus pointed out by statute to licensing bodies is a ministerial one clearly mandatory, and that mandamus is the proper remedy to enforce performance by public boards of such duties. It was also held that mandamus would not be denied on the ground that there was a remedy by indictment. The court said that indictment would not furnish a complete remedy, for while it might be the means of punishing the delinquent members, it would leave the public duty still unperformed, and that to justify the refusal of the writ on that ground, the other remedy must be specific and adequate.

And in State ex rel. School Dist. v. Cummings, 17 Neb. 311, 22 N. W. 545, it was held that the writ of mandamus would issue to compel the city marshal to perform duties required of him by a law which made it his duty to notify unlicensed liquor dealers to cease the traffic, and to make complaint against all those selling without a license.

In State ex rel. Wear v. Francis, 95 Mo. 44, 8 S. W. 1, it was held that while mandamus would issue to compel the board of police commissioners to vacate an order directing the chief of police not to interfere with the sale of wine or beer on Sunday, which was prohibited by the state law, it would not issue to compel the board to arrest and prosecute certain named persons for past violations of the law against selling fermented liquors on Sunday.

Cases involving the question of the right to issue mandamus to compel a revocation of the license to sell intoxicating liquors because of violations of the law have been excluded from this note.

A writ of mandamus will not lie to compel the performance of discretionary duties.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was a petition for a writ of mandamus, filed on December 21, 1906, in the superior court of Cook county, at the relation of William A. Bartlett, A. Lincoln Shute, and Robert J. Bennett, against Edward F. Dunne, then mayor of Chicago, and Michael Kenna, proprietor of two licensed dramshops in the city of Chicago. Kenna demurred to the petition and Dunne answered. The petitioner demurred to the answer. The court by the same order sustained the demurrer to the petition, and overruled the demurrer to the answer. Petitioner stood by its petition and by its demurrer to the answer. Thereupon final judgment was entered against it. That judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court for the first district, and a further appeal is prosecuted to this court. While the case was pending in the appellate court, the term of Dunne as mayor expired, and his successor, Fred A. Busse, was substituted as an appellee.

The petition, so far as material, avers that Kenna is the owner of two licensed dramshops in Chicago; that he is operating them by virtue of licenses issued for a period beginning November 1, 1906, and ending April 30, 1907; that in the conduct of said saloons Kenna has openly, habitually, and continually violated § 259 of the Criminal Code (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1908, chap. 38), which provides, "Whoever keeps open any tippling house or place where liquor is sold or given away upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be fined not exceeding $200;" that the mayor had knowledge of these habitual violations of the section in question by Kenna as they occurred, and that he has made no attempt in any way to enforce or compel the observance of this statute, and that he will hereafter continue to permit Kenna to disregard that statute, and will permit Kenna habitually to keep his dramshops open on Sundays, and will fail and refuse to take any steps or measures to compel Kenna to observe that statute; that the ordinances of the city of Chicago provide that, if the mayor shall be satisfied at any time that liquor is sold, served, or given away in a dramshop contrary to the laws of the state or the ordinances of the city, he may revoke the license of the keeper. The prayer of the petition is that the mayor be commanded to use without delay, so far as may be necessary, every means, power, and authority conferred upon him by the laws of the state or the ordinances of the city to enforce against Kenna the statute above quoted, by closing, or compelling Kenna to close, his saloons, and keep the same closed on each and every Sunday after the writ of mandamus issues; and, in case of Kenna's refusal to obey the law, to secure his prosecution therefor, and to punish such violation of the law by a revocation of Kenna's licenses. The answer filed by former Mayor Dunne, as set out in appellees' brief, avers that said § 259 of the state law is not in force in the city of Chicago. If this averment were true, it would of necessity dispose of this case. But it is not true. That section is the law in Chicago, precisely as it is the law in all other parts of the state. The mayor of a city is charged with the execution of all laws and ordinances in force therein. Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1908, chap. 24, p. 311, § 23. It is to be observed that the petition does not seek to have the mayor commanded to do any specific act or any series of specific acts, that the relators have no property rights that will be affected by the event of the suit, and have no interest in the enforcement against Kenna of the statute in question except the interest which they possess in common with other members of the public.

The case of People ex rel. Bartlett v. Dunne, 219 Ill. 346, 76 N. E. 570, was a motion made in this court for leave to file here an original petition for mandamus at the relation of the same persons who are the relators in the present proceeding. In that case the purpose was to have the mayor of the city of Chicago commanded by this court to enforce the statute in question against all persons in the city of Chicago engaged in the business of selling liquor, it being there alleged that all the dramshops in the city, about 7,000 in number, were and would be habitually kept open on the Sabbath Day, in violation of law, and that the mayor refused to enforce the law. The prayer of the petition which accompanied the motion in that case was not different from the prayer of the petition in the case at bar, except that in the earlier case it was sought to have the mayor commanded to enforce the statute in question against all the dramshop keepers in the city of Chicago, while in the case now before us it is sought to have him enforce this law against Kenna alone, who is the keeper of two dramshops.

In People ex rel. Bartlett v. Dunne, supra, leave to file the petition was denied for three reasons: First, because mandamus will not be awarded except where the duty is specific in its nature, and of such character that the court can prescribe a definite act or series of acts which will constitute a performance of that duty, so that the respondent may know precisely what he is to do, and the court may know whether the precise act or acts have been performed,—the duty which it was there sought to have the mayor perform not being of that character; second, because the petitioner improperly sought to have the court control and regulate a general course of official conduct, and enforce the performance of official duties generally, with reference to violations of the law which it was alleged would occur in the future; third, because to grant the prayer of the petition would be for the court to wrongfully assume the management of the municipal affairs of the city, and to assume governmental functions which are lodged in the executive department. The opinion in that case was announced orally from the bench, and while no authorities were then specifically referred to, the propositions of law there announced are fundamental and abundantly supported by precedent. Merrill, Mandamus, §§ 31, 69; People ex rel. Billings v. Bissell, 19 Ill. 229, 68 Am. Dec. 591; The Secretary v. McGarahan (Cox v. United States) 9 Wall. 298, 19 L. ed. 579; People ex rel. Hammond v. Leonard, 74 N. Y. 443; State ex rel. Wear v. Francis, 95 Mo. 44, 8 S. W. 1; State ex rel. Hawes v. Brewer, 39 Wash. 65, 109 Am. St. Rep. 858, 80 Pac. 1001, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 197; Alger v. Seaver, 138 Mass. 331; Boyne v. Ryan, 100 Cal. 265, 34 Pac. 707; Mitchell v. Boardman, 79 Me. 469, 10 Atl. 452; People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Whipple, 41 Mich. 548, 49 N. W. 922; People ex rel. Cady v. Ihnken, 129 Mich. 466, 89 N. W. 72; Sweet v. Smith, 153 Mich. 674, 117 N. W. 59; Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 52 L. ed. 714, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 932, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441. Appellants contend, however, that People ex rel. Bartlett v. Dunne, supra, differs essentially from this case in two particulars: First, it is said that the petition in that case, being addressed to this court, brought the petitioner within the rule that this court would exercise its discretion in every instance where a motion for leave to file a petition for mandamus was made in this court, as to whether it would entertain the petition, and that in doing so it would not consider itself bound by any strict rule. While counsel do not state accurately the rule in reference to the circumstances under which we will entertain an original petition for mandamus, yet it clearly appears that the distinction claimed does not exist, for the reason that our decision in the earlier case was not placed on the ground that the petitioner had stated a cause of which we would, in the exercise of our discretion, refuse to take jurisdiction as an original proceeding. The second particular in which it is said the cases differ is found in the fact that by the petition which accompanied the motion in People ex rel. Bartlett v. Dunne, supra, it was sought to have the mayor commanded to enforce the statute in question as to all dramshops within the city of Chicago, while in the present case the duty which the mayor is to perform is to enforce the statute against Kenna and his two saloons. This is not a material difference. No authority is cited which recognizes such a distinction. Every objection to commanding the mayor to enforce this law with reference to 7,000 saloons, suggested in People ex rel. Bartlett v. Dunne, supra, applies in lesser degree to commanding him to enforce it with reference to one owner and two saloons. If counsel for appellants be correct, by the institution of 7,000 suits instead of one, the courts could be required to exercise precisely the supervision over the mayor that we held in the Dunne Case they could not be required to exercise. Counsel for appellants confuse the functions of the executive and judicial departments of government. If their contention were to prevail, the mandate of the court would be substituted for the statute which denounces misfeasance and malfeasance in office.

It is impossible within an opinion of any reasonable length to discuss the numerous cases cited and quoted from by counsel for appellants in the 168 pages of brief and argument presented. It seems proper, however, to refer briefly to the cases of Brokaw v. Highway Comrs. 130 Ill. 482, 6 L.R.A. 161, 22 N. E. 596, and People ex rel. Faulkner v. Harris, 203 Ill. 272, 96 Am. St. Rep. 304, 67 N. E. 785, upon which they place great reliance. In the first of these cases the commissioners were required by mandamus to remove an obstruction in a public highway, in accordance with a statute which made it their duty so to do. In the second, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Champaign were required by mandamus to remove an obstruction in or an encroachment upon a street. In the Brokaw Case it was held that the commissioners were, as to the removal, without discretion, and that it was their duty under the law to remove the obstruction. The obstruction then existed in the highway. The mandate of the court was in reference to an existing condition. A specific act was directed. It was not necessary to supervise generally the official conduct of the officers in reference to violations of the law which it was alleged would take place in the future. It is not here sought to have the mayor commanded to do a specific thing in reference to a violation of the law which has already taken place, but the purpose is to have him commanded to enforce the statute above set out, which he might do in any one or all of several ways, against Kenna in reference to his two dramshops so far as future violations of that statute are concerned. The case is thus readily distinguished from the case at bar. The Champaign Case is not different from the Brokaw Case, so far as the matters here material are concerned.

Upon the motion of appellees, the superior court struck out certain averments contained in the petition as originally filed. Exceptions to this action of the court do not seem to have been properly preserved, but, regardless of that question, the averments stricken were, under our view of the law, as above expressed, immaterial.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF KANSAS EX REL. JOSEPH TAGGART, County Attorney, et al.,

v.

F. M. HOLCOMB, County Clerk.

CUDAHY PACKING COMPANY, Intervener.

(81 Kan. 879, 106 Pac. 1030.)

Mandamus — assessment of taxes — correction.

1. Mandamus is an appropriate remedy to compel a county clerk to enter upon the tax rolls taxable property omitted from the assessor's returns, where such officer admits the existence and value of the property, but declines to correct the assessment and enter it upon the tax rolls because of a contention that the property is not taxable, and because he is in doubt as to his power in the premises.

Taxation — omitted property — adding after settlement.

2. Taxable property not listed for taxation nor returned by the assessor may be added to the tax rolls by the county clerk after the settlement with the county treasurer in October of the year the assessment should have been made, and after the tax rolls have been turned over to the county treasurer.

Same — finished product of manufacturer — taxability.

3. The finished product of a manufacturer is subject to taxation, and it is his duty to list such property, and, where it has not been listed by the owner nor returned by the assessor, it is the duty of the county clerk or the board of county commissioners to take steps to correct the assessor's return, and of the county clerk to enter such omitted property on the tax rolls.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Is property for which no method of taxation is prescribed subject to taxation under a statute declaring that all property not exempt shall be taxed "in the manner provided by this act."

The argument of the property owner in the foregoing case apparently was that notwithstanding the general statute provided that all property not expressly exempt should be subject to taxation, and the finished product was undeniable property, and not expressly exempted, still it was not subject to taxation, inasmuch as the statute did not expressly provide the manner in which it should be taxed. It would seem that the decision is undeniably correct. It is a general rule that exemptions are never presumed, and the fact that a method of taxing the finished product had not been provided would appear insufficient to overcome the express provision that all property should be taxed, aided as that express provision is by the general presumption against exemptions not expressly made.

A very similar question arose in State ex

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was brought by the state of Kansas, on the relation of Joseph Taggart as county attorney, and also the board of county commissioners of Wyandotte county, against F. M. Holcomb, county clerk of Wyandotte county, to compel that officer to add to the personal statement of the Cudahy Packing Company property, termed the "finished product," of the value of $498,178.41, which had not been listed by it or returned by the assessor, and to enter the same on the tax rolls of the county. Proceedings were instituted in August, 1909, to correct the property statement of the company and to add this property to the tax rolls, and in October, 1909, the company made and filed with the board of county commissioners a written statement showing the amount on hand in March, 1908, and in each succeeding month of the tax year, and that the average value of the finished product of their packing business was $498,178.41. In November, 1909, the board made an order requiring the county clerk to correct the returns of the assessment and add this amount to the tax rolls; but the county clerk, while admitting that he had information that the property had been omitted from the assessor's returns and was of the value stated, answered that the company contended that the omitted property was not taxable, and, further, that the county clerk had no power to add omitted property after November 1, 1909, and, being doubtful of his own power, he declined to make the correction until ordered to do so by a court of competent jurisdiction. After this proceeding had been commenced, the Cudahy Packing Company intervened, and, among other things, alleged that it was engaged exclusively in the manufacturing business, and that its finished product was in no event subject to taxation, that its taxable property had been listed and returned by the assessor, and that a check for the amount of taxes due on its assessment had been delivered to the county treasurer and accepted by him, and that neither the board of county commissioners nor the county clerk had authority to add omitted property at the time when the order mentioned had been made.

Three propositions arising on the answer of the company have been argued and submitted for decision: First. Can mandamus be employed to compel the county clerk to place omitted personal property on the tax rolls? Second. Is there any power in the county clerk or the board to correct returns or to add omitted property after the October settlement with the county treasurer has been made and after the tax rolls have been delivered to the county treasurer? Third. Is the finished product of a manufacturer taxable?

On the first proposition there can be little chance for controversy. Mandamus is an appropriate remedy to compel an officer to perform a duty which the law enjoins upon him. The statute requires the county clerk to enter upon the tax rolls personal property subject to taxation, which has not been listed by the owner or returned by the assessor. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7599. In an inquest, of which the company had notice, it rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746, where the relator contended that although the general statutes provided that all property not expressly exempt was taxable, and a special statute provided that the exemption provided for railroads should not apply to railroads operated by cable or electrical power, nevertheless street railway franchises, which were not expressly exempted, were not taxable, as the statute made no provision for their valuation as it had made for the other property of the company. It was held, however, that an exemption could not be presumed from a mere failure to indicate detailed directions for valuing and taxing property. The contention seems admirably answered by the court when it says. "The cardinal requirement is that as property they [franchises] shall be taxed. All else is matter of method and detail."

And in Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Judson, 21 Wash. 49, 57 L.R.A. 78, 56 Pac. 829, where practically the same question arose, the court, after quoting at length from the Anderson Case, said that the objection to the assessment in the case at bar, because the method had not been prescribed by the legislature, was sufficiently answered by the Anderson Case.

has been ascertained that personal property belonging to the company was not listed by it or returned by the assessor, and that it is of a certain value. This is confessed by the county clerk, who declines to correct the assessment and make the entry as the statute requires, because of a claim of the owner that the property is exempt from taxation, and a desire on his part to have a judicial decision of the question before he takes action. In effect he says, the property is owned by the company. It was not listed or returned. It is of a certain value, but a question of law has arisen whether such property is taxable, and hence "I refuse to make the entry." Assuming that the property is taxable, the duty of the county clerk is clear. He has no alternative but to make the entry, and no right to postpone action until a court has determined it to be his duty. As to the propriety of the state employing mandamus to require official action there is no room for contention. The action is brought in the name of the state by the county attorney, who for this purpose represents the people of the state.

On the second proposition, it is contended that the time has passed in which the assessment may be corrected, or omitted property entered upon the tax rolls. The statute provides that the board and the county clerk may take action to correct an assessment and add omitted property "at any time before the final settlement with the county treasurer." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7599. In this matter there was no delay nor lack of diligence on the part of the county officers. Proceedings to make the correction were instituted in August, and the only apparent reason for the delay was the opposition of the company, which, although admitting the existence of the property and its omission from the tax rolls, resisted every effort to place it upon the tax rolls. A party cannot escape taxation by contesting the right of officers to impose a tax, and keeping it in litigation beyond the time fixed by law for making the assessment. Nor is an officer justified in setting up the excuse in a mandamus proceeding, that the time fixed by statute to do the act has passed, when it was his own failure to perform the duty within the statutory time which made it necessary to bring the mandamus proceeding. An officer cannot, by failure to perform a duty, nullify the statute imposing it, nor defeat the public in compelling performance where it takes reasonably prompt action to enforce performance. In Lewis v. Marshall County, 16 Kan. 102, 22 Am. Rep. 275, it is said: "As a general rule, when a duty is at the proper time asked to be done and improperly refused to be done, the right to compel it to be done is fixed, and is not destroyed by the lapse of the time within which in the first place the duty ought to have been done." p. 108. See also State ex rel. Wilson v. Kearny County, 42 Kan. 739, 22 Pac. 735. Aside from these considerations, the time in which omitted property might be added by the clerk had not passed. It is contended that the October settlement mentioned in the statute, before which the correction must be made, is the settlement of the year in which the assessment is made, and reference is made to the ferret cases of Douglas County v. Lane, 76 Kan. 12, 90 Pac. 1092, and Jackson County v. Kaul, 77 Kan. 715, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 552, 96 Pac. 45. These cases are disposed of upon the theory that the statute has fixed an absolute limitation for the revision of the tax rolls or the imposing of taxes on omitted property. It was held that when the October settlement is had between the treasurer and the county commissioners of the financial affairs of the county, and a new set of accounts, transactions, and proceedings is started, and the business of the year is closed up, the right to impose additional taxes for that year is ended. The accounts and transactions arising out of the assessment and tax proceedings of 1909 cannot, in the nature of things, be settled and closed up until the October settlement of 1910. Although not definitely stated the settlement referred to is manifestly the one following the levy and collection of taxes for the preceding tax year. When the taxes are extended by the county clerk and the tax rolls are turned over to the treasurer, he collects the taxes, apportions them among the various funds and different municipalities, and, that being done, he makes a final settlement. It was evidently the intention of the legislature that a revision might be made or omitted property added until the tax proceedings, including the assessment and collection of the taxes, had been completed, and a settlement thereon had with the county treasurer. That was the view taken in Lappin v. Nemaha County, 6 Kan. 403, where proceedings to revise the assessment and to add omitted property were taken before the board of county commissioners in December after the tax roll had been turned over to the county treasurer. The right to make a revision at that time was directly challenged, and the court said the "county commissioners have authority in December and January, after the tax roll has passed into the hands of the treasurer, to place on the tax roll property omitted by the assessor, and charge up the proper taxes thereon." Syllabus. That the power of the county clerk to enter omitted property for taxation does not end with the October settlement of the year when the assessment is made is indicated by the provision relating to the taxation of merchants, which is to the effect that parties who begin merchandizing after March 1st and before November 1st, and whose property has not been listed in another county, shall report to the county clerk the average value employed in the business during this period, and it is the duty of that officer to enter the property upon the assessment rolls, and it is taxed the same as if returned by the assessors. This provision necessarily contemplates action by the county clerk after the October settlement by the county treasurer. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7543. Another provision in the county officers' act makes it the duty of the county treasurer, in case he shall learn that property subject to taxation has not been assessed, to notify the county clerk, who is required to place the same on the tax roll. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 1669. It has been suggested that this ancient provision has been superseded by § 7599, and it may well be argued that the specific provisions of the latter section will control the county clerk as to the time and manner of correcting assessments. There remains in the section, however, the admonition to the county treasurer that, when he learns of property not upon the tax roll, he shall notify the county clerk of the omission, and thus aid in bringing it upon the tax roll and subjecting it to taxation. These statutory provisions, although only incidental to the question, tend in some degree to support the view that corrections may be made after the October settlement following the assessment.

Is the finished product of a manufacturer subject to taxation? This question depends alone upon the interpretation of our statutes, and little aid can be derived from either argument or illustration. The property in question is tangible and subject to ownership, and is, of course, taxable unless it is exempted by force of some statutory provision. The statute provides that "all property in this state, real and personal, not expressly exempt therefrom shall be subject to taxation in the manner prescribed in this act." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7502; Laws 1907, chap. 408, § 1. The legislature defines the word "property" as used in the act relating to taxation to "mean and include every kind of property subject to ownership." Laws 1907, chap. 408, § 1. There being no question as to the existence of ownership of the property spoken of as the finished product, what reason is there for exempting it from taxation? The general theory of the law is that all property shall contribute equally to the support of the government. It is competent for the legislature to exempt property from taxation, but to the extent that one is relieved from this burden it is necessarily imposed on others, and hence, before a person can have such a discrimination in his favor, he must clearly show it to have been within the legislative purpose. The policy of our law being to tax all property not expressly exempt, it devolves on one claiming to have been relieved from paying his share of the public burden to find and clearly point out an express constitutional or statutory exemption. So it has been said: "Any person claiming immunity from the common burdens of taxation, which should rest equally upon all, must bring himself clearly within the exemption, and hence it is held that a provision creating an exemption should be strictly construed." Ottawa University v. Franklin County, 48 Kan. 460, 29 Pac. 599. See also Washburn College v. Shawnee County, 8 Kan. 344; Stahl v. Kansas Educational Asso. 54 Kan. 542, 38 Pac. 796; National Council K. & L. S. v. Phillips, 63 Kan. 808, 66 Pac. 1014; Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. 356.

Now we have a provision enumerating the articles and classes of property that are exempt, and the finished product of manufacturers is not among those named. Laws 1907, chap. 408, § 2. It is contended that the statute providing that all property not expressly exempt shall be subject to taxation is qualified by the added clause, "in the manner prescribed in this act." Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7502. The argument is that this clause in effect limits taxation to the kinds of property specially named in the act, that the finished product cannot be taxed until it is named as one of the subjects of taxation, and that up to this time the legislature has omitted to make provision for taxing it. It has provided a method for taxing the raw material which the manufacture has on hand, and, since the manufactured product was not included in this provision, it is argued that the legislature did not intend that it should be taxed. The clause referred to relates to the method of imposing taxes upon property already declared to be subject to taxation. It is not a limitation on the declaration that all property not expressly exempted shall be subject to taxation. It deals with methods, not subjects, of taxation. Various methods are prescribed for the assessment and taxation of the different classes of property. The act prescribes one method for listing and assessing the property of banks, another for the property of merchants and certain property of manufacturers, another for telegraph and telephone property, and still others for railroad and other kinds of property, and as to the property for which no special manner is prescribed as to listing and valuation there is a general rule that all property shall be listed and valued as of the 1st day of March. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7514. Then there are many provisions prescribing in detail the duties of owners as well as assessors and other taxing officers respecting the assessment and collection of taxes. As to manufacturers, it is provided that, when they list their property for taxation, they shall also return the average amount of material purchased or held to be used in manufacturing, refining, or combining which they have had on hand during the preceding year. This is to be ascertained by taking the amount on hand in each month, and dividing the aggregate by the number of months of the year they have been engaged in business. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7545. Another section specially provides that they shall list the value of engines, tools, and machinery, which form no part of the real estate. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7546. The fact that the legislature prescribes a special manner for taxing the raw material held for manufacturing purposes does not mean that other tangible property of the owner shall escape taxation. Except as limited by the Constitution, the whole matter of taxation is within the discretion and power of the legislature. It may choose its own methods of assessment and different ones for different classes of property. It may give specific directions as to the manner in which officers shall determine valuations, but the absence of such directions as to a class of property does not argue that such property is not taxable under a general provision. State ex rel. Milwaukee Street R. Co. v. Anderson, 90 Wis. 550, 63 N. W. 746. The section providing a method for assessing raw material proceeds on the theory that the manufacturer shall list his other property. The fact that a manner of valuing one kind of property is prescribed does not warrant the inference that another kind of property shall be exempt from taxation. The provision that all property shall be taxed unless expressly exempted precludes the making of a mere implied exemption. Reference has been made to the statutes and rules of Ohio and some other states, but none of them are of special value in interpreting our own statute. The property, not having been expressly exempted, must be listed and valued the same as other tangible property for which a special method has been prescribed.

On the questions submitted on the pleadings, it must be held that mandamus is a proper remedy to compel the entry on the tax rolls of omitted property, that such corrections and entry may be made after the tax rolls are turned over to the county treasurer, and that the finished product of a manufacturer is subject to taxation.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

BLACKROCK COPPER MINING & MILLING COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

CHARLES S. TINGEY, Respt.

(34 Utah, 369, 98 Pac. 180.)

Tax — corporate franchise.

1. The mere right to be a corporation is not property so as to come within the operation of a constitutional provision that all property shall be taxed according to its value, and declaring that the word "property" shall include franchises.

Same — license tax — validity.

2. A license tax on corporations is not a tax on their franchises in the sense that the word is used in the Constitution, declaring them to be property and requiring property to be taxed according to its value, and therefore such taxes may be proportioned to the capital involved, at least where the Constitution also authorizes a license tax on franchises.

Statute — validity — tax.

3. To overthrow a tax law on the ground that it violates the Constitution, it must be clearly shown to do so.

Note. — Right to be a corporation as a franchise within constitutional or statutory provisions subjecting franchises to taxation as property.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Omaha, 73 Neb. 527, 103 N. W. 84, under a statute providing for the laying of a tax upon the gross receipts of express, telegraph, and telephone companies, "as an item of property," and declaring that such gross receipts should represent "the franchise valuation," it was held that the "franchise" the value of which was sought to be reached by such statute was not the franchise to be a corporation, but was the right to do and transact express, telegraph, and telephone business within the state.

On the other hand, the rule is established in California that a constitutional declaration that "property" for the purpose of taxation shall include franchises, authorizes taxation of the right to exist as a corporation. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, affirmed in 110 U. S. 347, 28 L. ed. 173, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48; Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 64 L.R.A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130, 75 Pac. 832; San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. v. Merced County, 2 Cal. App. 593, 84 Pac. 285.

Tax — equality — corporate right.

4. The mere right to be a corporation is not within the operation of a constitutional provision for uniform and equal taxation, so that every person or corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his or its property.

Tax — certainty.

5. A statute providing for the payment, by corporations, of a license tax on or before a certain day of a certain month of each year, is not void for uncertainty in not fixing the time at which the duty to pay the tax arises.

Same — license tax — yearly period — interim.

6. That under a statute providing for the payment by a corporation of a license tax on a certain day in each year, which will entitle it to do business for the ensuing year, a corporation organized after the expiration of the specified day may do business until the next tax day arrives, does not invalidate the statute.

Same — refusal to pay — effect.

7. That a corporation refusing to pay its license tax is not thereby deprived of the right of doing business does not invalidate the statute providing for the tax.

Tax — lien.

8. A license tax upon a corporation, and penalty for its nonpayment, may be made a lien upon its tangible property.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover back certain license taxes paid by the appellant to respondent under protest. The controversy arises with regard to the validity of a certain act passed by the legislature in 1907 (Laws 1907, chap. 107, p. 126), and now incorporated into the Compiled Laws of Utah of 1907 as §§ 456 x 6 to 456 x 10, inclusive. The title to the act in question reads as follows: "An Act Requiring All Corporations to Pay an Annual State License; Providing for the Enforcement of Same and Prescribing a Penalty for Refusal or Failure to Comply therewith and Making Certain Exceptions." The original act is divided into five sections. Section 1 reads as follows: "All corporations organized under and by virtue of the laws of this state, or under the laws of the territory of Utah, and all foreign corporations doing business in this state, except as hereinafter provided, are hereby required to pay an annual state license as follows: All corporations with an authorized capital stock of $10,000 or less, $5; with an authorized capital of more than $10,000, and not to exceed $25,000, $10; with an authorized capital of more than $25,000, and not to exceed $50,000, $15; with an authorized capital of more than $50,000, and not to exceed $75,000, $20; with an authorized capital of more than $75,000, and not to exceed $100,000, $25; and with an authorized capital of more than $100,000, and not to exceed $150,000, $35; and with an authorized capital of more than $150,000, and not to exceed $200,000, $40; and with an authorized capital of over $200,000, $50. Provided, that all corporations of religious or charitable societies, and corporations organized not for pecuniary profit, and canal and irrigation companies organized for the express purpose of providing water for lands owned solely by the incorporators, and all insurance companies, shall be exempt from said license." Section 2 requires the license tax to be paid to the secretary of state on or before the 15th day of November of each year. Section 3 is not material here. Section 4 prescribes a penalty for the failure to pay the tax, which subjects the defaulting corporation to the payment of a penalty of $100, and provides that such penalty and taxes shall be a lien upon the property of the corporation, and, further, that the attorney general or county attorney may institute an action in the name of the state for the recovery of the license tax and penalty. Section 5 provides that upon payment of the license tax the secretary of state shall issue to the corporation a certificate evidencing payment of the tax. The attorney general, who appeared in the court below for respondent, demurred to appellant's complaint, and the court sustained the demurrer, and, appellant electing to stand upon his complaint, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court entered judgment dismissing the action, and hence this appeal.

It is urged by appellant that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. This contention is based upon the ground that the act in question is unconstitutional, and that therefore the license tax thereby imposed is invalid and nonenforceable, and hence the appellant should have had judgment for the amount paid by it under protest. No question is raised with respect to the sufficiency of the facts alleged in the complaint to entitle appellant to recover if the act in question should be held invalid, nor is there any question presented affecting the respondent's right to collect the tax if the act is held to be valid. The sole question, therefore, is the validity of the act in question.

The Constitution of this state (article 13, § 2), so far as material here, reads as follows: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, or under this Constitution, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law. The word 'property,' as used in this article, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, franchises, and all matters and things (real, personal, and mixed) capable of private ownership." Section 3 of the same article requires the legislature to provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation "so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion to the value of his, her, or its property." Section 12 of the same article reads as follows: "Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prevent the legislature from providing a stamp tax or a tax based on income, occupation, licenses, or franchises."

Appellant strenuously insists that in that part of § 2, supra, quoted from above, franchises are declared to be property, that by § 3 all property is to be taxed under a uniform system of assessment, that the tax in question is a tax upon the corporate franchise of appellant, and therefore is a tax upon property which can only be taxed in accordance with the value thereof, which value must be ascertained in the same manner as the value of other property is ascertained for the purposes of taxation. The contention therefore is that the act in question is void because it imposes a tax upon property not in proportion to its value, but by simply naming the amount to be paid in gross, regardless of the value of the thing upon which the tax is imposed. The question therefore turns upon the soundness or unsoundness of the foregoing contention.

By a reference to either the text or the title of the act, nothing is discoverable by which the tax in question is in terms stated to be a tax either upon property or upon franchises as such. As an affirmative argument, it is asserted that the mere right to be a corporation is a franchise, that franchises are by the Constitution declared to be property, and, since the tax is imposed only upon corporations, it must be assumed that the tax is necessarily intended as a tax upon corporate franchises considered as property. As a negative argument, it is urged that the tax in question cannot be considered as an occupation or business tax, because it applies to corporations only; that merely to exist as a corporation is neither an occupation nor a business within the meaning of occupation or license tax laws; that the tax in question is not imposed as a license to regulate any business or calling; that it is not a license by which any privilege or permission is conferred, because it confers no right or privilege upon corporations that they did not enjoy before the act was passed; and that it permits individuals to pursue the business or calling which is carried on by the taxed corporation without the imposition of this license tax.

It is not necessary to enter into any argument with regard to what is ordinarily meant by a license. Nor are we inclined to enlarge upon the numerous definitions given by the courts with regard to the true meaning of a franchise. It must suffice to say that the courts are apparently in hopeless conflict with regard to whether a franchise is or is not property within the purview of the general tax law, and as to whether a franchise may or may not be considered in a dual sense for the purposes of taxation; that is, that in one sense franchises may be considered as property valued and assessed as such, and in another sense as merely conferring a privilege upon the incorporators to transact any lawful business as a corporate body. That a corporate franchise is dual in its character, we think, does not admit of serious doubt. When the law authorizes a given number of individuals to form a corporation, the mere right to exist as such is a franchise, and is usually termed a corporate franchise. While the right thus conferred may be a valuable right, it cannot be said to partake of the incidents of property. The right thus conferred is one merely to transact the contemplated business as a corporate body. The same individuals who combine their means in the form of capital stock of a corporation could combine the same means to form a copartnership or voluntary association, and could thus carry on the same or a similar business without obtaining a franchise. In one view, therefore, a corporate franchise is no more than a mere privilege to conduct any lawful business or enterprise as a body corporate. Whatever value there may be to such a privilege or so-called franchise inures therefore to the incorporators, or to the individual stockholders, rather than to the legal entity called a corporation. To illustrate: In case a number of individuals engage in any business or enterprise as copartners, each individual member thereof becomes liable for the whole partnership debts, and all of his individual property may be subjected to the payment of the firm's obligations, while, as a stockholder or incorporator of a corporation, he hazards only the amount subscribed or what he has paid in, in case he has paid up his subscription. While the privilege which exempts the individual stockholder's general property from liability cannot exist apart from the corporation itself, and is, no doubt, to be considered as inhering in the corporate franchise in one sense, it nevertheless is not to be classed as an asset of the corporation, and is not corporate property, although it may be, and no doubt is, of considerable value to the individual incorporators or stockholders who form and constitute the corporation. It is apparent, therefore, that the privilege to exist as a corporate body, and to carry on any business or enterprise as such, may be of considerable value to the members composing the corporation, although such a privilege is not property in any except in the broadest sense, for the reason that it is a thing of value. It is manifest that this privilege could not be transferred by the corporation as property, nor could it be levied upon and subjected to the payment of the corporate debts, although clearly pertaining to corporate existence, because the privilege cannot exist without a corporate franchise.

Upon the other hand, there are corporate franchises which clearly are assets of the corporation and constitute a part of its property. The right to operate street railways, to lay water mains through which water is distributed to users in our cities, the right to erect and maintain telephone and telegraph poles and wires in the city streets or on a public road, and by virtue thereof conduct a telephone or telegraph business, or the right to conduct a toll bridge or ferry across streams, and other like privileges called franchises, are each and all not only valuable, but they are assets of the corporation owning them and constitute a large part of its property. It will be observed that the corporators to whom is granted the franchise to conduct a corporate business enjoy all of the privileges of a corporation first instanced, and may also enjoy the franchise or privilege to conduct a certain business to the exclusion of others under one and the same franchise; but, whether an exclusive privilege is granted or not, the franchise to conduct any one of the last-mentioned enterprises is still property, and the extent of its value is affected only by the fact that the franchise is exclusive or otherwise. Such a franchise, or any part of it, may be sold or transferred the same as any other tangible property without also transferring the franchise of the corporation to be or to exist as a corporate body, while the franchise we first mentioned cannot be so sold or transferred. The franchise to carry on any one of the particular enterprises above enumerated therefore is property in every sense of that term, and may be valued, assessed, and taxed in proportion to its value in money the same as all other property may be. For the purposes of taxation, in view of the provisions of our Constitution, such franchises must be assessed on their actual value, whatever that may be, and this value must be ascertained in the same manner as is the value of property generally.

But it is contended that, inasmuch as franchises are declared to be property by the Constitution, this includes all corporate franchises, and hence no franchise tax may be imposed except by valuation and assessment and by the regular method of valuation and assessment. We cannot agree with this contention. To our minds it is clear that the legislature did not intend the license tax imposed by the act in question as a property tax, notwithstanding that the Constitution provides, in the section quoted from, that franchises are property. Nor did the framers of the Constitution, in our opinion, intend to limit the right of the legislature to impose any other than a property tax by valuation upon franchises by what is said in § 2, art. 13. If such had been the intention of the framers of that instrument, all that was necessary to say was said in § 2 of that article. Why therefore specially refer to franchises again in § 12 of the same article, and there expressly state that the legislature may impose a license tax upon franchises, if it was intended that no tax other than a direct valuation tax could be imposed upon corporate franchise? In our view these two provisions are not even conflicting, but, if they were, it would be our duty to harmonize them and to give each one its proper effect so far as possible under the rules of construction. In construing a certain provision of the Constitution, we, in case of doubt, not only may, but it is our duty to, have recourse to the whole instrument, if necessary, to ascertain the true intent and meaning of the particular provision in question. Section 7 of article 12 of the Constitution reads as follows: "No corporation shall lease or alienate any franchise, so as to relieve the franchise or property held thereunder from the liabilities of the lessor or grantor, lessee or grantee, contracted or incurred in operation, use, or enjoyment of such franchise or any of its privileges."

It is reasonably clear, to us at least, that the framers of the Constitution in this section intended to and did refer only to such franchises as were the subject of lease or bargain and sale, and not to franchises which merely give the right to be or exist as a corporation. As we have pointed out, the latter right cannot be leased or alienated, or sold as a thing separate from the corporation, while the franchises mentioned in the section last above quoted may be. While the foregoing section may, in itself, shed but a faint light upon the actual meaning intended to be placed upon the word "franchises" as used in § 2 of article 13, supra, yet, when it is read in connection with § 12 of the same article to which we have referred, and which certainly does not prevent the legislature from imposing a license tax upon corporate franchises, then there is little if any room left for doubt that the framers of the Constitution treated, and intended to treat, corporate franchises as partaking of a dual character, the one as property subject to alienation and transfer, and the other as a mere right to be or exist as a corporation. That part of a franchise which may be alienated and transferred by the corporation while still continuing its existence as such clearly falls within § 2 of article 13, supra, and must be assessed and taxed as other property, while, upon the mere right to be or exist as a corporation, a license tax may be imposed. No doubt, the framers of the Constitution had in mind the fact that a franchise which relates merely to the right or privilege to be or exist as a corporation, although a matter of value to the incorporators or stockholders, is not an asset of the corporation and transferable as such, and that its value cannot, under ordinary rules, be ascertained for the purposes of assessment and taxation; but, since it is a privilege or right which is granted by the state, a license tax may be imposed upon this right or privilege for the purposes of raising revenue, and the method by which such a tax shall be imposed and the extent thereof is left to the sound discretion of the legislature, in whom, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, the whole power of taxation is vested. It is further apparent that the license tax imposed by the act in question can be said to be a franchise tax in a very limited sense merely. It is far more in the nature of a license tax imposed upon the privilege of being and continuing to exist as a corporation. It must be conceded, however, that nearly all, if not all, the authorities apply the term "franchise" to the privilege of becoming and existing as a corporation. The cases are, however, so numerous, and, in view of the varied facts and circumstances upon which the decisions are based are so conflicting, that they shed but little, if any, light upon the real question to be solved in this case in view of the provisions of our Constitution. There are a large number of cases, however, in which it is held that franchises for the purposes of taxation, and perhaps for some other purposes, partake of a dual character. We shall refer to a few only of the many cases that might be cited.

In the case of Cedar Rapids Water Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 118 Iowa, at page 238, 91 N. W., at page 1083, it is said: "The term 'franchise' is defined in various ways, and its meaning depends more or less upon the connection in which the word is employed. Without going into any extended research as to its origin, it may be said that a franchise is a special privilege conferred by governmental authority upon individuals, and which does not belong to citizens of the country generally as a matter of common right. It is also to be regarded as a generic term covering all rights granted to a corporation by legislative act or statute. . . . A corporation (by which is meant an association of individuals into a body lawfully exercising corporate powers) is itself a franchise, and the different powers which may be exercised by the corporation are also franchises. In the first illustration above used, the franchise is the privilege by the individual members to be a corporation and exercise corporate powers; and, in the second, the franchise is the privilege which is granted to the corporation, when organized, to perform certain acts or to carry on certain business." The same thought is expressed in different words in the case of Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484, in which case Mr. Chief Justice Perley, at page 507, uses the following language: "The word 'franchise,' so often used in the act and in the deed, has various significations, both in a legal and popular sense. A corporation is itself a franchise belonging to the members of the corporation; and a corporation, being itself a franchise, may hold other franchises, as rights and franchises of the corporation. A municipal corporation, for instance, may have the franchise of a market, or of a local court; and the different powers of a private corporation, like the right to hold and dispose of property, are its franchises. . . . A corporation, being itself a franchise, consists and is made up of its rights and franchises." In the case of State, Marsden Co., 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Prosecutor, v. State Assessors, 61 N. J. L. 461, 39 Atl. 638, the question as to whether a certain license tax imposed upon certain corporations was a tax upon corporate property was involved. The corporation asserted that it was, and the assessors contended to the contrary. At page 462 of 61 N. J. L., Mr. Justice Collins, in speaking for the court, adopts and approves the language used by the same court in another similar case reported in Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270, 19 Am. St. Rep. 394, 19 Atl. 733. The language referred to is as follows: "The fault of this position is the assumption that this tax is one upon property. Such, manifestly, is not the case. The law in question imposes a tax on certain corporations by way of a license for exercising corporate franchises. It is declared to be such tax by the act, and although it is laid on this class of corporations with respect to the capital stock, the tax possesses the legal quality of a license or franchise tax." The same doctrine is laid down in Honduras Commercial Co. v. State Assessors, 54 N. J. L. 278, 23 Atl. 668, and also in the following cases: People ex rel. United States Aluminium Printing Plate Co. v. Knight, 174 N. Y. 475, 63 L.R.A. 87, 67 N. E. 65; Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 595, 33 L. ed. 1025, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; Tremont & S. Mills v. Lowell, 178 Mass. 469, 59 N. E. 1007.

We do not deem it necessary to refer to the other cases that in some form or other invoke the same doctrine. The contention that the case at bar is distinguishable from the cases cited above, upon the ground that the Constitution of this state declares franchises to be property, is not tenable, in view that that instrument in terms recognizes the fact that franchises may and do partake of a dual character, as we have pointed out. We have therefore cited the foregoing cases only for the purpose of showing that the framers of our Constitution, in attributing to corporate franchises a dual character, were clearly in harmony with the law as it is declared to be by the courts. The act, in our opinion, is valid, and we again repeat, what this court has so often declared, that when an act or statute is attacked upon the ground that it violates some provision of the Constitution or in some way is repugnant to that instrument, it must clearly appear to be so, or the act or statute must be held valid. This doctrine applies with especial force to a law which sets in motion a sovereign power such as the power of taxation, when it is alleged that the Constitution prohibits the exercise of the power. In such a case, unless it is made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt that the sovereign power to impose taxes in a particular way is withheld from the legislature, the law imposing a particular tax must be upheld.

The case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Omaha, 73 Neb. 527, 103 N. W. 84, relied upon by appellant, does not in any way impugn the doctrine we are seeking to enforce here. The decision in that case is based upon the theory that the legislature could not, within the provisions of the Constitution of Nebraska, arbitrarily determine the value of franchises and tax them at the rate that other property is taxed; but it is held that if franchises are taxed as tangible property, then the value thereof must be ascertained by the same methods that the value of other property is ascertained for the purposes of taxation. It is, however, conceded in that case that the legislature may do what is attempted to be done in the act in question, namely, impose a tax upon the right to exercise the privilege conferred by the corporate franchise. The other cases cited by counsel for appellant upon this point, in effect, do no more than support the doctrine of the Nebraska case referred to.

The contention that the act is void, upon the ground that it offends against the uniformity clause of the Constitution, cannot be sustained. Having determined that the tax is not a tax upon property within the purview of the Constitution of this state, it follows that the classification, the amount of the tax, and the manner of collecting it, is a matter largely, if not entirely, within the legislative discretion. With regard to this point the same principle is involved in this case that was involved, in the case of Salt Lake City v. Christensen Co. 34 Utah, 38, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 95 Pac. 523, and it is therefore needless to extend the discussion upon this point. In addition to the authorities cited in that case, we refer to the following: Denver City R. Co. v. Denver, 21 Colo. 350, 29 L.R.A. 608, 52 Am. St. Rep. 239, 41 Pac. 826; Home Ins. Co. v. New York, 134 U. S. 600, 33 L. ed. 1029, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 593; 1 Cooley, Taxn. 3d ed. p. 412.

It is further contended that the act is void for uncertainty, in that it fixes no time at which the duty to pay the tax arises, and because the nonpayment thereof does not prevent the corporation from continuing its business, although it may refuse or neglect to pay the tax. As to the first point, it is sufficient to say that the license tax imposed is an annual tax payable "on or before the 15th day of November of each year." Any corporation falling within the class mentioned in the act upon whom the tax is imposed, and which has obtained from the state a franchise to transact business as a corporation at any time before the 15th day of November of any year, is liable for the tax, and, when paid, is entitled to the certificate mentioned in § 5 of the act, which entitles such corporation to continue to transact its corporate business for the whole year and until the 15th day of November of the following year. Any corporation organized after the 15th day of November in any year, clearly cannot be required to pay the tax until the following November. If it be said that this authorizes a newly created corporation to transact business for a period for which it pays no tax, it may likewise be said that the same condition exists with regard to any annual tax. Even upon a property tax when a person becomes the owner thereof after the time for assessing the property has passed, he may hold it immune against taxation until the next annual period for assessment arrives. The legislature no doubt could have provided that any corporation formed after the 15th day of November in any year should be required to pay a tax in proportion to the time intervening between its organization and the end of the yearly term, namely, the 15th day of November. The mere fact that this was not done, however, in no way affects either the certainty or the uniformity. It is made to operate upon all corporations in the same way where their status is the same. Nor do we see anything objectionable in the fact that the act does not deprive the corporation of its privileges in case of default of payment of the tax. This is a mere matter of detail in enforcing the tax. If the tax is valid, and we think it is, then the corporations upon whom it is imposed certainly cannot be heard to complain that the penalty in case of default is not more drastic than it is. Nor is there any merit in the contention that both the tax and penalty constitute a lien upon the tangible property of the corporation. This is the method that the legislature has adopted to enforce payment of the tax, and, as we have pointed out in Salt Lake City v. Christensen, supra, is a matter entirely within the legislative discretion. The law, no doubt, is somewhat crude and imperfect, and may not be the best that could be devised for the purposes of raising revenue, but neither one nor all of these reasons can in any way, nor to any extent, affect the validity of the law itself.

From what has been said, we hold: (1) That the act in question is not clearly repugnant to any constitutional provision; (2) that the tax in question is a mere license tax imposed by the state upon certain corporations for the privilege granted them by it to be and to continue to transact business in this state as a corporation, and the tax was not intended to be, nor is it, a tax upon franchises as tangible property, and therefore does not offend against the provisions of § 2 of article 13 of the Constitution; (3) that the manner in which the tax is imposed and the amount that each corporation is required to pay, as ascertained and fixed by the act, is not contrary to any constitutional provision; (4) that the period of time for which the payment of the tax entitles the corporation to continue its business without further payment is certain; and (5) that the act is not so uncertain nor unfair in any of its provisions that a court would, for that reason, be authorized to declare it invalid.

The judgment therefore ought to be, and it accordingly is, affirmed, with costs to respondent.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

HULDA E. FRISK

v.

CHARLES M. CANNON et al.

(110 Minn. 438, 126 N. W. 67.)

Physician — use of electricity — negligence.

Plaintiff was placed by one of defendant physicians on an insulated platform, a conical cap was put above and in front of her head, and electricity was caused to be discharged by a static machine through the cap upon plaintiff's head. Defendant left

Headnote by the Court.

Note. — Liability of physician for injuries resulting from electrical or X-ray treatment.

The rule governing the liability for injuries resulting from the use of the X-ray is the same as in other actions for malpractice, and the criterion is whether such reasonable care and skill has been exercised as is usually given by physicians and surgeons in good standing in the locality. Henslin v. Wheaton, 91 Minn. 219, 64 L.R.A. 126, 103 Am. St. Rep. 504, 97 N. W. 882, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 19; Gere v. Brockman, 138 Mo. App. 231, 119 S. W. 1082; Sweeney v. Erving, 38 Wash. L. Rep. 295. The court in the first case said; "This is the first case to come before us involving alleged negligence on the part of physicians in applying the recently discovered X-rays, and no rule of care in such cases has been laid down. But there can be no doubt that the rule applicable to the care and skill required of physicians toward their patients in other cases applies. That rule was stated in Martin v. Courtney, 87 Minn. 197, 91 N. W. 487, in the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the room. No attendant was present. Plaintiff's head was seriously burned. It is held that actionable negligence on the part of defendant was shown.

(Jaggard, J., dissents.)

(April 22, 1910.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in plaintiff's favor as to defendant Frank E. Balcome, and from an order dismissing as to defendant Charles M. Cannon, an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence; the plaintiff appealing from the order of dismissal, and defendant Balcome from the judgment taken against him. Order and judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Richard & Coe for plaintiff.

Messrs. C. D. O'Brien and R. D. O'Brien, for defendants:

Defendant Balcome was not negligent.

Jenkins v. St. Paul City R. Co. 105 Minn. 504, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 401, 117 N. W. 928.

Per Curiam:

Plaintiff and appellant charged the defendants and respondents, as partners engaged in the practice of medicine, with having negligently treated plaintiff with static electricity, to her injury. It was alleged: Plaintiff was placed on an insulated platform connected with the electrical machine. Above and in front of her head was put a conical cap, in a position subsequently described in detail. Static electricity was caused to be discharged from the machine, through the cap, in, upon, and through following language: "The legal obligation of the physician to his patient, where his conduct is questioned in an action of this character, demands of him no more than the exercise of such reasonable care and skill as is usually given by physicians or surgeons in good standing." The rule is one of ordinary care and prudence, and the question presented in the case at bar is whether the evidence received and that offered on the trial tended to show a failure on the part of defendants to exercise such care."

And a physician is not an insurer of the success of treatment by the X-ray, or that it will not be attended by unexpected results, but he is only required to have the necessary learning and experience to give the treatment in a careful and prudent manner. Gore v. Brockman, supra.

It has been held that the fact that a patient was burned by an X-ray is itself evidence that the treatment was improper. Shockley v. Tucker, 127 Iowa, 456, 103 N. W. 360.

But a different result was reached in Sweeney v. Erving, supra, where it was plaintiff. Defendant then left the room. No attendant was present. After the lapse of eight or ten minutes, plaintiff screamed. Defendant immediately entered the room, and discovered that her head was smoking. Through the negligence of defendant a large portion of the top and sides of plaintiff's head was seriously burned, whereby she was damaged in the sum of $5,000. Defendant admitted the fact of burning, but denied negligence. The case was tried to a jury, which returned a verdict of $1,200 for plaintiff. This appeal was taken from judgment entered against defendant Balcome.

Plaintiff made out a prima facie case of negligence. Plaintiff's only expert testified that, if the cap were brought close to the head and there was volume enough, there would be a continuous spark, and harm would result. His testimony to the effect that the distance the cap was placed from plaintiff's head would determine whether a burn was likely to occur, together with the testimony of plaintiff that it was not adjusted as on former occasions, and also the conduct of defendant in leaving the plaintiff in the room unattended, while the machine was working, for the space of ten minutes, during which time the burn occurred, in connection with the other evidence in the case, was sufficient to take the question of defendant's negligence to the jury.

The trial court was justified in concluding that defendants were not partners, and that defendant Cannon was not liable for the negligence of defendant Balcome.

Order and judgment affirmed.

O'Brien, J., took no part.

Jaggard, J., dissenting:

I respectfully dissent. The evidence in my opinion rebuts the inference of negligence, to which it may be conceded the circumstances gave rise. It appears that this plaintiff had been subjected to the same treatment by the same machine on seven or eight previous occasions without harm. Defendant called a number of well-known experts of the highest character. The effect of their testimony is: The amperage or the quantity of electricity generated by the machine in question is infinitesimal. It figures at some one-millionth of an ampere; but the electromotive force is large. The effect resembles shooting a piece of eider down from a gun. There is great force, but the missile is so slight in character that it can do no harm. No case has ever been known of injury to a person by a static machine, nor is one known in the literature of the profession. The occurrence was "unique in experience," "a perfect mystery, contrary to all laws of physics." It could not be accounted for by any action of the static machine. A physician who had been using one in his practice daily since 1885, and had given perhaps 100,000 treatments, gave similar testimony. Another physician with seventeen years' experience in the use of the machine testified that he knew of nothing which could have produced this injury by this machine, and he knew of nothing which could have prevented it. The testimony of the physicians was cogent evidence of its veracity and of their competency.

Certain experiments were performed by defendant after the accident. If it be conceded that this subsequent knowledge of sci-held that this fact was not evidence of negligence, and did not throw the burden on the defendant of showing that the injury was not caused by his negligence.

And it has been held that where some of the testimony tends to show that the physicians in the community are ignorant of the effect of X-ray exposures, the jury may well conclude that its use by one who has little knowledge of the consequences is negligence per se. Sauers v. Smits, 49 Wash. 557, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1242, 95 Pac. 1097.

It has been held that a physician to whom a surgeon referred one of his patients for the purpose of having an X-ray diagnosis made might rely upon the surgeon's judgment that the patient was in a physical condition to undergo the exposures. Sweeney v. Erving, supra.

A patient who is burned by X-ray light while under a physician's treatment is not precluded from recovering for her injury because she quits his treatment before she should have done so, and before he wished her to, or by the fact that she neglected to follow his instructions as to the care of the part affected. Sauers v. Smits, supra.

Where an action for malpractice by burning plaintiff by the use of the X-ray is submitted to the jury solely on the question of whether the defendant was negligent in his methods of using the X-ray, testimony of physicians of other schools of medicine than the defendant, to the effect that X-ray treatment is not a proper one for appendicitis, is admissible, since the question of negligence is one of science and skill, wholly independent of the methods of treatment by any particular school. Shockley v. Tucker, supra.

So, where it is applied merely to locate a foreign substance, a physician is not entitled to have the question of his care determined by those of his own school alone, and a professor who is familiar with the X-ray may testify as to whether the use was negligent. Henslin v. Wheaton, supra.

Evidence that defendant in an action for a negligent burning by use of an X-ray machine had burned other patients is incompetent. Shockley v. Tucker, supra.

ence, as distinguished from the mere application of familiar forces to ordinary substances, was admissible in evidence,—compare Staloch v. Holm, 100 Minn. 276, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 712, 111 N. W. 264, with Glockner v. Harwood Mfg. Co. 109 Minn. 30, 122 N. W. 465, 123 N. W. 807,—the experiments were not significant in this case. The way in which the conical cap, described as an inverted crown or sunflower, was placed near plaintiff's head, the one suggested explanation of how the accident happened, is not shown to have been its cause. According to plaintiff, that cap was placed within 2 or 3 inches from her head, instead of 6 or 8 inches away, as at other times. The decrease in distance tended to increase the strength of the current communicated to the patient's head; but it had never been known to produce the effect here complained of before the accident. It was shown by uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony that the force of the charge or amount of electricity used or turned on plaintiff in its usual operation would have been absolutely harmless, however the cap had been adjusted; that if the cap had been placed immediately on top of her head, it might have produced unpleasant sensations, but according to all known experience would not have injured the plaintiff. "Good practice requires that it should just clear the head; that is all." The patient could perceive the cone in front of her, so that, if there had been a spark, she would have seen it, but did not see it. It is to be noted that it was the back of her head which was burned. Moreover, it is the universal experience that there might have been a spark without possible harm. When an individual passes over a carpet, a spark is often generated, which would, for instance, light gas, without any possible harm to the individual.

The absence of any assistant in the room with plaintiff is not shown to have been a material factor. How such person, if present, could have prevented the harm, does not appear. If he had, for example, turned off the electricity which operated the machine, its wheels would have revolved for some time from momentum. Nor has it been suggested how any interposition could have been effective to have stopped the passage of the current, which plaintiff said took more time than a second, but which must have been practically instantaneous. It appears that the presence of a physician or an assistant was not required by good medical practice, nor that there was any reasonable anticipation of harm which suggested it. Neither the facts in the record nor any conjecture reasonably founded thereon tends to show that the failure of the physician to give plaintiff any directions concerning the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) use of the machine, or to be present in person or by representative, was the proximate cause of the harm complained of.

The defendant had a right to rely on the presumption of the uniformity of the operation of natural forces. He was not bound to anticipate that a certain exceptional phenomenon, beyond the range of invariable and extensive experience, would happen. The courts have, indeed, denied responsibility for damage due to flood, tempests, or to lightning, which are known to happen frequently, and of which certain premonitory indications are common. See Baccelli v. North River Stone Co. 133 App. Div. 449, 118 N. Y. Supp. 29. This accident was like a flash from a clear sky. Wind, it is known, can prove destructive; but could the proprietor of a place where an electric fan is used be reasonably held to anticipate that the breeze it generated would inflict injury? It is true defendant was dealing with a force which he knew in many manifestations is dangerous; but in this particular form in numberless instances it had proved innocuous. According to the record before us,—and we are controlled by that,—nothing within the range of a large and familiar experience suggested even the possibility of harm. Defendant, moreover, had purchased from reputable makers a standard machine, which, at the time of the accident, was in perfect order. It had previously been operated upon this plaintiff repeatedly and safely. He had a right to rely on its uniform and safe operation. Jenkins v. St. Paul City R. Co. 105 Minn. 504, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 401, 117 N. W. 928.

I am compelled to conclude that plaintiff suffered from the results of a physical force partially known and in some measure unknown, whose particular potentiality for harm could not have reasonably been foreseen, and for which defendant was not responsible.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

ALFRED DOZIER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF ALABAMA.

(218 U. S. 124, 54 L. ed. 965, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649.)

Interstate commerce — state license tax — peddlers and drummers.

The sale within the state of a frame for a portrait, made in another state, to fill an order taken by a solicitor in the former state, cannot be so separated from the rest of the dealings between the nonresident maker and the purchaser as to sustain the imposition of a license tax under Ala. act of March 7, 1907, § 17, where the order for the portrait contemplated its delivery in an appropriate frame, which the purchaser of the portrait should have the option of buying at the factory price.

(May 31, 1910.)

ERROR to the Alabama Supreme Court to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the City Court of Montgomery, convicting defendant of selling picture frames without a license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. D. Gash, for plaintiff in error:

Section 17 of Alabama act of March 7, 1907, providing that every person who solicits orders for pictures or frames, or sells or disposes of picture frames, shall pay a license tax in each county, is an attempt to interfere with and to regulate commerce, and as such is invalid as to an agent of a corporation residing out of the state.

Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 32 L. ed. 368, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 241, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; Lyng v. Note.—License or occupation tax on hawkers and peddlers, and persons engaged in soliciting orders by sample or otherwise, as a violation of the commerce clause.

This question has already been covered in a note to State v. Bayer, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 297, to which may be added the following decisions, reported since its compilation:

Discrimination against manufactures or products of other states.

The Colorado statute Rev. Stat. 1908, §§ 3563 et seq.) providing for the licensing of itinerant vendors, which defines the term "itinerant vendor" as any person, either as principal or agent, who engages in a temporary or transient business in the state, either in one locality or in traveling about the country, or from place to place, selling manufactured goods, wares, or merchandise, except to merchants, in the usual course of business, and which therefore in its operation would exempt from license a person permanently engaged in manufacturing in the state, although he might travel about the state to sell his product, while requiring a manufacturer in another state, without a permanent place of business within the state enacting the statute, to obtain a license before seeking to obtain a market for his product by selling to purchasers for their own use, is unconstitutional, as imposing a burden upon interstate commerce; since, when reduced to its final analysis, the license exacted is nothing more or less than a tax imposed upon outside manufacturers for the privilege of selling their products in the state direct to the consumers, while manufacturers within the state are relieved from that burden. Smith v. Farr, 46 Colo. 364, 104 Pac. 401; Leonard v. Reed, 46 Colo. 307, 104 Pac. 410.

Validity as an exercise of police power.

In Ex parte Crowder, 171 Fed. 250, a statute requiring peddlers, with certain exceptions, to procure a license in each county where they did business, to pay a license fee of $100 for a peddler on foot, $150 for a peddler with one horse and a wagon, $250 for a peddler with two horses and a wagon, and $300 for a peddler with any other conveyance, and to make a special deposit with the county treasurer of $500, which deposit is made subject to taxes, to attachment and execution on behalf of creditors of the licensee, whose claims arise in connection with the business done under the license, to garnishment in any civil action in contract or tort brought against the licensee, to the payment of fines incurred by the licensee through violation of the statute, and to be held by the county treasurer for a period of ninety days from the date of cancellation of the license,—which statute is general in its application, without discrimination against persons, whether residents or non-residents of the state, nor against commodities, whether produced within the state or imported from other states or countries,—was held to be strictly a police and revenue statute, applicable to business to be transacted wholly within the state, and not to create an invidious burden upon interstate or foreign commerce.

Interstate character of transaction as affected by delivery through agent.

In Wilcox v. People, 46 Colo. 382, 104 Pac. 408, it was held that an agent for a manufacturer located in another state, who, through persons employed for that purpose, solicited and secured orders for vehicles manufactured and then in such other state, which orders were filled by his principal, and the vehicles shipped to him, and by him delivered to the purchasers, could not constitutionally be required to obtain a license.

—as affected by shipment in bulk to agent.

In Crenshaw v. State (Ark.) 130 S. W. 569, it was held that a statute requiring any person who shall travel over and through any county and peddle or sell certain articles, to procure a license, and which, in defining peddling, departs from the common-law definition in not making it

Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Stockard v. Morgan, 185 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 785, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576.

An agent of a foreign corporation, who delivers a frame to each purchaser of portraits whose contract of purchase provides that the portrait will be delivered in a suitable frame, that may be accepted at factory price, who has only one frame fitted to and surrounding each portrait as it is delivered, and who does not offer to sell any frame to others than those whose contract calls for the option of accepting said suitable frame, and who carries no extra frames whatever, but keeps the title for his company, or returns to his company any frame that is refused,—is engaged solely in interstate commerce.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was convicted and sentenced to a fine on a complaint for breach of an Alabama statute of March 7, 1907. By § 17 of that act a license tax was imposed on persons who did not have a permanent place of business in the state, and also keep picture frames as a part of their stock in trade, if they solicited orders for the enlargement of photographs or pictures of any character, or for picture frames, whether they made charge for such frames or not, or if they sold or disposed of picture frames. The Chicago Crayon Company, having its only place of business in Chicago, and being engaged in the business of making and enlarging portraits from photographs, and in the manufacturing of picture frames, solicited orders in Alabama without paying the license tax. These orders were given in writing for a portrait of the size and kind wanted, specified the price, cash on delivery, and continued: "I understand that my portrait is to be delivered in an appropriate frame, which this contract entitles me to accept at factory price." The agent of the company gave back a written essential that the vendor deliver his wares at the time he makes sales thereof,—which statute did not discriminate against non-residents, or goods manufactured without the state,—was not, as applied to a person traveling about and taking orders for ranges, which ranges were shipped by the manufacturer from another state, the ranges not being separately appropriated to the filling of any particular order by being tagged with the name of any purchaser, or as applied to the person engaged in delivering them, a burden on interstate commerce.

Sale of picture frame as incidental to transaction protected by commerce clause.

As stated in the earlier note above referred to, there has been a conflict of opinion upon the question whether, where one who, as a transaction of interstate commerce, has ordered a picture, is given an option of purchasing a frame delivered with it, the sale of the frame under such circumstances is within the protection of the commerce clause, which is now authoritatively settled by the decision of the United States Supreme Court, above reported.

The point was also involved in Roselle v. Com. (Va.) 65 S. E. 526, in which the evidence showed that defendant had in his possession a considerable consignment of pictures and picture frames, that none of those from whom orders for the pictures had been secured were obligated to take frames, but that the purchase of the frame was the subject of negotiation at the time the picture was delivered, and it was held that the sale of the frame was not so intimately connected with the sale of the portrait as to be a transaction of interstate commerce, so as to preclude the application of a statute requiring peddlers to be licensed.

acceptance, repeating the other terms of the bargain, and adding: "All portraits are delivered in appropriate frames, which this contract entitled the purchaser to accept at factory prices," with particulars purporting to show that these prices were from one third to one half the retail or usual ones. The plaintiff in error, who also had no permanent place of business in Alabama and had paid no license tax, was an agent of the company, who delivered pictures and frames, and collected for them, in pursuance of the agreed plan. The pictures and frames were sent to the agent, and remained the property of the company until paid for and delivered. On these facts the supreme court of Alabama, while admitting that the dealings concerning the pictures were commerce among the states, sustained the conviction, on the ground that the sale of the frames was a wholly local matter. 154 Ala. 83, 129 Am. St. Rep. 51, 46 So. 9.

No doubt it is true that the customer was not bound to take the frame unless he saw it, and that the sale of it took place wholly within the state of Alabama, if a sale was made. But, as was hinted in Rearick v. Pennsylvania, 203 U. S. 507, 512, 51 L. ed. 295, 297, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, what is commerce among the states is a question depending upon broader considerations than the existence of a technically binding contract, or the time and place where the title passed. It was agreed that the frame should be offered along with the picture. The offer was a part of the interstate bargain, and as it was agreed that the frame should be offered "at factory prices," and the company and factory were in Chicago, obviously it was contemplated, if not agreed, that the frame should come on with the picture. In fact, the frames were sent on with the pictures from Chicago, and were offered when the pictures were tendered, as part of a transaction commercially continuous, and one at prices generically fixed by the contract for the pictures, and by that contract represented to be less than retail or usual prices, in consideration, it is implied, of the purchase already agreed to be made. We are of opinion that the sale of the frames cannot be so separated from the rest of the dealing between the Chicago company and the Alabama purchaser as to sustain the license tax upon it. Under the decision, the statute, as applied to this case, is a regulation of commerce among the states, and void under the Constitution of the United States. Art. 1, § 8. Robbins v. Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S. 622, 47 L. ed. 336, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 229; Rear- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

LUDDEN & BATES SOUTHERN MUSIC HOUSE.

(— Ga. —, 67 S. E. 654.)

Note — purchase price of chattel — defense — breach of warranty.

Where a note recites that its consideration is the purchase price of a particular described piano, in a suit thereon by the promisee the maker may plead, in defense of the action, that the plaintiff represented that the piano was new and capable of being used as a musical instrument, and that the defendant, acting on this representation and warranty, and without actual or constructive knowledge of its true condition, bought it, when in point of fact it is worse than secondhand, and not capable of being used as a musical instrument.

Headnote by EVANS, P. J.

Note. — Breach of parol warranty as defense to action between original parties on note for purchase price of chattel.

This note does not include cases passing on the question of whether a breach of warranty may be taken advantage of by counterclaim or set-off, but is confined to the question of whether it may be used as a defense in an action on a note given for the purchase price of a chattel.

The weight of authority is in accord with the decision in PRYOR v. LUDDEN & B. SOUTHERN MUSIC HOUSE in holding that the breach of a parol warranty may be shown as a defense pro tanto in an action between the original parties to a note given for the purchase price.

This result was reached in the following cases where parol evidence showing such warranties was held admissible, the notes in suit being silent as to the existence of warranties: Ruff v. Garrett, 94 Ill. 475; Crist v. Jacoby, 10 Ind. App. 688, 38 N. E. 543; Farrar v. Mathews, 37 Iowa, 418; Thompson v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 29 Kan. 476; Shepherd v. Temple, 3 N. H. 455; Lytle v. Bass, 7 Coldw. 303; Gilman Bros. v. Williams, 74 Vt. 327, 52 Atl. 428.

And in Nauman v. Ullman, 102 Wis. 92, 78 N. W. 159, it was held that the signing of a note was not such a reduction of the contract to writing as would render parol evidence of a warranty inadmissible. The court said: "The defendant contends, how-

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Appeals for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a question arising on writ of error to the City Court of Sylvania, to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Instructions given favorable to plaintiff in error.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. K. Overstreet for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Strange & Cobb, for defendant in error:

Breach of a parol warranty could not be set up as a defense.

Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711; Seitz v. Brewers' Refrigerating Mach. Co. 141 U. S. 510, 35 L. ed. 837, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 46; 2 Mechem, Sales, 1254; Fleming v. Satterfield, 4 Ga. App. 351, 61 S. E. 518.

ever, under both the fourth and the seventh assignments of error, that the signing of the note above referred to was a reduction of the contract to writing, so that any evidence of a parol warranty was inadmissible. This contention cannot be sustained, for it is obvious that the note does not in terms purport to state the whole contract, and the evidence of the transaction makes still clearer the fact that it does not. It was only a method of evidencing a promise to pay a portion of the purchase price, and to secure the same. It was a document in execution of a part of the contract in fact made, instead of one purporting to declare the terms of the contract. Such writing does not exclude proof of a parol warranty."

And in the following cases where suit was brought on a bought note containing a memorandum of the sale, parol evidence was held admissible to prove a warranty and a breach thereof. Curtis v. Soltau, 16 Daly, 490, 12 N. Y. Supp. 285; Routledge v. Worthington Co. 119 N. Y. 592, 23 N. E. 1111.

And a maker may prove a parol warranty notwithstanding the note in suit contains the words, "no promise or contract outside of this note will be recognized." Gale Sulky Harrow Mfg. Co. v. Stark, 45 Kan. 606, 23 Am. St. Rep. 739, 26 Pac. 8.

And in Rumsey v. Sargent, 21 N. H. 397, where there was a warranty in substance that, if the pump sold did not give satisfaction, the seller would refund the money, it was held in an action on a note that evidence that the pump neither worked well nor gave satisfaction might be given.

In the following cases it was held that a breach of warranty could be shown as a defense in an action upon a note given for the purchase price of a chattel, no question of evidence relating to such defense being raised or discussed: O'Neal v. Bacon, 1 Houst. (Del.) 215; Dukes v. Nelson, 27 Ga. 457; Sturges v. Miller, 80 Ill. 241; McClure v. Williams, 65 Ill. 390; Beers v. Williams, 16 Ill. 69; Rose v. Wallace, 11 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Evans, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of appeals desires the instruction of the supreme court as to the following question of law:

"Where there is a sale of a specific article of personal property, such as a certain particular piano, and the purchaser gives to the seller a promissory note stating that the consideration thereof is the particular designated article sold, and the note is otherwise silent as to representations and warranties, is the defendant precluded by what is commonly called the 'parol evidence rule,' or by any other principle of law, from pleading in defense to an action on the note that the plaintiff represented that the piano was new and was suitable for the use for which such articles are usually and generally intended (i. e., in the case of the piano, that it was new and capable of being used as a

Stockwell, 91 Mass. 45; Stevens v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 172, 9 N. W. 677; Nichols & S. Co. v. Soderquist, 77 Minn. 509, 80 N. W. 630; Ferguson v. Oliver, 16 Miss. 332; Wade v. Scott, 7 Mo. 509; Murphy v. Gay, 37 Mo. 536; Brown v. Weldon, 99 Mo. 568, 13 S. W. 342; Broderick v. Andrews, 135 Mo. App. 57, 115 S. W. 519; Buhrman v. Baylis, 14 Hun, 608; Steigleman v. Jeffries, 1 Serg. & R. 477, 7 Am. Dec. 626; Aultman & T. Co. v. Hefner, 67 Tex. 54, 2 S. W. 861; Butler v. Titus, 13 Wis. 430; Hoopes v. Northern Nat. Bank, 42 C. C. A. 436, 102 Fed. 448.

And it has been held that a breach of an implied warranty that the goods sold were merchantable could be shown in defense to an action on a note given for the purchase price. Williams v. Wyly, 45 Ga. 580; Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711.

But in Nash v. Weidenfeld, 41 App. Div 511, 58 N. Y. Supp. 609, affirmed in 166 N. Y. 612, 59 N. E. 1127, where, for the purpose of the decision, it was taken as admitted that the plaintiff transferee was liable to all defenses which existed in the hands of the payee, it was held that a breach of warranty was not a defense to an action on a note given in part payment for goods, but that it must be taken advantage of by counterclaim.

The same result was reached in Atwater v. Orford Copper Co. 85 N. Y. Supp. 426, which was an action on a written contract containing no warranty.

And in Peerless Reaper Co. v. Conway, 79 Wis. 622, 48 N. W. 854, where an action was brought to recover damages for a failure of a purchaser to give his notes, as agreed, it was held that a mere breach of warranty was no defense in whole or in part where no counterclaim was interposed.

musical instrument), and that the defendant, acting on this representation and warranty, and without actual or constructive knowledge of its true condition, bought it, when in point of fact it is worse than secondhand, and not capable of the use mentioned (i. e., in the case of the piano, of being used as a musical instrument)?"

In deciding whether a note given for the purchase money of a specific article may be reduced in amount, or a recovery entirely defeated, by showing a breach of a contemporaneous oral express warranty, regard must be had to two well-defined rules of law, one of which is the rule which prohibits an unconditional written promise to pay money to be changed into a conditional one by a contemporaneous parol agreement, and the other is the parol evidence rule, which rejects, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, parol evidence which adds to, varies, or contradicts the written memorial of a contract. The principle is well established that a negotiable instrument which expresses on its face an absolute promise to pay cannot be cut down into a conditional promise by a contemporaneous parol agreement. Thus, where a note expressed on its face that it was given for the rent of a warehouse, in a suit upon the note, a plea of total or partial failure of consideration, resulting from a breach of a collateral engagement of the landlord to make certain repairs, will not be allowed. Wyche v. Winship, 13 Ga. 208. Nor can the maker show a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement that the payee was to accept a less amount. Loudermilk v. Loudermilk, 93 Ga. 443, 21 S. E. 77. Though a maker of a note, when sued by his promisee, is always permitted to show by parol a want or failure of consideration, yet he will not be allowed, unless fraud exists, to prove that his obligation to pay was dependent or conditional upon the promisee's compliance with a contemporaneous or prior agreement, not expressed in the note. Lester v. Fowler, 43 Ga. 190; Howard v. Stephens, 52 Ga. 448; Goodman v. Fleming, 57 Ga. 350; Hayley v. Evans, 65 Ga. 157; Hirsch v. Oliver, 91 Ga. 554, 18 S. E. 354; Dinkler v. Baer, 92 Ga. 432, 17 S. E. 953; Scaife v. Beall, 43 Ga. 333.

As an incident to a sale of a chattel, the law implies a warranty, which the parties may waive or change by express agreement. The warranty, whether express or implied, necessarily enters into the consideration of the article sold. A plea of breach of warranty is the substantial equivalent of a plea of failure of consideration; and the defense is allowed upon the principle that the consideration of a note between the parties is always open to inquiry so far as the promise to pay depends upon its existence, continuance, or amount, and that, as a warranty is incident to every sale of a chattel, parol evidence is admissible, not for the purpose of showing that a different promise from the written one was made, but that it is different in legal effect, as a consequence of the want, cessation, or shrinkage of the consideration. Aultman v. Mason, 83 Ga. 212, 9 S. E. 536. The parol evidence rule, as relating to written contracts, has been thus stated: "Where parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the entire contract, and parol evidence of prior or contemporaneous representations or statements is inadmissible to add to, take from, or vary the written instrument." Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711. Where the law requires that the contract, in order to be valid, shall be expressed in writing, the writing alone must be depended upon to ascertain the contract of the parties, and its deficiencies cannot be supplied by parol proof. Where the law does not require the agreement to be reduced to writing in order to render it valid, and it is insisted that the writing contains a complete agreement of the parties, it becomes a question of intention, as to whether or not the agreement has been integrated in the writing. In such a case, in order to allow parol evidence to be admitted to show other terms, it must appear, either from the contract itself or from the attendant circumstances, that the contract is incomplete, and what is sought to be shown as additional terms neither conflicts with nor contradicts what is contained in the writing. Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28, 37 S. E. 485; Johnston v. Patterson, 86 Ga. 725, 13 S. E. 17; De Pauw v. Kaiser, 77 Ga. 176, 3 S. E. 254.

If the writing shows on its face a definite and complete contract between the parties, parol evidence will not be received to vary, modify, or contradict its terms. The rule does not apply to cases where the instrument shows incompleteness on its face, and parol evidence is allowed to show an agreement referable to the incompleteness, when not inharmonious with the writing. The question in such cases is whether there is a vacuum to be filled. If the alleged omission of an important detail is lacking, which can be supplied by legal presumption, the want of express provision leaves no vacuum. In case of the sale of a chattel, the parties may contract for an express warranty, or they may rely upon the warranty which the law implies. Our Code declares that, if there is no express covenant of warranty, the seller warrants that he has a valid title and right to sell, that the article sold is merchantable and reasonably suited to the use intended, and that he knows of no latent defects undisclosed. Civil Code 1895, § 3555. In Benjamin on Sales, 7th ed. § 621, it is said that "where the written sale contains no warranty, or expresses the warranty that is given by the vendor, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove the existence of a warranty in the former case, or to extend it in the latter by inference or implication." So, where it appears that the agreement has been integrated in the writing, the terms of the writing cannot be changed or contradicted by parol evidence.

The essential thing to be ascertained in a suit upon a promissory note given for a particular described chattel, in order to exclude parol evidence, is whether or not it varies the terms of the note, or, if the agreement has been integrated in the note, whether it varies the terms of the contract, as expressed in the note. Ordinarily a promissory note given for the purchase price of an article is intended to contain only the obligation of the vendee; and that obligation is to pay the vendor a definite sum of money at a definite time. The vendor's obligation has no place in a purely negotiable instrument given by the vendee; and in a suit upon a promissory note for the price of personal property, which does not purport to disclose the contract of sale, evidence of a parol warranty of the property, and a breach of the warranty, is admissible. Kemp v. Byne, 54 Ga. 527. The maker of a negotiable note for the purchase of a chattel may incorporate therein the complete contract of sale; and when this is done, the law will not permit him to prove different or additional terms. Moultrie Repair Co. v. Hill, 120 Ga. 730, 48 S. E. 143; Bullard v. Brewer, supra. In these cases the purchaser signed a note which reserved the title of the property sold in the seller, and also contained the other provisions of the sale contract. The maker of a negotiable note for the purchase of a chattel may, without integrating the entire agreement of sale, express therein partial terms of sale. A purchaser of an article, who gives his note for the price of the article, and therein accepts a limited warranty, and stipulates not to exact anything beyond, will not be allowed to prove by parol another representation or warranty of the seller, unless upon the ground of fraud. Allen v. Young, 62 Ga. 617; Patterson v. Ramspeck, 81 Ga. 808, 10 S. E. 390.

Applying these observations to the query of the court of appeals, we do not think that a note which expresses that the consideration thereof is the purchase price of a specific article (nothing more appearing) indicates upon its face that the terms of sale have been integrated in the writing, and parol evidence is admissible to show a failure of consideration, consequent upon a breach of a contemporaneous parol express warranty.

g. Sufficiency of proof to repel inference or presumption, 288.

I. Scope and introduction.

It is the purpose of this note to determine the nature, character, and force of the implication attributable to the circumstance that one who drafted or was otherwise active in the preparation and execution of a will receives a benefit thereunder, both where it stands alone and where it exists in conjunction with other circumstances, notably the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and such beneficiary; the circumstances which add force to such implication; its effect, if any, upon the burden of proof; the circumstances under which it becomes necessary to introduce evidence to repel it; and the amount and character of proof necessary to that end.

It is important to note at the outset that the whole origin and cause of the difficulty which pervades this subject lies in the want of a satisfactory and accurate terminology in relation to the subject of presumption and the kindred subject of burden of proof. The word "presumption" has been loosely, yet, for want of a better word, necessarily, used to describe the whole gamut of indirect proof, ranging from a simple inference up to the establishment of a fact so indisputably that no amount of opposing evidence will be permitted to overturn it. Nor is the situation much improved by the employment of the terms "presumption of law" and "presumption of fact." One has only to turn to the judicial definitions of these terms to discover astounding differences of opinion as to their signification.

In the present connection some courts have used the word "presumption" as connoting something from which the existence of the fact in issue may, but not necessarily must, be inferred; but have been understood by others as having used the word as signifying something from which an inference as to the existence of the fact in issue must, in the absence of rebutting evidence, be drawn. This confusion is doubtless in a large measure due to the fact that the rule as to the onus of explanation being upon the beneficiary is laid down in many cases, and especially in the English decisions, not as a rule of law, but as a precept by which the court as a trier of the fact in issue, would be guided.

In this note where the word "presumption" is used alone and without qualification, it must be understood simply as meaning an inference the probative force of which is within the domain of the trier of the fact.

Less difficulty is encountered in connection with the term "burden of proof," which, it must be remembered, has a twofold meaning. In one sense—the sense in which it is to be held to be upon the party having the affirmative of the issue—it is used as signifying the risk of nonpersuasion of the jury; while in the other sense it denotes the duty of producing evidence to satisfy the judge, and so to bring or keep the issue within the domain of the trier of the fact. It is obvious that while the burden of proof in the first sense does not shift, it may in the second. See Wigmore, Ev. §§ 2485–2490.

Bethell v. Moore, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 311; 2 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 234.

The inferences of which the circumstance under discussion goes to form the basis are of two kinds, which may, but, as will presently be shown, do not necessarily, coexist,--the one being of fraud and deceit and the other of undue influence. The first arises from the circumstance itself, while the second arises from the circumstance when taken in conjunction with certain others.

Thus, it has been held that the presumption which arises against a will by reason of the draftsman taking a benefit thereunder is one of falsity and fraud (Von Stentz v. Comyn, 12 Ir. Eq. Rep. 622), but not of undue influence (Berry v. Hamilton, 10 B. Mon. 129; Carpenter v. Hall, 19 N. Y. Supp. 778, affirmed without opinion in 141 N. Y. 572, 36 N. E. 345; Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187),--in the latter of which cases it is said that such conduct or participation, to create a presumption of undue influence, must be coupled with a benefit under the will and evidence of confidential relations or dependency, or some position or fact which tends to show that the party was able to exercise undue influence if he desired to do so.

L. 232); or that the mere formal proof of the execution of the paper is not enough to entitle it to probate (Daniel v. Hill; Lyons v. Campbell; Peck v. Belden; and Re Eckler,—supra; Kelly v. Settegast, 68 Tex. 10, 2 S. W. 870).

This rule is not exclusive and uniform, but in its application is modified by the circumstances of each particular case. (McKnight v. Wright, supra, Mordecai v. Canty—S. C.—, 68 S. E. 1049); the suspicion may be strong or weak, depending upon all the attending circumstances (Snodgrass v. Smith; Griffith v. Diffenderffer; and Bennett v. Bennett,—supra), such as, for instance, the amount of the benefit, its proportion to the whole estate, or the claims of the party on the bounty of decedent (Barry v. Butlin; Lyons v. Campbell; Patton v. Allison, supra). It is increased where the draftsman is the attorney or confidential agent of the deceased (Paske v. Ollat; Ingram v. Wyatt; Hill v. Barge; and Garrett v. Heflin,—supra), and is strengthened by extreme debility in testator, and clandestinity (Paske v. Ollat; Hill v. Barge; and Garrett v. Heflin,—supra); doubtful testamentary capacity (Griffith v. Diffenderffer and Bennett v. Bennett, supra); by the absence of any disinterested person at the time of its execution, by secrecy observed in relation there-

The presumption of law is that, by reason of the relations existing between the proponent and the testator, and because she wrote the will, and was the principal legatee therein, the testator was under legal restraint at the time he executed the original will, and that the proponent exerted undue influence on the testator, and induced him to make the will in her favor.

to, and by the circumstance that the witnesses were friends of the beneficiary, unknown to the testator, and did not know the paper attested by them was of a testamentary character (Hegarty v. King, supra); or by the fact that the beneficiary took charge of the will immediately upon its execution, and that it was not read by the subscribing witnesses, nor to the decedent in their presence. (Re Hollingsworth, supra); or by the fact that the beneficiary is a stranger to the testator's blood. (Adams v. McBeath; Lyons v. Campbell; and Griffith v. Diffenderffer,—supra).

On the other hand, such suspicion is in some cases of no weight at all, as where the gift to the draftsman is of trifling value, or moderate in amount. Barry v. Butlin and Bennett v. Bennett, supra; Trubey v. Richardson, 224 Ill. 130, 79 N. E. 592.

Although in one instance (Hughes v. Meredith, 24 Ga. 325, 71 Am. Dec. 127) the rule is stated as though an absence of relationship were an element thereof, it has been expressly held that the rule is not limited to cases where the beneficiary is a stranger to the blood of the testator. Hegarty v. King, supra. But in Pennsylvania the rule seems to be qualified to the extent that where the draftsman benefited by the will is a blood relative it is not necessary for him to produce affirmative proof that the testator was acquainted with its contents. See Blume v. Hartman, 115 Pa. 32, 2 Am. St. Rep. 525, 8 Atl. 219.

a. Application of rule where beneficiary not actual draftsman.

The rule that the participation of a beneficiary in the making of a will will arouse the vigilance of the court is applicable where such beneficiary has much to do with its preparation, or is particularly active in procuring its execution, as well as where the beneficiary is the actual draftsman. Lyons v. Campbell, supra (where the residuary legatee and executor procured the will to be written by his son, from his own direction); Purdy v. Hall, supra (where one of the chief beneficiaries did not get the lawyer whom the testator desired to draw the will, but procured the services of another, of his own selection, and the will was prepared by such lawyer in the presence of the beneficiary and the testator, no one else being present); Den ex dem. Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. L. 117, 51 Am. Dec. 253 (where the will was drawn at the lodgings of the principal devisee, who actually took part in preparing the draft, and paid the attorney); Delafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9 (where the chief beneficiary of a codicil prepared and gave instructions therefor, it being drawn up at her suggestion, upon her procurement, and by counsel employed by her); Tyler v. Gardiner, 35 N. Y. 559 (where the principal beneficiary under a will executed by a party borne down by disease and close upon the verge of death, prepared formal instructions, employed a draftsman, and selected the witnesses, being present at every stage of the proceedings); Swails v. White, 149 Pa. 261, 24 Atl. 292 (where the will was prepared by the direction of one of the two beneficiaries named therein, the scrivener and the testator not being brought together); Miller v. Livingstone, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338 (where the beneficiary gave instructions for the will, directed its terms, and it was drawn at her request); O'Brien's Appeal, 100 Me. 156, 60 Atl. 880; Slinger's Will, 72 Wis. 22, 37 N. W. 236.

App. 513; McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 533; Page, Wills, 483, 486, 491, 560.

The execution of the will in the presence of two witnesses is not sufficient to overcome the presumption.

Boyd v. Boyd, 66 Pa. 283; Claffey v. Ledwith, 56 N. J. Eq. 333, 38 Atl. 433; Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147, 2 Am. Rep. 491; Lyons v. Campbell, 88 Ala. 462, 7 So. 250.

But compare, in this connection, Logan's Estate, 195 Pa. 282, 45 Atl. 729, in which the fact that the son of testatrix, who was a preferred beneficiary, procured the scrivener who wrote the will, and communicated to him the data therefor, was held to raise no presumption against the validity of the will.

b. Application where draftsman not directly benefited.

The rule has been held applicable where the will was written by the husband of the principal beneficiary (Hill v. Barge, 12 Ala. 687; Montague v. Allan, 78 Va. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 384; Waddington v. Buzby, 45 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The burden was on the proponent to show that no undue influence was exerted.

Nexsen v. Nexsen, 2 Keyes, 229; Hill v. Barge, 12 Ala. 687; Bush v. Delano, 113 Mich. 321, 71 N. W. 628; Claffey v. Ledwith, supra; Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 106 Ala. 314, 17 So. 516; Patton v. Allison, 7 Humph. 320; Crispell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. 393; Waddington v. Buzby, supra; Weston v. Teufel, 213 Ill. 291, 72 N. E. 908; Moore v. Spier, 80 Ala. 129; Barkman v. Richards, 63 N. J. Eq. 211, 49 Atl. 831; Blume v. Hartman, 115 Pa. 32, 2 Am. St. Rep. 525, 8 Atl. 219; Re Miller, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338; Riddell v. Johnson, 26 Gratt. 152; Jones v. Roberts, 37 Mo. App. 163; McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 533; Hegney v. Head, 126 Mo. 619, 29 S. W. 587; Richmond's Ap-

N. J. Eq. 173, 14 Am. St. Rep. 706, 16 Atl. 690); and where a bequest was made to the infant children of the draftsman (McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682); or where a son of the draftsman was one of the principal legatees (Waddington v. Buzby, supra); and where the will was drawn and its execution supervised by a son of the sole beneficiary (Tyrrell v. Panton [1894] P. 151).

But the rule has been held to have no application where the only interest taken by the draftsman, or person alleged to have procured the will, was his appointment as executor (Woodson v. Holmes, 117 Ga. 19, 43 S. E. 467; Linton's Appeal, 104 Pa. 228; Re Thompson, 121 App. Div. 470, 106 N. Y. Supp. 111); or where the draftsman was named as trustee of some of the beneficiaries, it being considered that, in legal contemplation, the duties and responsibilities of the position are a full equivalent of any merely personal advantage arising from it (Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241; Re Thompson, supra).

For similar decisions with reference to the presumption of fraud and deceit, see appropriate heading, infra.

But in Tomkins v. Tomkins, 1 Bail. 92, 19 Am. Dec. 656, it is held that although the interest taken by the draftsman, named by a will to act as guardian for certain children, may be inconsiderable, he falls within the suspicions on which the rule is founded that strong proof of intention is required where an act is done by the agency of the party to be benefited.

In Drake's Appeal, 45 Conn. 9, the question was left open whether the interest of a vestryman of a church, which received a benefit under the will of which he was the draughtsman, was such as to warrant the application of the principle.

c. Probative force.

Fraud may be inferred from the circumstance alone that the draftsman of a will is a beneficiary thereunder (Ingram v. Wyatt, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 384; Von Stentz v. Comyn, 12 Ir. Eq. Rep. 622); but such

The validity of the instrument as a will circumstance is not necessarily decisive evidence thereof (Paine v. Hall, 18 Ves. Jr. 475; Snodgrass v. Smith, 42 Colo. 60, 94 Pac. 312, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 548; Cramer v. Crumbaugh, 3 Md. 491; Post v. Mason, 91 N. Y. 539, 43 Am. Rep. 689; Booth v. Kitchen, 3 Redf. 52).

It is in no case more than a suspicious circumstance, the weight of which is for the jury to determine. Snodgrass v. Smith, supra; Griffith v. Diffenderffer, 50 Md. 466; Bennett v. Bennett, 50 N. J. Eq. 439, 26 Atl. 573; Dudley v. Gates, 124 Mich. 446, 83 N. W. 97, 86 N. W. 959; Re Carver, 3 Misc. 567, 23 N. Y. Supp. 753, affirmed without opinion in 75 Hun, 612, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1126; Downey v. d. Effect upon burden of proof.

While in a number of the cases expressions may be found to the effect that the onus is upon him who propounds the will to rebut and overcome the presumption arising from the circumstance that the draftsman takes a large interest thereby, by showing that the testator knew its contents (Lyons v. Campbell, 88 Ala. 462, 7 So. 250; McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 533; Hughes v. Meredith, 24 Ga. 325, 71 Am. Dec. 127; Carrie v. Cumming, 26 Ga. 690; Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 298, 25 N. E. 645; Nexsen v. Nexsen, 2 Keyes, 229; Blume v. Hartman, 115 Pa. 32, 2 Am. St. Rep. 525, 8 Atl. 219; Tyrrell v. Painton, supra; McHugh v. Doolley, 10 B. C. 537), it has been said that where the maxim qui se scripsit heredem has been held to impose upon the proponent proof of a more clear and satisfactory character there has intervened the element either of impaired faculties or weakened mind, or some affirmative evidence tending to show undue influence, or some intimate relation of a confidential or fiduciary character between the testator and the writer of the will. (Booth v. Kitchen, supra.) See, as supporting this position, cases under 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) heading, "circumstances under which proponent required to present additional proof," infra.

It is probable also that all that is meant in most cases by such expressions is that the proponent, by failing to introduce evidence directly tending to show that testator knew the contents of the will, simply runs the risk of a contrary inference being drawn by the tribunal to which the decision of the question is committed. See, by way of illustration, Dudley v. Gates, supra, in which an instruction that the law looks upon the circumstance that a will was drawn by proponent's husband as raising a suspicion, the weight of which is for the jury to determine, but which is sufficient to render it incumbent upon the party offering the will for probate to remove such suspicion by evidence, was approved.

The more discriminating decisions hold that the circumstance that the draftsman or one active in procuring the execution of a will received a considerable benefit thereunder will not cast the burden of proof upon the proponent (Griffith v. Diffenderffer and Downey v. Murphey, supra; Miller v. Livingstone, 31 Utah, 415, 88 Pac. 338); and that the unexplained existence of such circumstance will not create a presumption which will require the court to pronounce against the will (Paine v. Hall; Snodgrass v. Smith; and Cramer v. Crumbaugh, supra; Post v. Mason, 91 N. Y. 539, 43 Am. Rep. 689; Booth v. Kitchen, supra); but that it is in no case more than a suspicious circumstance (Snodgrass v. Smith, supra; Griffith v. Diffenderffer; Bennett v. Bennett; Re Carver; Riddell v. Johnson; and Cheatham v. Hatcher, supra), the weight of which is for the jury to determine (Griffith v. Diffenderffer; Dudley v. Gates, and Downey v. Murphey, supra).

And in one case the court has even gone so far as to say that if the draftsman of a will and the principal beneficiary turn out to be one and the same person, it is not the business of the court to stigmatize the fact as a suspicious circumstance, it being for the jury to determine whether it is, in the particular case they are trying, a suspicious circumstance or not. Stirling v. Stirling, 64 Md. 138, 21 Atl. 273.

With reference to this phase of the question, it was said in the leading case of Barry v. Butlin, 2 Moore, P. C. C. 480, apropos of the statement made in an earlier case, that where the party benefited prepares the will, the presumption and onus probandi are against the instrument, and the proof must go not merely to the act of signing, but to the knowledge of the contents of the paper: "If, by these expressions, the learned judge meant merely to say, that there are cases of wills prepared by a legatee, so pregnant with suspicion, that they ought to be pronounced against in the absence of evidence in support of them, and that extending to clear proof of the actual knowledge of the contents, by the supposed testator, and that instructions proceeding from him, or the reading over the instrument by or to him, are the most satisfactory evidence of such knowledge; we fully concur in the proposition so understood; in all probability the learned judge intended no more than this. But if the words used are to be construed strictly; if it is intended to be stated as a rule of law, that in every case in which the party preparing a will derives a benefit under it, the onus probandi is shifted, and that not only a certain measure but a particular species of proof is thereupon required from the party propounding the will,—we feel bound to say that we assume the doctrine to be incorrect. The strict meaning of the term onus probandi is this, that if no evidence is given by the party on whom the burden is cast, the issue must be found against him. In all cases the onus is imposed on the party propounding a will, it is in general discharged by proof of capacity, and the fact of execution, from which the knowledge of and assent to the contents of the instrument are assumed, and it cannot be that the simple fact of the party who prepared the will being himself a legatee is in every case, and under all circumstances, to create a contrary presumption, and to call upon the court to pronounce against the will, unless additional evidence is produced to prove the knowledge of its contents by the deceased. A single instance, of not unfrequent occurrence, will test the truth of this proposition. A man of acknowledged competence and habits of business, worth £100,000, leaves the bulk of his property to his family, and a legacy of £50 to his confidential attorney, who prepared the will; would this fact throw the burden of proof of actual cognizance by the testator, of the contents of the will, on the party propounding it, so that if such proof were not supplied, the will would be pronounced against? The answer is obvious, it would not. All that can be truly said is, that if a person, whether attorney or not, prepares a will with a legacy to himself, it is, at most, a suspicious circumstance, of more or less weight, according to the facts of each particular case; in some, of no weight at all, as in the case suggested, varying according to circumstances; for instance, the quantum of the legacy, and the proportion it bears to the property disposed of, and numerous other contingencies: but in no case amounting to more than a circumstance of suspicion, demanding the vigilant care and circumspection of the court in investigating the case, and calling upon it not to grant probate without full and entire satisfaction that the instrument did express the real intentions of the deceased."

e. Circumstances under which proponent required to present additional proof.

Although, in the nature of things, no precedent is likely to be on all fours with any future case, the following decisions, showing the circumstances under which it has been held incumbent on the proponent to produce additional evidence in order to establish the will, may be of some value. These are presented without regard to whether the production of such evidence is to be required as a matter of law, or simply at the risk of an unfavorable inference being drawn in its absence.

Ginter v. Ginter, 79 Kan. 721, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024, 101 Pac. 634.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Probate of the will of Peter Kirby was refused by the probate court, but granted by the district court on appeal, and this proceeding is brought to review that order. The will was written by his oldest child, Mary Kirby Sellards, who was the executrix and a principal beneficiary, on five sheets of paper, which were separate at the time of its execution, but fastened together with a pin when offered for probate; the second and fourth pages being interchanged. The

had been prepared by the residuary legatee for testatrix, a very old lady, in failing health, without her having had any independent advice or assistance, and that the fact of the execution had been kept absolutely secret, it was held that, under the circumstances, the onus was upon such beneficiary to show that the document clearly expressed the mind and intention of the testatrix.

In Wright v. Jewell, 9 Manitoba L. Rep. 607, where the evidence as to the mental capacity of the testator was conflicting, and the will was procured to be prepared and executed by the beneficiaries, it was held that the onus was upon them of proof that the transaction was a righteous one.

In Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 298, 25 N. E. 645, it was held that the fact that a will gave the bulk of a large and valuable estate to a certain beneficiary and his immediate relatives, that such beneficiary did not get the lawyer whom the testator desired to draw the will, but procured the services of another lawyer, of his own selection, and that the will was prepared by such lawyer in the presence of the beneficiary and the testator, no one else being present, imposed the burden upon the proponents to show that the testator knew what disposition he was making of his property.

In Howell v. Taylor, 50 N. J. Eq. 428, 26 Atl. 566, where it appeared that the testator was feeble in mind and easily imposed upon; that one of the principal legatees personally gave instruction to the draftsman of the will, and paid him for his services; that two of the legatees were present at the execution of the document, and the will subsequently came from their possession,—it was said that these circumstances are sufficient to excite the judicial mind to suspicious scrutiny, and naturally call upon those who participated in the production of the will, and who profited by it, to satisfy the court that the document was not the product of their unlawful management.

In Tyler v. Gardiner, 35 N. Y. 559, it is said that where the principal beneficiary under a will prepared for execution by a party worn down by disease, and close upon the verge of death, assumes the responsibility of initiating it, of preparing formal instructions, of employing the draftsman, of selecting the witnesses, of being present at every stage of the proceedings, and of excluding those to whose inheritance a new direction is given, it behooves such beneficiary to be provided with evidence that the instrument expresses the honest and spontaneous purposes of the person who is called upon, at such a time, to reverse the provisions of a previous testamentary disposition, made in health and strength, in favor of those having clear claims upon his justice and bounty.

In Crispell v. Dubois, supra, where a will containing a considerable gift to the draftsman was drawn by one standing in a relation of special confidence to testatrix, both as her medical attendant and confidential adviser, and testatrix was at the time laboring under the influence of a painful illness, which proved fatal a few hours afterward, and the objects of her bounty were all strangers to her blood, to the exclusion of an only brother, it was held that the circumstances of the case were such as to create a strong presumption against the validity of the will, which could be overcome only by very clear proof of the unbiased intention of the testatrix to make such a disposition of her property as was contained in the will, and that it was executed by her with full understanding of the nature and effect of the instrument.

In Re Soule, 22 Abb. N. C. 236, 3 N. Y. Supp. 259, affirmed without opinion in 57 Hun, 586, 11 N. Y. Supp. 949, where the testator was about ninety years of age, physically infirm, slow of movement, poor of sight, so that he depended upon others to read to him, and the instrument was, in respect to the most important provisions, contrary to the previous will and codicils, and the attorney and draftsman was one of the beneficiaries, it was held that such facts required that the proponents should satisfy the court by a clear preponderance signature of the testator and the witnesses appeared only on the last sheet, and the only direct testimony as to the identity of the others was that of Mrs. Sellards. The opponent of the will contends that the proof in this respect failed by reason of the incompetence of the witness, and also that a presumption of undue influence arose from the relation of the draftsman to the testator.

The statute (Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 117, § 11; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 9786) provides that "if a devise or bequest be given to a person who is a witness to the will, and the will cannot otherwise be proved than by the testimony of such witness, the devise or bequest shall be void, and the witness shall be competent to give testimony of the execution of the will in like manner as if such deviser or bequest had not been made." Clearly, however, the words "witness to the will" refer to an attesting witness. This accords with the purpose and history of the legislation. That the statute distinguishes between a witness to the will and one who testifies in its support when it is offered for probate is made apparent by the original language of the succeeding section, providing that "the court shall cause the witnesses to such will, and such other witnesses or any person interested in having the same admitted to probate as may desire, to come before such court." Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 117, § 12; Gen. Stat. 1901, § 7948. Mrs. Sellards was not a witness to the will in such a sense that her competency was affected by her interest. Moreover, her testimony was not of evidence that the testator fully understood the nature and consequences of the testamentary act.

In Leaycraft v. Simmons, 3 Bradf. 35, where a testator eighty-nine years old executed a will at his son's residence, of which the son was the draftsman, and under which the son was the principal beneficiary, without the knowledge of his daughter, his only other child, it was held that, in view of all the circumstances, it was proper to look for evidence outside the will indicating a recognition of its contents by the testator.

In Re Elster, 39 Misc. 63, 78 N. Y. Supp. 871, it was held that where the evidence disclosed that the testator was of advanced age, of impaired faculties, and feeble in mind and body; unable to read and write; and signed by mark a will drawn solely under the direction and dictation of one of the chief beneficiaries; the witnessing of the execution by all the legatees in the presence of the subscribing witnesses; the disinheritance, without apparent reason, of probable objects of his bounty; previous wills made; short duration of time between the making of the will and the death of the testator,—under such circumstances the ordinary presumptions flowing from the act of formal execution do not obtain, but the burden is thrown upon the parties seeking to establish the testamentary act to show that all those precautions were taken, and those explanations were had, that were necessary to secure to the testator the full, free, and unbiased action of his impaired faculties.

While the circumstance that one standing in a relation of trust or confidence is instrumental to any extent in procuring a testamentary provision in his own favor does not, in and of itself, invalidate the bequest, it calls for satisfactory explanation, and imposes upon him claiming under such provision the burden of showing that it was in all respects fair and honest. Re Carver, 3 Misc. 567, 23 N. Y. Supp. 753, affirmed without opinion in 75 Hun, 612, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1126.

the draftsman of a will, a stranger to the blood of testator, received the whole estate, it was held that, in view of the peculiarity of the language employed, the age, condition of mind, and degree of intelligence of the testator, the burden was on the proponent to show that testator knew and understood what disposition he was making of his property.

In Boyd v. Boyd, 66 Pa. 283, where it appeared that a testator was aged, infirm, not of a strong mind, and exceedingly illiterate, and that the will, which was drawn by his business adviser, contained substantial benefits to the scrivener and his family, it was held that the onus was upon the scrivener of showing that the provisions of the will were fully explained to and understood by the testator, and fully assented to by him.

Where the will of an old, infirm, mentally weak man makes the draftsman a residuary legatee, the burden is upon him to prove affirmatively that the alleged testator was laboring under no mistaken apprehension as to the value of his property and the probable amount of his residuary estate. Cuthbertson's Appeal, 97 Pa. 163.

In Wilson's Appeal, 99 Pa. 545, where it appeared that one of the chief beneficiaries named in the will of a testator of great age and physical infirmity was a trusted and confidential friend, who was the main instrument in procuring the preparation and execution of the will in question, it was held that the burden was upon such beneficiary affirmatively to show that the gift to him was the free, intelligent act of the testator.

In Kelly v. Settegast, 68 Tex. 16, 2 S. W. 870, where the paper claimed to be the will of the decedent was written by the person who, under it, would take one half of his estate, though, at the suggestion of one of the persons who subsequently became a subscribing witness, it was copied by another person, and the decedent was aged, ill, and unable to read, and the alleged will gave all his estate to strangers to his blood, ignoring the claims of his children, it was held that it should be shown that the testator necessary to identify the unsigned sheets. As the first four pages happened to end with incomplete sentences, the connection of the subject-matter made as effective a union of the several parts as could have been accomplished by their physical attachment. "It is a rudimental principle that a will may be made on distinct papers. . . . It is sufficient that they are connected by their internal sense, by coherence, or adaptation of parts." Wikoff's Appeal, 15 Pa. 281, 53 Am. Dec. 597; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 580. correctly understood the contents of the paper which he signed, and that the mere formal proof of the execution of the paper was not enough to entitle it to probate.

f. Character and sufficiency of proof to repel suspicion of fraud.

1. Degree.

It has been variously said that the proof that the instrument propounded expressed the true will of the deceased, necessary to repel the suspicion arising from the circumstance under discussion, must be clear (Lyons v. Campbell, 88 Ala. 462, 7 So. 250; Swails v. White, 149 Pa. 261, 24 Atl. 292); clear and satisfactory (Baker v. Batt, 2 Moore, P. C. C. 317; Barry v. Butlin, 2 Moore, P. C. C. 480; Raworth v. Marriott, 1 Myl. & K. 643; Mitchell v. Thomas, 6 Moore, P. C. C. 137; Hegarty v. King, Jr. L. R. 7 Eq. 18; Von Stentz v. Comyn, 12 Ir. Eq. Rep. 622; Ingram v. Wyatt, 1 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 384; Durling v. Loveland, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 225; Brown v. Fisher, 63 L. T. N. S. 465; Parker v. Duncan, 62 L. T. N. S. 642; Scoular v. Plowright, 28 L. T. 193; Fulton v. Andrew, L. R. 7 H. L. 448; Hogg v. Maguire, 11 Ont. App. Rep. 507; Adams v. McBeath, 27 Can. S. C. 13; Snodgrass v. Smith, 42 Colo. 60, 94 Am. Dec. 312, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 548); strict (Hill v. Barge, 12 Ala. 687; Garrett v. Heflin, 98 Ala. 615, 39 Am. St. Rep. 89, 13 So. 326); strong (Adair v. Adair, 30 Ga. 102); satisfactory (Crispell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. 393); such as will satisfy the jury that the testator was not imposed on (Duffield v. Robeson, 2 Harr. [Del.] 375; Beall v. Mann, 5 Ga. 456; Rush v. Delano, 113 Mich. 321, 71 N. W. 628); such as to give full and entire satisfaction to the court or jury (Purdy v. Hall, 134 Ill. 308, 25 N. E. 645; England v. Fawbush, 204 Ill. 384, 68 N. E. 526; Re Soule, 22 Abb. N. C. 236, 3 N. Y. Supp. 259, affirmed without opinion in 57 Hun, 586, 11 N. Y. Supp. 949).

In McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 533, and Hill v. Barge, 12 Ala. 687, it was said that the proof that the testator knew and un-

A further contention is that the fact that the will was written by the testator's daughter, who was one of the principal beneficiaries, created a presumption of undue influence which was not rebutted by any evidence. There is some apparent conflict in the authorities as to the effect to be given to the circumstance that a will is drafted by a legatee. In Underhill on the Law of Wills, it is said (§ 137): "Many cases seem to hold that the circumstance that a party draws a will, . . . under which he takes a legacy, . . . raises a presumption of undue influence exerted by him, which must be rebutted by clear and satisfactory evidence. . . . But the safer and more correct statement of the rule is that such a condition of affairs creates no pre-derstood the contents of the will should be so satisfactory and convincing as not to leave a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury; but in Garrett v. Heflin, supra, it was said that possibly such measure of proof was too stringent, as in civil cases the proper measure of proof is that the jury must be reasonably satisfied of the truth of any fact.

In Paske v. Ollat, 2 Phillim. Eccl. Rep. 323, it was said that the proof must be clear and decisive, and that the balance must not be held in equilibrio.

2. Amount.

In Durnell v. Cornfield, 1 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 51, it is said that the proof must be in proportion to the degree of suspicion, which, of course, will vary; that the greater the benefit and the less the capacity, the more stringent is the requirement of proof of knowledge of the contents.

The amount of proof necessary to repel suspicion may be increased by circumstances, such as testator's unbounded confidence in the draftsman of the will, extreme disability in the testator, clandestinity, and other circumstances, which may increase the presumption even so much as to be conclusive against the instrument. Paske v. Ollat; Hill v. Barge; and Garrett v. Heflin,—supra.

If the interest is small in proportion to the whole estate, and the decedent, at the time of making the will, was in health, and in the possession of his faculties, slight proof will suffice. On the other hand, if his mind is feeble, and the party drawing the will takes a considerable portion of the estate, to the exclusion of the heirs, proof of a most conclusive nature will be required. Drake's Appeal, 45 Conn. 9.

3. Kind.

No particular species of evidence is required to show that testator knew and approved of the contents of a will by which the draftsman benefits. Durling v. Loveland, 2 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 225; Mitchell v. Thomas, 6 Moore, P. C. C. 137.

sumption, but merely raises a suspicion which ought to appeal to the vigilance of the court. . . . It is a fact to be considered with other facts. It is undoubtedly a suspicious fact, but its weight depends, not solely upon its character, but upon the facts and circumstances with which it is connected. In some cases it would have no weight at all. Thus, if it appear that the testator had testamentary capacity, that he dictated his will, and knew its contents at the date of its execution, and that it was executed in the statutory manner, the mere fact that the will was written by the sole beneficiary would not be enough, unless coupled with other extremely suspicious facts, to overthrow it, or, taken alone, to cast the slightest suspicion upon it." What justly creates suspicion is not that the draftsman is a legatee, or even a sole legatee, but that he receives an unreasonable or unnatural benefit. This idea is thus expressed in Schouler on Wills, 3d ed. § 245: "The circumstance that a party who derives under the will a disproportionate benefit, or a benefit to which he had no natural claim, is the party who drew it, lends disfavor to the instrument, and may turn the scale against its admission to probate. . . . Our later cases appear to rule that, wherever the testator's draftsman or manager of the execution may be thought worthy of some generous token, undue influence and fraud are not to be presumed from the fact that the will gives him a legacy or executorship accordingly. The extent of his benefit,

It may be circumstantial as well as direct. Raworth v. Marriott, 1 Myl. & K. 643; Beall v. Mann, 5 Ga. 456.

Such proof may take the form of evidence that the will was read to testator or by him, though not necessarily so (Snodgrass v. Smith, 42 Colo. 60, 94 Pac. 312, 15 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 548), or that he gave instructions for such a will, or of some other fact or facts equal as evidence to one of these (Hughes v. Meredith, 24 Ga. 325, 71 Am. Dec. 127).

4. Specific instances.

In Durling v. Loveland, supra, it is said that the drawer of a will taking a considerable benefit under it need not do more than show that deceased had knowledge of its contents.

In Paske v. Ollat, supra, it was held that the suspicion arising from the fact that the draftsman of the will received a legacy therein was repelled by evidence that the instructions from which the will was drawn originated with the testator, and were a surprise to the draftsman, who suggested that another solicitor be employed, and openly refused to act as an attesting witness upon the ground of his being an interested party.

In Woodson v. Holmes, 117 Ga. 19, 43 S. E. 467, it was held that the rule of law that where a party preparing or procuring a will takes a large beneficial interest thereunder, stricter proof than usual is necessary to show knowledge of the contents of the will on the part of the testator, has no application in a case where the only interest taken by the party alleged to have procured the will was his appointment as executor without bond or the necessity to make returns, and the provision for the payment of a debt due to him by the estate of the testatrix, the evidence of which he already held; and where it appears that such person did nothing to suggest or instigate the making of the will, but acted only in furtherance of the expressed wishes of the testatrix.

was held that the fact that the attorney who drew the will was named as executor, and received a legacy constituting a relatively small portion of the estate, was entitled to little weight, where it appeared that the draftsman was a nephew, and received under the will the same sum as all other nephews and nieces of the testatrix, that he had been her attorney for years, that she had the initiative in the preparation of the will, and that no secrecy attended its execution.

In Den ex dem. Trumbull v. Gibbons, 22 N. J. L. 117, 51 Am. Dec. 253, it is held that the suspicion attaching to the participation of a principal devisee in the preparation of the will is removed by evidence that the testator was a man of strong mind and strong self-will, that he was at the time in the full vigor of his intellectual powers, that he was in no wise dependent upon the devisee, that he did not reside with him, was in free intercourse with others, that the attorney received his instructions from the testator himself, and that the principal provision in favor of the devisee had been prepared by the testator in his own writing years before.

Proof necessary to show that the testator was not imposed on by a will containing a benefit to the draftsman is supplied by evidence of instructions given to the writer; that the testator read over the will, being of sufficient capacity to understand what he was reading; or by other evidence showing that he knew the will was in favor of the writer. Duffield v. Robeson, 2 Harr. (Del.) 375.

Where there is neither mental imbecility, dependence on the legatee, glaring change in testamentary intention, unreasonable or inofficious bequests in favor of the legatee, attempts on his part to conceal from others interested knowledge of the will, strangeness in the fact that the legatee drafted the will, or any other circumstances tending to confirm the suspicion which that fact may engender,—under these conditions, the suspicion should be laid aside. Rusling v. Rusling, 36 N. J. Eq. 603.

The circumstance that the draftsman of a as compared with that of natural objects of one's bounty, is a matter of some consequence."

So, also, the suspicion that attaches to a will written by a beneficiary is heightened where he sustains a confidential relation toward the testator. That condition is sometimes said to create an actual presumption against the will. Thus Mr. Underhill says: "Where it appears from the evidence that the testator and the beneficiary stood in confidential relations towards one another, and it also appears that the legatee . . . was the draftsman of the will, . . . circumstances are shown from which a presumption of undue influence or fraud arises, which the proponent of the will has the burden of proof to overthrow, and to show that the will was the free and voluntary act of the testator." 1 Underhill, Wills, § 145. On the other hand, a portion of a note in the same work reads: "The fact that the draftsman of a will, who is a legatee at the same time, stands in a confidential relation to the testator, does not, in the absence of affirmative proof of fraud or coercion, raise a presumption against the voluntary character of the will." 1 Underhill, Wills, note 3, p. 196, § 137. And the rule is thus stated in 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 124: "Undue influence is not generally presumed in the case of a legacy or devise made by a client in favor of his attorney from the mere relation itself, or from the circumstance that the will was drawn by the attorney,— will is appointed one of the executors, and is also a legatee, while tending to excite suspicion, is without force where the legacy to the draftsman is moderate in amount, and in just proportion to the sums given to other persons standing in the same relationship to the testator. Coffin v. Coffin, 23 N. Y. 9, 80 Am. Dec. 235.

The fact that a trifling gift is made to the draftsman of a will, who has been upon pleasant and friendly terms with the testator, is insufficient to raise a presumption of fraud or improper influence (Trubey v. Richardson, 224 Ill. 136, 79 N. E. 592), or to shift the burden of proof from the party alleging fraud or undue influence (Stokes v. Miller, 10 W. N. C. 241).

The force of the fact that a lawyer and draftsman of the will was one of the three residuary legatees is overcome by proof that on the part of the testator there was adequate capacity, testamentary intention, and a due execution of the will, with full knowledge of its contents. Post v. Mason, 91 N. Y. 539, 43 Am. Rep. 689.

A suspicion aroused by the circumstance of the draftsman being a beneficiary is removed by the fact that the testator had full testamentary capacity, and knew the contents of the will. Re Soule, 22 Abb. N. C. 236, 3 N. Y. Supp. 259, affirmed without opinion in 57 Hun, 586, 11 N. Y. Supp. 949.

The suspicion aroused by the circumstance that a will contains a provision in favor of the draftsman is removed by evidence of previous declarations of the testator in conformity to the will, often repeated and continuing up to near the time of its execution, all indicating the purpose which the contents of the will developed. Patton v. Allison, 7 Humph. 319.

On the other hand, in Tyrrell v. Painton [1894] P. 151, it was held that the suspicion aroused by the circumstance that a son of the sole beneficiary drew and supervised the execution of the alleged will of an aged and infirm lady was not removed by the evidence of the draftsman and his friend, whom he brought with him to be an attesting witness, and who were the only persons present.

Where a testatrix was in a dying condition at the time the transaction in question occurred, the force of the fact that the beneficiary wrote the instructions and originated the will is not necessarily overcome by the circumstance that they were afterward accepted by the testatrix, and that she assented to the will in which they were embodied. Tyler v. Gardiner, 35 N. Y. 559.

III. As bearing on question of undue influence.

a. Preliminary statement.

Thus far this note has been concerned solely with the inference of fraud or deceit. It is now purposed to consider the bearing of the circumstance under discussion upon the question of undue influence.

It has been held that no presumption of undue influence arises from the fact of participation by a beneficiary or by one closely connected with him in matters relating to the preparation and execution of a will, in the absence of evidence tending to show a relation of confidence or influence between the testator and the person thus taking an active part (Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187); and that such a circumstance is not alone evidence of undue influence (Berry v. Hamilton, 10 B. Mon. 129; Carpenter v. Hall, 19 N. Y. Supp. 778, affirmed without opinion in 141 N. Y. 572, 36 N. E. 345; but that it is only a circumstance to be considered in connection with other circumstances indicative of fraud or undue influence (Re Carver, 3 Misc. 567, 23 N. Y. Supp. 753, affirmed without opinion in 75 Hun, 612, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1126).

So also, in Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573, 15 Atl. 219, it is said that there was no presumption of law or of fact that one who wrote a codicil by which he alone was benefited, controlled the testator's mind; but that whether he did or did not control or improperly influence the testator was a question of fact for the determination of the jury upon all the evidence, including his relations to the testator, his acts and conduct in respect to the making of the will and the

at least, where the legacy or devise is not disproportionately large."

Perhaps an unnecessary difficulty is created by an effort to say at just what point the union of a number of suspicious circumstances, no one of which is enough in itself to defeat probate, shall be deemed to give rise to an actual presumption that a will was the result of undue influence. The real question in each case is whether all the circumstances, so far as shown, are such as to lead the court to believe that in fact the will does not actually express the voluntary purpose of the testator. The substance of Kirby's will was that his property was to go to his wife for her life, and then, except for a specific legacy to each of two granddaughters, to his three children. There is nothing in this disposition to suggest any overreaching on the part of Mrs. Sellards. Nor was she shown to have occupied a position of confidence and trust toward her father beyond that arising from their relationship. If it had appeared that she had been intrusted with the general management of his business, or that he was in the habit of deferring to her judgment in his affairs, a different question would be presented. We think that her writing the will created no presumption of undue influence. No question of incapacity or restraint appears to have been raised at the hearing. The controversy turned chiefly upon whether there had been a revocation. But in seeking to counteract evidence in support of the will, its opponent introduced affidavits of the codicil, and the benefit he derived from them.

And in White v. Cole, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 858, 47 S. W. 759, it was held that the fact that a will was written by a beneficiary, who was a practising lawyer and a relative of the testator, was not sufficient to warrant setting aside a verdict in favor of the proponents upon the issue of undue influence.

The questions, therefore, to be considered in this connection, are, what additional circumstances are necessary to give rise to the presumption of undue influence, the weight of such presumption and its effect, if any, on the burden of proof, its effect as productive of a necessity to introduce evidence in rebuttal, and the character and sufficiency of such evidence to overcome the presumption.

b. In general.

While it is well settled that no presumption of undue influence is raised solely because of a confidential relation existing between a testator and a beneficiary (see Bancroft v. Otis, 91 Ala. 279, 24 Am. St. Rep. 904, 8 So. 286; Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 641, 24 So. 459; McQueen v. Wilson, 131 Ala. 606, 31 So. 94; Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226, 21 Am. St. Rep. 85, 22 Atl. 82; Denning v. Butcher, 91 Iowa, 425, 59 N. W. 69; Re Sparks, 63 N. J. Eq. 242, 51 Atl. 118; Re Cooper [N. J.] 71 Atl. 676, affirmed without opinion in [N. J.] 75 Atl. 1100; Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516), it is held that a presumption of more or less strength arises from such a relation, coupled with activity of a beneficiary in and about the preparation and execution of a will (Collins v. Kilroy, 1 Ont. L. Rep. 503; Daniel v. Hill, 52 Ala. 430; Bancroft v. Otis, supra; Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187; Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 106 Ala. 314, 17 So. 516; Coghill v. Kennedy; Richmond's Appeal; and McQueen v. Wilson,—supra; St. Leger's Appeal, 34 Conn. 434, 91 Am. Dec. 735; Denning v. Butcher, supra; Gilman v. Ayer [N. J.] 47 Atl. 1049, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 806, 52 Atl. 1131; Re Sparks and Re Cooper, supra; Weston v. Teufel, 213 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ill. 291, 72 N. E. 908; Re Bromley, 113 Mich. 53, 71 N. W. 523; Lake v. Ranney, 33 Barb. 49; Re Barney, 70 Vt. 352, 40 Atl. 1027; Montague v. Allan, 78 Va. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 384).

But some decisions limit the presumption to cases where the testimony is conflicting as to testamentary capacity (Yorke's Estate, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 327, affirmed in 185 Pa. 61, 39 Atl. 1119), or, what amounts to the same thing, deny its existence where the testator is shown to have been in a vigorous mental condition (Re Sheldon, 40 N. Y. S. R. 369, 16 N. Y. Supp. 454, affirmed without opinion in 65 Hun, 623, 21 N. Y. Supp. 477; Stevenson v. Kingsley, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 245).

And in the following cases, in which a presumption of undue influence was held to exist, it affirmatively appears that the testator was of weak mind, or aged or infirm, or extremely ill at the time of the execution of the alleged will. Re Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 Pac. 57; England v. Fawbush, 204 Ill. 384, 68 N. E. 526; Wood's v. Devers, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 81, 19 S. W. 1; Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147, 2 Am. Rep. 491; Edgerly v. Edgerly, 73 N. H. 407, 62 Atl. 716; Boisaubin v. Boisaubin, 51 N. J. Eq. 252, 27 Atl. 624; Barkman v. Richards, 63 N. J. Eq. 215, 49 Atl. 831; Crispell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. 393; Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516; Re Everett, (N. C.) 68 S. E. 924; Hoopes's Estate, 174 Pa. 373, 34 Atl. 603; Scattergood v. Kirk, 192 Pa. 263, 43 Atl. 1030.

c. Application of rule where draftsman not directly benefited.

The presumption of undue influence arising from the existence of confidential relations and a benefit to the draftsman does not apply where the draftsman is named therein merely as executor (Carter v. Dixon, 69 Ga. 82; Re Marlbor, 121 App. Div. 398, 105 N. Y. Supp. 131), or as executor and trustee (Livingston's Appeal, 63 Conn. 68, 26 Atl. 470).

For similar decisions with reference to the presumption of fraud and deceit, see appropriate heading, supra.

attesting witnesses which had been read in the probate court, stating, among other things, that when Kirby signed the will he was of sound mind and memory, and not under any restraint.

A recent statute makes this provision: "In all actions to contest a will, if it shall appear that such will was written or prepared by the sole or principal beneficiary in such will, who, at the time of writing or preparing the same, was the confidential agent or legal adviser of the testator, or who occupied at the time any other position of confidence or trust to such testator, such will shall not be held to be valid unless it shall be affirmatively shown that the testator had read or knew the contents of such will, and had independent advice with reference thereto." Laws 1907, chap. 430, § 1; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 9787. This rule by its terms relates to actions to contest a will; but, even if extended by interpretation to cover proceedings for its admission to probate, the present case would not be affected. The requirement that the testator must be shown to have had independent advice clearly implies that, in order to be deemed to occupy a position of confidence or trust to the testator, the draftsman must be someone to whom he naturally looks for counsel. That situation does not follow from the mere relationship of daughter and father.

The fact being established that the will had been duly executed, a more difficult question is whether the evidence showed that it had been revoked. The testator, in Activity in and about the preparation and execution of a will need not, in order to create the legal presumption against the validity of the will when coupled with confidential relations, be on the part of a person who occupies such relations, or of the beneficiary, but if the members of a family have a common scheme or purpose to induce a person to execute a will in favor of any members of a family, one of whom occupies the confidential relation, and another, in the execution of the common purpose, actively participates in the execution of the will by which legacies are given to various members of the family, the legal presumption arising from these facts will cast upon each of the beneficiaries the burden of showing the absence of undue influence. Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 641, 24 So. 459.

The rule was also applied in Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187, and Gilman v. Ayer (N. J.) 47 Atl. 1049 (affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 806, 52 Atl. 1131), where the business adviser of the testatrix caused the preparation and supervised the execution of a will of which, in the first case his wife, and in the second his wife and children, were the chief beneficiaries.

d. Probative force of the so-called "presumption" of undue influence.

As remarked in Edgerly v. Edgerly, supra, there is a difference of opinion as to whether the inference of undue influence arising under the combinations of circumstances above described is one of fact or law. Such difference, however, is largely due to the elasticity of meaning of the term "presumption," to which allusion has been heretofore made; and many of the cases bearing on the point will be found upon analysis not to be so much at variance as upon their face would seem to appear. This phase of the question is, of course, closely related to the matter of burden of proof, under the heading relating to which the decisions as to the necessity, as a matter of law, of producing evidence in rebuttal, will be found.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In a number of cases the statement has been made that the presumption of undue influence arising from the combination of the circumstance under discussion with other facts is not conclusive against the will (Conpher v. Browning, 219 Ill. 429, 109 Am. St. Rep. 346, 76 N. E. 678; O'Brien's Appeal, 100 Me. 156, 60 Atl. 880; Re Bromley, 113 Mich. 53, 71 N. W. 523; Koegel v. Egner, 54 N. J. Eq. 623, 35 Atl. 394; Crispell v. Dubois, supra), but that the issue is one of fact, to be determined by the tribunal to which it is submitted (O'Brien's Appeal and Crispell v. Dubois, supra; Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573, 15 Atl. 219).

Other cases arrive at practically the same conclusion by holding that the presumption of undue influence arising from the preparation of the will in his own favor by one sustaining a fiduciary relation toward the testator is one of fact, and not of law, and may be rebutted by proper evidence. St. Leger's Appeal and Harvey v. Sullens, supra.

In England v. Fawbush, supra, it was held that the active agency of the beneficiary of a will in procuring it to be drawn, especially in the absence of those who have at least equal claims upon the justice of the testator, and where the testator is enfeebled by old age and disease, is a circumstance which will warrant the submission to the jury of the question of undue influence.

In Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226, 21 Am. St. Rep. 85, 22 Atl. 82, it was said that whenever a legacy is given to a person sustaining a relation of special confidence to a testator, or when the individual who prepares the instrument or conducts its execution, not being a relative who would, in the absence of a will, be an heir, derives a benefit from its provisions, in either instance the surrounding circumstances may be such that a presumption would naturally arise against the volition or knowledge of the testator, which presumption, in the absence of rebutting proof or explanation, should justify the finding of a jury that undue influence existed.

So, also, in Woods v. Devers, supra, it was the presence of the subscribing witnesses, signed it with pen and ink below the attestation clause, and not elsewhere. He kept it in his own possession for a few weeks, and then delivered it to the executrix, who retained it until after his death. When she offered it for probate, his ink signature had been partly obliterated by means of knife scratches, and his name had been written in pencil just above the attestation clause, either by himself or by someone who closely imitated his handwriting,—a matter concerning which the opinions of witnesses differed somewhat. The law permits a will to be revoked "by the testator tearing, canceling, obliterating, or destroying the same with the intention of revoking it, by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence or by his direction." Gen. Stat. 1868, chap. 117, § 37; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 9814. In order to accomplish revocation under this provision, it is necessary that the testator, with an intention to revoke, cause some physical defacement of the will, adapted to give expression to that purpose. If the other conditions were proved, there would be no difficulty in saying that here a sufficient actual defacement was shown, for, while the signature was not rendered wholly illegible, the partial erasure of it was of such a character as to suggest a purpose to discredit it. Under the English act requiring "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying," a mere crossing out of the signature, leaving it still legible, is held not to be enough (Williams, Exrs. & Admsrs. 10th ed.

held that from the existence of confidential relations between the testatrix and a devisee, together with the fact that such devisee drafted the will, in connection with her feeble mental condition and the exclusion of her own kindred by the provisions of the instrument, the jury might infer the exercise of undue influence.

It will be perceived that the foregoing decisions cannot properly be considered as authority, pro or con, upon the question whether proof of facts from which the so-called presumption arises establishes prima facie the charge that the execution of the will was the result of undue influence exercised by the beneficiary, so as to render it necessary, in order to bring the issue within the sphere of the trier of fact, for the proponent to bring forward evidence in rebuttal. This question will be considered in the ensuing subdivision.

e. Effect upon burden of proof.

In reviewing the decisions relative to the effect of the presumption of undue influence growing out of the combination of the circumstance under consideration with various other circumstances, upon the burden of proof, it is important to keep in mind the twofold meaning attached to the phrase "burden of proof."

The term is used in its first sense, that of risk of nonpersuasion of the jury, in Weston v. Teufel, 213 Ill. 291, 72 N. E. 908, where it is said that proof of the existence of confidential relations between a testator and a beneficiary, and of the fact that such beneficiary prepared or procured the preparation of the will, while casting upon proponent, if he is to sustain the will, the necessity of showing that the execution of the will was the result of free deliberation on the part of the testator, and of the deliberate exercise of his judgment, and not of imposition or wrong practised by the trusted beneficiary, does not cause the burden of proof to shift, but upon the whole case the burden of proof is upon the contestant to establish the existence of undue influence.

From this proposition there is, and can be, no dispute. But with regard to the second sense in which the term "burden of proof" may be used,—that of the necessity of introducing evidence to keep the issue within the domain of the triers of fact,—it is not easy to determine just what is meant by the decisions; that is, whether the production of evidence in rebuttal is simply necessary to satisfy the triers of the fact, or whether it is necessary to keep the issue of undue influence within the sphere of the triers of fact,—in other words, necessary in order to avoid the direction of a verdict, or a finding of the court as a necessary consequence, in favor of the contestant.

That the proof of facts which give rise to the inference or "presumption" of undue influence does not, as a matter of law, render it incumbent upon the proponent to introduce evidence in rebuttal, seems to be necessarily implied in the holding in certain New York decisions that where the draftsman of a will has been an agent or attorney of the testator, and is made a beneficiary, the courts will closely scrutinize the transaction, but no presumption of undue influence necessarily arises therefrom. Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516; Re Edson, 70 Hun, 122, 24 N. Y. Supp. 71; Clarke v. Schell, 84 Hun, 28, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1053; Re Suydam, 84 Hun, 514, 32 N. Y. Supp. 449, affirmed without opinion in 152 N. Y. 639, 46 N. E. 1152; Re Murphy, 28 Misc. 650, 59 N. Y. Supp. 1078, affirmed in 48 App. Div. 211, 62 N. Y. Supp. 785; Re Gallup, 43 App. Div. 437, 60 N. Y. Supp. 137; Re Wilcox, 55 Misc. 170, 106 N. Y. Supp. 468; Haughian v. Conlan, 86 App. Div. 290, 83 N. Y. Supp. 830.

A like view seems to be taken in Re Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 Pac. 57, in which it is said that evidence that a will was drawn by one of the residuary legatees, who had been for a long time before the attorney for the testator, and that the testator was then old, feeble, and suffering intensely from disease, will raise the technical presumption that the will was procured by undue influence, or at least require the proponents to show what did actually occur at 101, 102; 1 Jarman, Wills, 6th ed. p. *116; but the rule is otherwise where the statute includes the word "canceling" (Olmsted's Estate, 122 Cal. 224, 54 Pac. 745; Re Hopkins, 172 N. Y. 360, 65 L.R.A. 95, 92 Am. St. Rep. 746, 65 N. E. 173. See also Woodfill v. Patton, 76 Ind. 575, 40 Am. Rep. 269).

Except as already stated, the evidence in this case affords no light as to when, with what purpose, or by whom the changes were made. The general rule is that, where a mutilated will is found among the testator's effects, the presumption arises that the mutilation was his own act, done with a revoking purpose. 1 Underhill, Wills, §§ 231, 232; 1 Redf. Wills, 3d ed. § 25, ¶ 8, p. *307; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 635; 28 Am. St. Rep. 351, note. Here the will the time of its execution and prior thereto, so that the presence or absence of undue influence can be determined.

And in Carter v. Dixon, 69 Ga. 82, it was held that no legal presumption of undue influence requiring to be rebutted by proof arises.

And something of this kind may have been in the mind of the court in Koegel v. Egner, 54 N. J. Eq. 623, 35 Atl. 394, where it was said that the circumstances aroused suspicion and demanded their critical consideration by the court, although they were not strong enough to raise a presumption against the instrument.

On the other hand, the following decisions seem to hold more or less clearly that the failure of the proponent to rebut this presumption of undue influence will, as a matter of law, entitle the contestant to a verdict or finding in his favor.

In Weston v. Teufel, supra, and Isham v. Bingham, 126 Ill. App. 513 (appeal dismissed in 227 Ill. 634, 81 N. E. 690), it is said that where a fiduciary relation exists between the testator and a devisee who receives a substantial benefit from the will, and where the will is written or its preparation procured by that beneficiary, proof of these facts establishes prima facie the charge that the execution of the will was the result of undue influence exercised by that beneficiary, and that this proof, standing alone, and undisputed by other proof, entitles the contestant to a verdict.

The force of this statement is somewhat impaired by the circumstance that the decisions cited in its support cannot properly be regarded as authority therefor.

In Scattergood v. Kirk, 192 Pa. 263, 43 Atl. 1030, it was held error to refuse to give an instruction that if the jury should find that the beneficiary lived in the house and company, and had the care, of the testatrix; that the latter was eighty-eight years of age and had the bodily infirmities incident to such age; that the beneficiary gave instructions to her own lawyer from which the will and codicil in dispute were drawn, and that she was a beneficiary thereunder.—then it was incumbent upon her to

had been out of the possession of the testator for about a year at the time of his death; but, as the proponent must be deemed to assert that it was not changed while in her custody, the situation is doubtless the same as though it had never left the testator's hands. The partial erasure of the signature is not so unequivocally a cancelation as the running of a pen through it, but would doubtless be sufficient to warrant the application of the rule referred to, if it were not for the penciled addition. We must regard this as a genuine signature, for the trial court evidently so treated it, and the evidence supports that view. Doubtless, if the testator erased his first signature, intending an unconditional revocation thereby, a subsequent unattested signing could show affirmatively that the testatrix had independent advice and a full understanding of the effect of the two papers; and that this not having been done, a verdict should be rendered for the contestant.

And in Re Barney, 70 Vt. 352, 40 Atl. 1027, it is said that while no rule of general application can be formulated with regard to shifting the burden of proof where a will is drawn by a beneficiary therein who stands in a confidential relation to testator, yet, where such a relation existed and the proponent drew the will, taking the entire estate, or a large bequest, and would have taken nothing as heir, while near, needy, and deserving relatives took nothing, then the law not only regards the transaction with suspicion, but the burden should be cast upon the proponent to show that he did not, nor did anyone in his behalf, unduly influence the testator, and that the instrument propounded is the testator's will.

And see also as seemingly, although less clearly, supporting this view, Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 641, 24 So. 459, in which it is said that the existence of confidential relations, coupled with activity in and about the preparation or execution of the will, "changes the burden of proof;" McQueen v. Wilson, 131 Ala. 606, 31 So. 94, where it is said that the presumption of undue influence arising from this circumstance throws upon the beneficiary the burden of showing a severance of the confidential relation by independent and competent advice; Re Cooper (N. J.) 71 Atl. 676, affirmed without opinion in (N. J.) 75 Atl. 1100, in which a presumption of undue influence is spoken of as "a legal presumption;" and Montague v. Allan, 78 Va. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 384, in which it is said that the circumstance of a confidential relation between the testator and the draftsman of a will, of which his wife was the principal beneficiary, engenders suspicion and arouses the vigilance of the court, "and, if unexplained or repelled, will annul the transaction."

But by far the greater number of cases which speak of the burden of proof being upon the beneficiary to repel the presumpnot revive the will. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 657. But the condition of the instrument affords no presumption that such was the case. In King's Goods, 2 Rob. Eccl. Rep. 403, a will was admitted to probate under these circumstances: "After the death of the testator, the will was found with his signature, as at first written, opposite to the center of the attestation clause, erased; but subsequently to that erasure, the testator's signature was written a short distance beneath the place where the original signature stood." P. 403. The only evidence regarding the change was that it was made after the will was executed and witnessed, and before it was found after the testator's death. The opinion reads: "The original signature of the deceased has been erased, but by whom and with what motive it is not easy to determine. It is manifest, however, from the facts and circumstances deposed to, that the erasure was not made by the testator animo revocandi, as required by the wills act. On that ground, therefore, I decide this case: In the probate the original signature must be restored, and the second signature omitted." P. 404. Citing that case in Schouler on Wills, 3d ed. § 392, the author says: "If a will should show the testator's signature struck through with a pen, and another signature written and left, the natural presumption would be that the original erasure was not made with the intention to revoke at all, but was connected in some way with the final execution by the signature substituted."

tion of undue influence must be considered neutral upon the question whether the failure to produce such evidence will, as a matter of law, entitle the contestant to a finding or verdict, as they cannot safely be considered as meaning more than that the beneficiary, in failing to introduce such evidence, runs the risk of an adverse decision being rendered by the trier of the fact.

Within this category may be placed the following decisions: Daniel v. Hill, 52 Ala. 430; Henry v. Hall, 106 Ala. 84, 54 Am. St. Rep. 22, 17 So. 187; Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 106 Ala. 314, 17 So. 516; St. Leger's Appeal, 34 Conn. 434, 91 Am. Dec. 735; Woods v. Devers, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 81, 19 S. W. 1; Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147, 2 Am. Rep. 491; Boisaubin v. Boisaubin, 51 N. J. Eq. 252, 27 Atl. 624; Gilman v. Ayer (N. J.) 47 Atl. 1049, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 806, 52 Atl. 1131; Barkman v. Richards, 63 N. J. This view of the effect of decisions of this type as to the onus which is upon the proponent finds support in O'Brien's Appeal, 100 Me. 156, 60 Atl. 880, in which it is said that it is not accurate to say that upon proof that a draftsman occupying a confidential relation was benefited by the provisions of the will, the burden of proof shifts from the contestant to the proponent; but that it may, as a matter of fact, cast upon the proponent the burden of explanation, the absence of a satisfactory explanation being an additional fact of more or less weight.

f. Circumstances under which proponent must, or should, present additional proof.

The following cases will serve to illustrate (though without any attempt to in- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dicating the character of the necessity as a rule of law or as a precept for the guidance of the trier of the fact) the circumstances the proof of which will render it incumbent upon the proponent to explain away the inference, or overcome the presumption, of undue influence arising therefrom.

The existence of confidential relations between the testator and principal or large beneficiary under the will is not alone sufficient to place upon the latter the burden of disproving undue influence, but there must also be evidence of activity on the part of the latter in and about the preparation or execution of the will, such as the initiation of proceedings for the preparation of the instrument, or participation in such preparation, employing a draftsman, selecting the witnesses, excluding persons from the presence of the testator at or about the time of the execution, concealing the making of the will, and the like. Bancroft v. Otis, 91 Ala. 279, 24 Am. St. Rep. 904, 8 So. 286.

Where a will in his own favor is prepared by one sustaining a fiduciary relation to an aged and childish testatrix, the onus of establishing the devise to have been voluntary and well understood rests upon the party claiming; and this in addition to the evidence to be derived from the execution of the will conveying or devising the property. Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147, 2 Am. Rep. 491.

In Boisaubin v. Boisaubin, 51 N. J. Eq. 252, 27 Atl. 624, where it appeared that testator was weak-minded and easily influenced, and was taken by a brother to the office of a lawyer, where he made a will giving his entire estate to that brother, to the exclusion of his other brothers, it was held that the burden of proving that testator was free from the exercise of undue influence upon his part was cast upon such beneficiary.

In Farnum v. Boyd, 56 N. J. Eq. 766, 41 Atl. 422, where an attorney drafting a will received a benefit thereunder, it was held that his participation in the bounty of testatrix in any material degree can be allowed only upon the clearest exhibition that his

In Re Wood, 2 Connoly, 144, 11 N. Y. Supp. 157, a will was admitted to probate which had been found in the testatrix's safe, with the signature erased first by drawing lines over it, and then by nearly erasing such lines and the original signature, but with her name rewritten by her over the erasure. It was not shown when or why the change was made. In the opinion it was said: "The proponents having proved the due execution of the will, it is entitled to probate, unless the contestants prove its revocation by some one of the modes pointed out by the statute. . . . If the will had been found in her safe, carefully preserved among the valuable papers of the testatrix, with her signature erased, it would be a fair and reasonable presumption that she erased the signature animo revocandi; and it would then be lacking in one of the statutory requirements of a valid will,—the signature of the decedent at the end thereof. But when found with the signature carefully restored, no such presumption arises. In the absence of all proof, how can I find that it was made with the intent to revoke, when the instrument was preserved by her with her signature carefully restored? An intention to revoke a will, not fully consummated, is not revocation. . . . It may be that Mrs. Wood drew the lines through her name with the intention of revoking the will, but immediately, and before the act was completed, changed her mind, erased the marks, and restored her signature. To sustain the theory of the learned counsel for the contestants, conduct was fair and unobjectionable, and that testatrix exercised a judgment in dispositions in which he was concerned, capable of independence of the confidence induced by the relationship between them.

In Gilman v. Ayer (N. J.) 47 Atl. 1049, affirmed without opinion in 63 N. J. Eq. 806, 52 Atl. 1131, where it appeared that the business adviser of the testatrix had the will prepared, that he supervised its execution, and that his wife and children were the chief beneficiaries under it, it was said that, in view of these conditions, it should undoubtedly appear that she made the will with full understanding of its provisions, and with no undue coercion in executing it.

In Barkman v. Richards, 63 N. J. Eq. 215, 49 Atl. 831, where a testator who was weak-minded and sick made a will leaving all his property to a friend, to the exclusion of a sister, the beneficiary being active in relation to the execution, it was held that the burden was upon the beneficiary to show that it was executed by the deceased without undue influence.

In Re Cooper (N. J.) 71 Atl. 676, it is held that where a will was shown to have been drawn and executed under the supervision of testatrix's attorney, who was largely benefited thereby, and named as sole executor thereof, the burden of proving that the will was the spontaneous act of the decedent was thrown upon him.

In Re Smith, 95 N. Y. 516, it was held that while the mere fact that the proponent was the attorney of the testatrix did not of itself create a presumption against the validity of a legacy given by the will, yet, taking all the circumstances together,—the fiduciary relation and change of testamentary intention, the age and mental and physical condition of the decedent, the fact that the proponent was the draftsman and principal beneficiary under the will, and took an active part in procuring its execution, and that the testatrix acted without independent advice,—a case was made which required explanation, and which imposed upon the proponent the burden of satisfying the court that the will was the free, untrammelled, and intelligent expression of the wishes and intention of the testatrix.

In Re Everett (N. C.) 68 S. E. 924, it is said that when a will is executed through the intervention of a person occupying a confidential relation toward a testator, whereby such person is the executor and a large beneficiary under the will, such circumstances create a strong suspicion that an undue or fraudulent influence has been exerted, rendering it necessary for proponent to go on with evidence showing that the will was the free and voluntary act of the testator, and cause the scales at least to balance.

In Hoopes's Estate, supra, it was held that, in view of the age and insanity of the testator, and the confidential relation existing between him and the draftsman, who was a beneficiary under the alleged will, the proponents must establish both testamentary capacity and freedom from undue influence by proofs clear and of the most conclusive character before its probate could be permitted.

In Yorke's Estate, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 327, affirmed in 185 Pa. 61, 39 Atl. 1119, it is said that the rule that the burden is upon the confidential adviser who prepared the will under which he, or members of his family, took the bulk of the estate or substantial benefits, to the exclusion of children or next of kin to the testator, is applicable where the testimony is conflicting as to the mental capacity of the testator, either from the effects of old age, disease, mental impairment, or intemperate habits, and the confidential adviser is a stranger to the testator, or a near relative who has acted in the procurement of the will in his or her favor, to the exclusion of others equally entitled, and is shown to have exercised a controlling influence over the mind of the testator; but that such rule is not applicable when the testator is proved to possess full and entire testamentary capacity, even though to some extent enfeebled by the infirmities of age.

In Collins v. Kilroy, 1 Ont. L. Rep. 503, where one standing in a confidential relation

I must find that the erasure was made by the testatrix herself, understandingly, freely, and voluntarily, with no other purpose than to destroy her will, and that it was done at some time previous to the act of re-writing her name, and this finding is asked for in the absence of proof, and with the burden resting upon the contestants to establish the fact of revocation." P. 158.

In the present case the one fact concerning the testator's intention that is definitely established is that at one time he wished to dispose of his property according to the terms of the will, and complied with every requirement of the law to give effect to that desire. What his subsequent purposes were is a matter of speculation. That a few weeks later he delivered the will to the testatrix has some tendency to show that he then regarded it as a valid instrument, although he must already have made the change, if he made it at all. In that event, as reasonable a supposition as any is that when he executed the will, he failed to notice the space left for his signature above the attestation clause, and therefore inadvertently signed below; that afterwards he discovered the inadvertence, and, in order to correct it, attempted to erase the original signature, and affixed the other in the more natural place, intending, not revocation, but ratification. Of course, a signing below the attestation clause was sufficient (17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 354, note); but the testator, on the matter being drawn to his attention, may easily have supposed otherwise. Upon this hypothesis it is not necessary to resort to the principle of "dependent relative revocation" to save the will, for the mutilation was without effect unless accompanied by a purpose to revoke. Another way of accounting for the condition of the will seems not unreasonable. The testator may have started to erase his signature, changed his mind before completing the erasure, and then re-written his name, not as a new execution, but as evidence that he did not intend revocation.

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

to testatrix discussed with her the provisions of her will containing a legacy in his favor, prepared a draft or memorandum of it, and selected the solicitor who prepared it, it was held that the onus was cast upon him of showing the righteousness of the transaction.

But in Trubey v. Richardson, 224 Ill. 136, 79 N. E. 592, it was held that where a bequest made by a codicil, to the attorney who drew it, was of articles of little value except as souvenirs, it was not sufficient to raise a presumption of fraud or improper influence upon the part of the attorney.

g. Sufficiency of proof to repel inference or presumption.

A presumption of undue influence arising from a will being drafted by a beneficiary, or by one in confidential relations, may be overcome by showing that it was executed fairly and under circumstances which rebut the inference of undue influence; and where the proof of execution is such as to convince the jury that the testator was not at that time under the control of the legatee, it is certainly not error to at least permit the jury to draw an inference in favor of the validity of the will from the circumstances. Re Bromley, 113 Mich. 53, 71 N. W. 523.

In Re Reed, 2 Connoly, 403, 20 N. Y. Supp. 91, it was held that whatever presumption of undue influence existed by reason of the legatee's being the draftsman of a will under which he took the entire estate was removed by proof of declarations of the decedent subsequent to the making of the will, extending over a period of two and one half years, showing that the will conformed to his wish.

The rule that a presumption of undue influence arises where a will is drawn by a confidential adviser, who benefits thereby, for a testator who is in such physical and mental condition as to be easily influenced, is not applicable where the testator is shown to have been in a vigorous mental condition. Stevenson v. Kingsley, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 245.

In McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682, it was said that notwithstanding the fact that the infant children of the draftsman took a benefit under the will, yet if it appeared that the amount received by them was small in proportion to testator's property, that the draftsman himself was a nephew of the testator, that he had not been with his uncle during the sickness until he answered the summons to be present on the night of his death, that he was not then with him alone, and that he declined a legacy to himself, and made no request that one should be left to his children, the jury might well consider that such facts and circumstances would fully meet any presumption that might be raised by the fact that he prepared the will, and his infant children took a benefit under it.

But the presumption of undue influence arising where one in a confidential relation to testator is active in and about the preparation and execution of the will is not rebutted by evidence that the sister of the deceased carefully read the will over to deceased, who assented and agreed to all of its terms, where it is not shown that such sister was a competent person to give advice. McQueen v. Wilson, 131 Ala. 606, 31 So. 94.

O. H. P. SAMPLE, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(122 La. 1016, 48 So. 439.)

Mortgage — wife's separate property — including husband's land — estoppel.

1. A man whose participation in an act of mortgage by his wife of her separate property is shown only by a recital that came the said woman, wife of the said husband, "herein joined, aided, and authorized by her husband," will not be held to have consented to the inclusion in the mortgage of his separate property so that it will be bound thereby as against the claim of his subsequent mortgagee, although he may be personally estopped to deny that it is included.

Record — wife's mortgage — effect on husband's property.

2. The recordation of a mortgage which purports to relate exclusively to the property of a married woman is not notice to strangers of the fact that property of her husband is included therein, so as to prevent their securing a good title from him in case the property was so included without his authority.

(January 4, 1909.)

A PPEAL by defendant O. H. P. Sample from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Caddo in Note. — Effect of one spouse joining in the execution of the other's deed or mortgage, to convey the former's separate property included in the deed.

This note does not purport to include cases where the deed is sufficient in form to convey the property in question, but the spouse contends that it was signed by mistake or by misapprehension. Cases which turn merely upon the question whether a deed purporting to convey marital rights is sufficient for that purpose, or upon the validity of the deed without reference to the property therein conveyed, have been excluded.

It is a general rule followed by nearly every case in which the question is presented, that a wife does not, by merely signing and sealing a deed or mortgage and by expressly relinquishing her dower rights in the property, without joining in the granting clauses thereof, convey any separate interest which she has in the property or any part thereof, and which may be included in the description of the property in the deed; and the same rule applies equally, where the husband joins in the same manner to release his marital rights, or to give his consent to the wife's conveyance of her property; and the rule is the same whether the spouse who joins in the deed has some separate interest in the property conveyed, or some of his or her separate property has been included by mistake in the deed, or whether the conveying spouse attempts to convey property, the fee of which is in the other. Agricultural Bank v. Rice, 4 How. 225, 11 L. ed. 949; Batchelor v. Brereton, 112 U. S. 306, 28 L. ed. 748, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 150; Magness v. Arnold, 31 Ark. 103; Cox v. Wells, 7 Blackf. 410, 43 Am. art, 63 Mo. 360; McFadden v. Rogers, 70 Mo. 421; Bradley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 91 Mo. 493, 4 S. W. 427; Flagg v. Bean, 25 N. H. 49; Doe ex dem. Kerns v. Peeler, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 226, 67 Am. Dec. 286; King v. Rhew, 108 N. C. 696, 23 Am. St. Rep. 76, 13 S. E. 174; Foster v. Dennison, 9 Ohio, 121; Cincinnati v. Newell, 7 Ohio St. 37; *Burston v. A different form of the same proposition is presented in Strawn v. Strawn, 50 Ill. 33, where it was held that where a wife joined her husband as a party to the deed in compliance with the statute, in order to release her dower and for that purpose only, the deed is not evidence of a joint seisin in fee in the husband and wife at the time of the conveyance.

The rule is laid down in Bradley v. Missouri P. R. Co. supra, as follows: "The party in whom the title is vested must use appropriate words to convey the estate. Signing, sealing, and acknowledging a deed by the wife in which her husband is the only grantor will not convey her estate."

If a wife unites with her husband in a deed, she does it to release her contingent right of dower or to consent to the deed when it affects the homestead; and if the interest is to affect any independent interest of her own, it is reasonable to expect some such provision in the instrument which shows specifically in what manner and how far her separate interests were intended to be affected. Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 81.

So, a deed wholly in the name of the husband, except that the testimonium clause declares that the wife releases all her right in the premises, will not pass the fee of the wife, and after the husband's death she may maintain a writ of entry on her own seisin to recover the land. Bruce v. Wood, supra. Chief Justice Shaw said that in order to convey the wife's fee, the wife must join in the deed, that is, it must appear that both husband and wife were parties to the efficient and operative parts of the instrument of conveyance, and that it is not sufficient plaintiff's favor in an action brought to have a certain mortgage established as a senior lien on certain real property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hall & Jack, for appellant:

The defendant's mortgage is binding on the 80 acres, because it belonged to the community and was given by the wife with the authority of her husband.

Pellerin v. Sanders, 116 La. 616, 40 So. 917.

Messrs. Alexander & Wilkinson, for appellee:

A mortgage made by the wife during the existence of the community, though made with the authorization of the husband, cannot be opposed to the creditors of the latter as his act.

Cabrol v. Gourdain, 10 La. Ann. 686; Westmore v. Harz, 111 La. 305, 35 So. 578; Bachino v. Coste, 35 La. Ann. 570.

The mere recording of the mortgage did not convey knowledge to the public of any connection of the husband's separate property with that covered by the mortgage.

Brian v. Bonvillain, 52 La. Ann. 1794, 28 So. 261.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1905, Mrs. Stringfellow, wife of H. C. Stringfellow, and Miss Robinson, owners in division of the Cotton Point that her name was annexed as expressing her assent to the act of her husband, and without words showing her formal participation in the granting part of the deed.

And a deed executed and acknowledged by a husband and wife, but containing no words of grant or warranty on her part, does not operate to convey the wife's estate therein, which she inherited from her father, though the husband apparently had no interest therein except the freehold for his own life in consequence of the birth of issue of the marriage, and the terms of the grant were broad enough to convey a greater estate. Melvin v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals, supra.

Where land is conveyed to a husband and wife jointly, and she joins in a conveyance by him in token of her release of dower, and of her free consent thereto, without being named in the granting part of the deed, her estate will not pass, nor will she be estopped from asserting her title after the death of her husband. Wales v. Coffin, 13 Allen, 213. The court further said that the fact that as a release of dower the deed was entirely nugatory, inasmuch as the wife could have no dower in such an estate, did not require that the deed be construed to have an effect beyond what it declared. Under the circumstances, however, it was subsequently held that one who claimed under the deed had sufficient reason to believe his title good, to entitle him under the statute to compensation for improvements. Wales v. Coffin, 100 Mass. 177.

So, where the husband, who is a joint tenant of property, executes a quitclaim deed of the same, in which the wife joins for the express purpose of releasing her dower rights, the wife conveys nothing, as the husband had no interest in the property other than to the rents and profits during the life tenancy. Magness v. Arnold, supra.

If the title to lands is in married women and a deed of the land recites the names of the husbands only as grantors, purporting to convey in right of their wives, the deed is insufficient to convey the title of the wives; nor is such a deed made effective by its being signed and sealed by the wives. The interest of the husbands is conveyed, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

but nothing more. Agricultural Bank v. Rice, supra.

A deed purporting to be made by a wife, and "by and with the consent of her husband," and signed and sealed by both husband and wife, there being in some of the clauses reference to "parties" of the first part and in others to the "party" of the first part, does not pass the husband's life estate in the premises. Ellenmann v. Thompson, supra.

A deed in which a husband and wife joined, purporting to convey to a sister of the husband whatever interest the grantors had in the estate of a deceased brother of the husband, the deed being in general terms and referring to no particular property, does not operate to convey to the grantee the equitable interest of the wife in property to which the deceased held the legal title in trust for her. Adamson v. Souder, supra.

Notwithstanding the name of the wife appears in the introductory part of the deed in connection with her husband as "party of the first part," and she signed and acknowledged it with her husband, yet, if in the body of the deed the husband's name alone appears as grantor, his estate only is granted. Whiteley v. Stewart, supra.

The decision in Dooley v. Greening, 201 Mo. 343, 100 S. W. 43, seems to go even further than the general rule stated above. Here a quitclaim deed executed by a wife to her son on the same day a sale was made to him by the curator of the husband, who had been adjudged insane, purporting to convey "all of my right, title, and interest, whether dower or other interest, as the wife of Joseph C. Greene . . . hereby conveying and intending to convey all interest I may have in said land, whether of dower or otherwise," was held to convey only the marital interest of the wife, and not her estate in her own right in the property described, it appearing that the deed only expressed a nominal consideration which was never paid, and that her interest represented substantially all the property that she had. The court took the position that the general words in the second clause above quoted were limited by the particular words employed in the first clause.

and Grand Bend plantations, executed two mortgages on said plantations,—a first mortgage in favor of A. N. Sample for $57,330, and a second in favor of Ardis & Company for $15,762.

Said plantations are described in the act of the mortgage by the numbers of the sections and fractions of sections composing them, according to the maps of the United States surveys, and are said to contain 3,800 acres. Among the fractions of sections included in the description of the Cotton Point plantation is the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 10, township 14, range 11, containing 80 acres.

This 80 acres did not belong to the mortgagors, but to the husband of one of them, Mr. Stringfellow, and in reality formed no part of said plantation. In July, 1906, Mr. Stringfellow mortgaged same to the plaintiff company.

In January, 1908, he and his wife and Miss Robinson joined in an act of giving in payment, by which they conveyed the two plantations (including the said 80 acres) to A. N. Sample in satisfaction of the said first mortgage of $57,330.

In the instant suit the plaintiff company has cited O. H. P. Sample, who now holds the Ardis & Company, or $15,762, second mortgage, A. N. Sample, and H. C. Stringfellow, and asks that its said mortgage be recognized and enforced, and be decreed to be paramount to the $15,762 mortgage of O. H. P. Sample, for the reason that the latter mortgage, in so far as said 80 acres are con-

A different rule has apparently been adopted in the later decisions in Michigan.

Thus, in Heinmiller v. Hatheway, 60 Mich. 591, 27 N. W. 558, it was held that when the wife joins with her husband in the conveyance of land of which she is, in whole or in part, the sole owner, she conveys all of her interest therein, though she can only be held liable upon her covenants in such deed to the extent of her sole property conveyed. It is usual in such cases to designate in some way in the conveyance the extent of such sole interest, and it is very proper so to do. But it is not essential to its validity. The terms of the conveyance are not shown except that it is stated that the record showed that the husband and wife conveyed the property by a deed duly acknowledged by both, the wife having acknowledged the execution of the deed separate and apart from her husband. The respective interests of the husband and wife in the property do not appear. No reference is made to Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 81.

The doctrine of the Heinmiller Case was applied in Clow v. Plummer, 85 Mich. 550, 48 N. W. 795, to a warranty deed from a husband and wife purporting to convey land, the title of which was in the wife, notwithstanding the objection that the only covenant in the deed was that of the husband as follows: "With all the estate, right, title, and interest therein of said party of the first part; and the said Cyrus Andrews does hereby covenant."

Where, however, the wife's name is included in the granting clauses of the deed, as well as in the testatum clause, the courts generally hold that the deed is sufficient to pass her separate estate, if properly executed by her.

Thus, a deed of trust signed by a man and his wife, conveying, all and singular, the real and personal estate, and all other property of every nature and description, "of us," which deed recites that they were indebted to sundry persons and that it was for the benefit of "our" creditors, is not limited to their joint estates, but will convey the wife's separate property. Roberts

v. Roberts, 102 Md. 131, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 782, 111 Am. St. Rep. 344, 62 Atl. 161, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 805.

So, where the wife joins with her husband in the words of conveyancing, and acknowledges the joint receipt of the purchase money, and joins her husband in the covenant of warranty, if the doctrine of presumptions is to be invoked at all, then the presumption is that the title was a joint one, and not that she joined in the deed only to release her dower and homestead. McKenzie v. Houston, 130 N. C. 566, 41 S. E. 780.

And in O'Brien v. Brice, 21 W. Va. 704, the court said: "The granting clause, which is the controlling and operative part of every deed, conveys the land absolutely, without any limitation or qualification whatever; and if the grantor had intended to grant her dower right only, the granting clause would have been the proper, if not the only, part of the deed where she could have expressed that intention."

A mortgage purporting to be made by husband and wife, covering property in which both husband and wife owned undivided interests, binds the wife's interest, and it is not competent to show by parol evidence what the mortgagee said to her as to the effect of her execution of the mortgage, for the purpose of showing that she executed it only for the purpose of releasing her inchoate right of dower in the husband's interest. Snyder v. Ash, 30 App. Div. 183, 51 N. Y. Supp. 772 (Herrick, J., dissenting).

So, where the wife joined in the granting part of a deed containing apt words to convey any title or interest she had in the entire property or in any part thereof, and in the testimonium clause released her inchoate right of dower in the whole, it was held in Gregory v. Gregory, 16 Ohio St. 560, that she conveyed all her title and interest whether legal or equitable, vested or inchoate, in and to the entire property.

And the wife's separate interests will pass by a deed in which both husband and wife's names appear in the granting part of the deed, and she, in a separate clause, released cerned, and as against third persons, is null; it not having been given by H. C. Stringfellow, the owner of the said 80 acres.

To this the defendants answer that H. C. Stringfellow authorized his wife to mortgage the property; in other words that she did so as his agent, and that, therefore, the case stands just as if he himself had acted.

The issue thus made is one of fact, to be determined from the evidence in the case. The record contains no evidence on the subject, except that which is to be found in the act of mortgage itself. Forming part of this act of mortgage is the petition which Mrs. Stringfellow presented to the judge to obtain his authorization to execute the mortgage. In this petition the two plantations are described precisely as in act of mortgage (i. e., including this 80 acres), and it is alleged that Mrs. Stringfellow "is owner, in her own separate, paraphernal right, of an undivided half" of the property thus described, and that she desires to mortgage her said interest. The act of mortgage declares that the property mortgaged is the same which the mortgagors acquired from Mrs. G. W. Stringfellow; and it makes no mention of H. C. Stringfellow except as follows: "Came and appeared Miss Georgie Robinson and Mrs. Howard C. Stringfellow, wife of Howard C. Stringfellow, herein joined, aided, and authorized by her husband."

From the foregoing the only possible conclusion is that the participation of the husband in the act was solely for the purpose of giving his marital authorization to the contract of his wife, that there was no intention that she should mortgage any other property than her own, and that this 80 acres of land was included in the mortgage either through mistake, or because it was at that time erroneously supposed to form part of the plantation. A mistake of this kind easily occurs in a long description by numbers of sections and fractions of sections, and the probability of a mistake in the present case is all the greater from the fact that this 80 acres is in the center of the plantation, which is a large tract of land; it and Grand Bend containing together, as already stated, 3,800 acres. As to the land having been supposed to be part of the plantation, that is hardly probable in view of the fact that at that time it was in process of acquisition by H. C. Stringfellow under the Federal homestead law.

The act being one which on its face professes to relate exclusively to the wife's contract and to the wife's property, its recordation cannot be said to have operated the registry of a mortgage upon the property of the husband. Hence it cannot affect third persons subsequently accepting a mortgage upon the property of the husband. The husband himself is bound by it, on the principle that one who signs, even as a witness, an act creating a mortgage upon his property, is estopped from contesting the mortgage; but this estoppel cannot be extended to third persons dealing with the property. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3342; Brian v. Bonvilain, 52 La. Ann. 1794, 28 So. 261.

her dower rights, although all the covenants began with the form "I do hereby covenant." Smith v. Carmody, 137 Mass. 126.

Where a deed is in such form as to convey title to the property even had it belonged exclusively to the wife, it was held in Reynolds v. Caldwell, 80 Ala. 232, that it conveyed any equitable interest in the property which the wife may have had, unless the sale had been made in payment of the husband's debt.

A deed of land executed by husband and wife purporting to convey it "in her right" is valid to pass the whole, even though it appears that the husband was severally seised of a part and the wife of a part. Emerson v. White, 29 N. H. 482.

In Malin v. Rolfe, 53 Ark. 107, 13 S. W. 595, the granting clause in a deed by the husband which contained no other reference to the wife concluded with words to the effect that the wife, as such, for the consideration above set forth, assigned, released, relinquished, and quitclaimed "all my right, title, interest, and ownership" to the grantee, and the attestation clause stated that the parties set their hands and seals thereto as "man and wife." There was no express reference to dower either in the deed itself or in the certificate of acknowledgment, and it was held that the deed was sufficient to pass the wife's separate interest in the property described in the deed.

The mere fact that one name is placed before another has been held in some cases not to limit the deed to a conveyance of the interest of the party first named.

Thus, the mere fact that the name of the wife is placed after that of her husband in naming the party of the first part to a deed in which she appears as one of the parties, conveying and quitclaiming all interest in the land, was held in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Whitham, 155 Ill. 514, 28 L.R.A. 612, 46 Am. St. Rep. 355, 40 N. E. 1014, to be insufficient to restrict the conveyance by her to a mere waiver of her right of dower.

So, the mere fact that the husband's name is placed after that of the wife, and he is mentioned as "her husband," was held in Chapman v. Charter, 46 W. Va. 769, 34 S. E. 768, not to operate to restrict the conveyance by him to his marital rights, where in the body of the deed both grant, convey, warrant, and covenant.

Some other cases may be noted which, although not strictly in point, may be of some value upon the question discussed above.

In O'Connor v. Vineyard, 91 Tex. 488, 44 S. W. 485, it was held that a deed executed by a wife for herself and as attorney for her husband conveyed all of their interests in the property, whether it was the separate property of either or the community property of both. It does not appear whether the wife's name appeared in the body of the deed or not. But in Kin Kaid v. Lee (Tex. Civ. App.) 119 S. W. 342, the O'Connor Case is held to foreclose the right of a wife to claim that her separate property was not passed by a deed which recites that the husband (by her as attorney) and she are "parties of the first part," and in her separate acknowledgment of which she says that she signed, sealed, and delivered the deed "as her own act and deed" and as attorney for her husband. Kin Kaid v. Lee (Tex. Civ. App.) 119 S. W. 345, is a companion case to Kin Kaid v. Lee.

In Power v. Lester, 23 N. Y. 527, it was held that a woman holding a mortgage upon certain property, who subsequently marries the mortgagor, does not, in joining her husband in a second mortgage, impair the lien of her mortgage, in the absence of words inserted for that purpose,—her dower interests only being affected. A similar principle was applied in Gillig v. Maass, 28 N. Y. 191. So, in Kingman v. Dunspaugh, 19 App. Div. 545, 46 N. Y. Supp. 602, it was said, citing the Power and Gillig Cases, that the fact alone that a wife joins with her husband in the execution of a mortgage upon the husband's real estate does not impair her right to priority as the holder of a prior mortgage. And to the same effect was the decision in Hewitt v. Suits, 22 App. Div. 210, 47 N. Y. Supp. 1038.

A wife who joins in the granting parts and covenants of a deed conveys her dower right thereby, although it is not specifically mentioned (Edwards v. Sullivan, 20 Iowa, 502; Jones v. Des Moines, 43 Iowa, 209), or any other inchoate interest which she may have (Littell v. Hoagland, 106 Ind. 320, 6 N. E. 645).

An agreement inserted in a deed given by a husband and wife, whereby the husband reserves the right to build a dam upon the stream running past the property, which privilege was, upon certain contingencies, to pass to the grantee, does not give the latter, upon the happening of the contingency, the right to construct the dam and flood the adjoining property of the wife, where her purpose in signing the deed was merely to release her dower rights, and the covenants in the deed were the personal covenants of the husband. Gilbert v. Helmich, 6 App. Div. 80, 39 N. Y. Supp. 629.

Where the deed expressly reserved the wife's separate interests, they are not passed, although the wife joins the husband 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the deed. Larison v. Dilts (N. J. Eq.) 32 Atl. 1059.

In Corr v. Porter, 33 Gratt. 278, the court said that when the wife unites with her husband in conveying the property to a purchaser, the effect is not to vest in the latter the dower interest or any estate separate and distinct from that of the husband, but simply to relinquish a contingent right in the nature of an encumbrance upon the property conveyed, which, if not so relinquished, will attach and be consummate on the death of the husband. Similar language was used in Nickell v. Tomlinson, 27 W. Va. 697. But in these cases the question at issue was rather whether the wife's deed relinquishing her right of dower extinguished it or merely transferred it.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ALBERT BERNARD

v.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

(205 Mass. 254, 91 N. E. 325.)

Carrier—fixing value—interstate commerce—Hepburn act.

A contract between shipper and carrier fixing the value of property to be transported as a basis for carrier's charges, which shall be binding on the shipper in case of loss, is not forbidden by the provision of the Carmack amendment of the Hepburn act of Congress, that no contract shall exempt the carrier from liability for loss of property caused by itself or by any connecting carrier.

(February 24, 1910.)

Note.—Validity of stipulation limiting carrier's liability to agreed valuation as affected by the Hepburn act.

By the great weight of authority a carrier cannot contract to exempt itself from liability or to limit its liability for losses due to the carelessness of itself or its servants, and any provision in the contract of carriage which limits its liability for losses to a stipulated amount without reference to the actual value of the goods is generally held to fall within this ban and to be of no avail to the carrier where the loss is due to the negligence of itself or its agents and servants. 1 Hutchinson, Carr. § 425. And see note to Everett v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 985.

Where, however, the carrier and the shipper stipulate by a contract fairly entered into that the goods are of a certain value, or that the loss, if any, shall not exceed a certain sum at which the goods are valued, such a contract is, by the weight of authority, valid, and the carrier will not be liable beyond that figure even though the EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for the loss of certain goods while in defendant's possession for transportation which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for a less sum than was demanded. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lee M. Friedman, Morse & Friedman, and F. J. Sulloway, for plaintiff:

If a rate is conditioned upon the shipper's agreeing that the carrier's liability shall not exceed a certain value, the stipulation is void as against loss due to the carrier's negligence or other misconduct, if the specified amount, while purporting to be an agreed valuation, is in fact purely fictitious and represents an attempt to limit the carrier's liability to an arbitrary amount.

Re Released Rates, 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 550; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 91 Ark. 97, 121 S. W. 932; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warfield & Lee, 6 Ga. App. 550, 65 S. E. 308; Greenwald v. Weir, 59 Misc. 431, 111 N. Y. Supp. 235; Schutte v. Weir, 59 Misc. 438, 111 N. Y. Supp. 240; Shidlov-sky v. Mallory S. S. Co. 60 Misc. 67, 111 N. Y. Supp. 778; Silverman v. Weir, 114 N. Y. Supp. 6; Vigouroux v. Platt, 62 Misc. 364, 115 N. Y. Supp. 880.

loss in question is due to its own negligence. Such a contract does not tend, according to these authorities, to exempt the carrier from liability for its negligence. The leading case asserting this rule is Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, which is cited and quoted at length in BERNARD v. ADAMS EXP. Co. It will be seen that if the contention of the shipper in the BERNARD CASE is correct, the Hepburn act would have the effect of changing materially the very generally accepted rule laid down by the Hart Case.

The cases hold very generally with BERNARD v. ADAMS EXP. Co., however, that the provision of the Hepburn act, as set out in that case, does not deprive the carrier of the right to make a fair contract with the shipper, fixing an agreed valuation upon the goods to be transported,—the provision having reference solely to contracts purporting to exempt the carrier for losses after the goods have passed into the hands of a connecting carrier.

The decision in Greenwald v. Weir, 130 App. Div. 696, 115 N. Y. Supp. 311, which is cited in the BERNARD CASE, was affirmed by the court of appeals in — N. Y. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 92 N. E. 218, where the court, in respect to the purpose of the provision of the Hepburn act in question, said: "The purpose of the provision which we have quoted from the Hepburn act was obvious. It was to render the initial carrier in the case of interstate transportation over connecting lines liable to the lawful holder of its receipt or bill of lading, for any loss or injury to the property shipped, whether such loss or injury occurred after the goods had passed out of

The statute makes an interstate common carrier liable to the shipper for the full value of any loss or damage to goods shipped, irrespective of any contract or receipt to the contrary.

Greenwald v. Weir, 130 App. Div. 696, 115 N. Y. Supp. 311; Hart v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 486, 29 N. W. 597; Lucas v. Burlington, C. R. & N. W. R. Co. 112 Iowa, 594, 84 N. W. 673; Adams Exp. Co. v. Walker, 119 Ky. 121, 67 L.R.A. 412, 83 S. W. 106; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Beasley, 104 Va. 788, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 183, 52 S. E. 566; Schutte v. Weir, supra.

Mr. John L. Hall for defendant.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover for the loss of a package delivered to the defendant, a common carrier, for transportation from the plaintiff's tannery at Newark, in the state of New Jersey, to the plaintiff at his shop at Montello, in Massachusetts. The pack-the hands of the initial carrier or not; and, furthermore, to prevent interstate carriers from exempting themselves from liability for the loss of property, or damage thereto, after it had passed into the hands of another carrier to be transported to its destination. The language of the enactment does not disclose any intent to abrogate the right of common carriers to regulate their charges for carriage by the value of the goods, or to agree with the shipper upon a valuation of the property carried."

Attention is called to the fact that an appeal to the United States Supreme Court in the Greenwald Case is now pending.

The decision of the New York court of appeals, of course, overrules earlier decisions of the lower courts of that state to the contrary. Schutte v. Weir, 59 Misc. 438, 111 N. Y. Supp. 240; Silverman v. Weir, 114 N. Y. Supp. 6; Vigouroux v. Platt, 62 Misc. 364, 115 N. Y. Supp. 880. And the decision in Shidlovsky v. Mallory S. S. Co. 60 Misc. 67, 111 N. Y. Supp. 778, is also overruled, at least so far as it has any bearing upon this question. In this case it was held that the damages properly recoverable from an initial carrier for an unreasonable delay in the delivery of the goods received for interstate transportation are not, under the Hepburn act, to be diminished by a statement put upon the record, even by the consent of the shipper's attorney, to the effect that the goods had been sold for a certain sum by the connecting carrier.

And in Travis v. Wells, F. & Co. (N. J. T.) 74 Atl. 444, it was held that the provision in question prohibited only contracts which exempted carriers from liability for losses caused by a connecting carrier to age contained hides whose value was $154.80, and the only question is whether the plaintiff can recover that sum or only $50. The case was tried before a judge of the superior court, without a jury. A book containing blank receipts, to be filled out and signed by the defendant's agent when good were received for transportation, had been furnished to the plaintiff, and when this package was delivered, the plaintiff's agent, who was in charge of his office and shipping room, filled in the blank, with a description of the bundle and its address. In the column headed "Value" the words "Not given" had been written by the defendant's teamster when he took a previous shipment. The receipt was signed for the defendant by its employee. At the head of the receipt is this statement: "The company's charge is based upon the value of the property, which must be declared by the shipper." One of the provisions of the contract embodied in the receipt is as follows: "In consideration of the rate charged for carrying said property, which is regulated by the value thereof and is based upon a valuation not exceeding $50, unless a greater value is declared, the shipper agrees that the value of said property is not more than $50, unless a greater value is stated herein, and that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than the value so stated, nor for more than $50 if no value is stated herein." From evidence introduced at the trial the judge made the following findings:

"(1) The method of carriage by the defendant varied with the value of the goods received for carriage.

"(2) The rates of carriage by the defendant were reasonably proportioned to the value of the goods to be carried, and packages of a greater value than $50 were then, and a long time prior thereto, carried by the defendant in a manner and with precautions for caring for them which differed from and were more costly to the defendant than the manner and the precautions then and theretofore established, adopted, and used by the defendant for packages of a value not exceeding $50."

"(4) The bundle in question was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant without any statement of its value or contents in the said receipt and agreement, although the agent of the defendant asked if there was any value.

which the defendant had delivered over the goods.

So, in Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mitchell (Ind.) 91 N. E. 735, it was held that the common-law right to contract with respect to the value of an article to be transported is unaffected by the interstate commerce act.

And in Re Released Rates, 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 550, the Commission, after stating the general rule as to agreed valuations as laid down by the Hart Case, supra, says that a careful study of the provisions of the Hepburn act will show that the carrier's right in this respect has not been abrogated.

The decision in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warfield & Lee, 6 Ga. App. 550, 65 S. E. 308, is in line with the above in holding that there is nothing in the Hepburn act to abrogate the rule prevailing in the state, as to the validity of stipulations limiting the amount of recovery in case of loss. The stipulation in question, however, was held by the court to be a mere general limitation as to value, amounting to no more than an arbitrary preadjustment of the damages, and such limitations were invalid in Georgia before the enactment of the Hepburn act and were not affected in any way by it.

That the Hepburn act does not affect the rights of the parties under the state law was also asserted in Latta v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 97 C. C. A. 198, 172 Fed. 659, but a different phase of the question is here presented. The case arose in Nebraska and the doctrine of the Hart Case does not prevail in that state. Consequently notwithstanding the fact that a contract contains a stipulation fixing an agreed valuation of the property, the shipper may in that state recover damages to the full amount of his injury. It was contended by the carrier that under the Hepburn act, the law of Nebraska, so far as it is sought to enforce the same against the provisions of a contract in relation to interstate commerce, is inoperative, but it was held that the right which the plaintiff had under the law of Nebraska to sue for the full value of his property, notwithstanding the stipulation fixing an agreed valuation, was not taken away by the Hepburn act, but was preserved to him. The court said that Congress, knowing of the conflicting decisions upon this question, wisely provided that the act should not deprive "any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law."

In Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 91 Ark. 97, 121 S. W. 932, the court apparently takes the view that the Hepburn act invalidated all stipulations designed to limit liability for losses caused by the carrier, while the view taken by the Greenwald Case is that the act was designed simply to extend the liability of the carrier to losses occasioned by the connecting carrier, and to prevent the initial carrier from contracting to exempt himself from such losses. In the Carl Case, however, the liability was arbitrarily limited by the contract to a certain amount, without reference to the actual valuation of the goods, and consequently the stipulation might be considered invalid without reference to the Hepburn act. The decision in Southern Exp. Co. v. R. H. Meyer Co. (Ark.) 125 S. W. 642, is based upon the Carl Case.

"(5) The defendant was not further informed of the value or contents of the bundle, and there was no indication on the outside of what its contents were, if any, or of its value.

"(6) The defendant, at the time of receiving the bundle, was ignorant of its contents and of its value, and has remained ignorant of its contents and of its value to the present time.

"(7) The bundle was received by the defendant to be carried and delivered only under and upon the terms of the receipt and agreement.

"(8) The defendant received the bundle in the belief that the value of the bundle was not more than $50.

"(9) The methods and precautions adopted by the defendant for safely carrying and delivering the said bundle were based upon the plaintiff's agreement that the value of the bundle did not exceed the sum of $50.

"(10) The defendant, before the plaintiff sued out his writ, tendered to the plaintiff the sum of $50.75, and has brought the same into court for the plaintiff."

"(12) The plaintiff, for a long time prior to the delivery of the said bundle, had delivered merchandise under exactly the same conditions as was delivered the bundle in question.

"(13) The plaintiff, at the time of the delivery of the said bundle and for a long time prior thereto, was familiar with the terms and conditions contained in the bill of lading or shipping receipt which was given to the plaintiff by the agent of the defendant.

"(14) The receipt was prepared by an agent of the plaintiff, and was handled to the agent of the defendant for signature at the time of the delivery of the bundle.

"(15) The plaintiff assented to the limitations of the defendant's liability contained in the receipt."

While the package was in the defendant's possession it was lost, and no explanation of its loss has been offered. The judge found for the plaintiff for the sum of $50.75. The plaintiff made different requests for rulings to the effect that, under the Carmack amendment in the Hepburn act, so called (act Cong. Feb. 4, 1887, chap. 104, 24 Stat. at L. 386, § 20, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3169; act Cong. June 29, 1906, chap. 3591, 34 Stat. at L. 593-595, § 7, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, pp. 1163-1167), he was entitled to recover the full value of the property.

The statute provides "that any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company receiving property for transportation from a point in one state to a point in another state shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass; and no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed."

Under the decisions in this commonwealth, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, there is no doubt that, before the enactment of this law, the plaintiff, upon the facts and findings in the present case, would be estopped from claiming more than $50 as the value of the package. Graves v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 137 Mass. 33, 50 Am. Rep. 282; Hill v. Boston, H. T. & W. R. Co. 144 Mass. 284, 10 N. E. 836; Cox v. Central Vermont R. Co. 170 Mass. 129-136, 49 N. E. 97; Graves v. Adams Exp. Co. 176 Mass. 280, 57 N. E. 462; Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151. These decisions are founded on the common law as it is interpreted in this commonwealth, in the Federal courts, and in the courts of many of the states. The question is whether the statute quoted above has changed the law in its application to the facts before us.

One obvious purpose of the Congress was to extend the provisions of the common law so as to make a common carrier receiving property for transportation liable for loss, damage, or injury to it, not only while it is in transit over his own lines, but while it is in the hands of a connecting carrier. In Greenwald v. Weir, 130 App. Div. 696, 115 N. Y. Supp. 311, it is said that this last is the only liability imposed by the statute. Although the liability stated is made statutory by the enactment, the statement of it in the words, "for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered, or over whose line or lines such property may pass," includes nothing beyond the liability at common law, except that for the undertaking of other carriers into whose possession the property may come. The liability is only for loss, damage, or injury "caused" by the carrier, which, broadly interpreted, includes that resulting from neglect as well as that due to a positive act. It does not include the liability as an insurer against loss for which the common carrier is not culpably chargeable. The liability stated is for every kind of positive misconduct of the carrier affecting the property, and for negligence from lack of care or effort. Now, what is the prohibition imposed upon the carrier by the statute? It is from exempting one's self from this liability by a contract, receipt, rule, or regulation; in other words, we have a statutory declaration that a contract of exemption from liability for negligence is against public policy, and void. This is no more than the court have frequently declared in proceedings at common law.

But such a contract as we are considering in this case is not an exemption from liability for negligence in the management of property, within the meaning of the statute. It is a contract as to what the property is, in reference to its value. The purpose of it is not to change the nature of the undertaking of the common carrier, or limit his obligation in the care and management of that which is intrusted to him. It is to describe and define the subject-matter of the contract, so far as the parties care to define it, for the purpose of showing of what value that is which comes into the carrier's possession, and for which he must account in the performance of his duty as a carrier. It is not in any proper sense a contract exempting him from liability for the loss, damage, or injury to the property, as the shipper describes it in stating its value for the purpose of determining for what the carrier shall be accountable upon his undertaking, and what price the shipper shall pay for the service and for the risk of loss which the carrier assumes. The principle was clearly pointed out in Graves v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra. The cases cited above do not go upon the ground that there is a contract of exemption from liability for negligence, but upon the ground that the contract relates directly to the elements and quality, as to value, of that which is to be transported.

In Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331-340, 28 L. ed. 717-721, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, 156, the court said: "The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based on that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value for the purposes of the contract for transportation, between the parties to that contract. The carrier must respond for negligence up to that value. It is just and reasonable that such a contract, fairly entered into, and where there is no deceit practised on the shipper, should be upheld. There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss." At the close of the opinion, on page 343 of 112 U. S., is this statement: "The distinct ground of our decision in the case at bar is that where a contract of the kind signed by the shipper is fairly made, agreeing on the valuation of the property carried, with the rate of freight based on the condition that the carrier assumes liability only to the extent of the agreed valuation, even in case of loss or damage by the negligence of the carrier, the contract will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight he receives, and of protecting himself against extravagant and fanciful valuations. Squire v. New York C. R. Co. 98 Mass. 239, 245, 93 Am. Dec. 162."

An estoppel founded on the agreements of the parties as to the nature or value of the property is not an exemption from the liability recognized by the common law and affirmed in this statute as resulting from the ordinary undertaking of a carrier to transport property. The decision in Greenwald v. Weir, supra, is to this effect. A very elaborate discussion of the law, with a citation of many authorities, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is found in Re Released Rates, 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 550, which reaches the same result. Upon the general doctrine, apart from this statute, see Alair v. Northern P. R. Co. 53 Minn. 160, 19 L.R.A. 764, 39 Am. St. Rep. 588, 54 N. W. 1072; Barnes v. Long Island R. Co. 115 App. Div. 44, 100 N. Y. Supp. 593, affirmed in 191 N. Y. 528, 84 N. E. 1108; Rosenthal v. Weir, 170 N. Y. 148, 57 L.R.A. 527, 63 N. E. 65.

The decisions in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl, 91 Ark. 97, 121 S. W. 932, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warfield & Lee, 6 Ga. App. 550, 65 S. E. 308, do not seem important in their application to the facts of the present case.

The findings of the judge, which were well warranted by the evidence, established the proposition that the provisions of the contract as to the value were entered into in good faith by the parties, and were not an attempt of the defendant to obtain an exemption from liability for negligence, in evasion of the statute. It appeared that, if the value of the package had been given, an additional charge would have been made for transportation, and additional precautions would have been taken against loss, by having the package "handled under a signature passed by every man who handled the shipment from the time it was accepted until it was delivered, . . . so that there would have been a constant supervision of it."

Exceptions overruled.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. CITY OF MINNEAPOLIS, Appt.,

v.

ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS, & MANITOBA
RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Respts.

(98 Minn. 380, 108 N. W. 261.)

Railway — highway crossing — construction — police power.

1. The state may, in the exercise of its police power, impose upon railroad companies whose lines intersect public highways laid out after the construction of the railroad the uncompensated duty of constructing and maintaining at such cross-

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Note. — Power to compel railroad to establish or maintain at its own expense overhead or underground crossing, as affected by the fact that the street or highway is opened subsequently to construction of railroad.

The general question of the power to require the separation of grades at streets or highways crossed by railway tracks, irrespective of relative dates of construction, because of subsequent changes in surrounding conditions and volume of traffic, is beyond the scope of this note, which, as indicated in the title, is confined to the aspect of that question as affected by the fact that the railroad was constructed first.

As to the power of a municipal corporation to require a railroad company to keep a street or highway in repair at overhead or underground crossings, see the note to People ex rel. Chicago v. Illinois C. R. Co. 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 915.

The case of STATE EX REL. MINNEAPOLIS v. ST. PAUL, M. & M. R. Co., which has been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 214 U. S. 497, 53 L. ed. 1060, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 698, is sustained, as hereinafter shown, by the weight of authority.

Thus, a statute imposing one half of the cost of bridging its railway right of way so as to carry a street or highway across it, passed after a railroad company was incorporated under a charter which did not impose such burden upon it, but which, however, was subject to amendment, is, as to a new highway subsequently established, a valid exercise of the police power intended for the protection of the public. New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Waterbury, 60 Conn. 1, 22 Atl. 439. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) ings all such safety devices as are reasonably necessary for the protection of the traveling public.

Same — due process of law.

2. Such a requirement, being referable to the police power, is not a taking of private property for public use in violation of the Constitution.

Same — bridge — "safety device."

3. A bridge over the railroad tracks, when necessary to make the crossing safe for public use, is a "safety device," within the meaning of that expression.

Statute — construction — granting franchise.

4. Statutes granting franchises to corporations, involving rights of the public, are to be construed liberally in favor of the public and strictly against the corporation.

Railway charter — construction — highway crossing — rights.

5. The charter of the Minnesota & Pacific Railway Company, of which defendants are successors in interest, and subject to all its liabilities, contained the following provision:

"The said company shall have the right and authority to construct their said rail-

Nor does such statute unlawfully take the property of the railroad company, or impose damages upon it incident to the taking of its property. Ibid.

Nor is a railroad company, which owns the fee of its right of way, upon the opening of a highway across it, entitled to be compensated for one half of the cost of bridging it, in addition to the value of its land actually taken for street purposes. Ibid.

And it was held in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Fayetteville, 75 Ark. 534, 87 S. W. 1174, that upon the opening of a new street across a railway right of way the railway company was not entitled to the prospective cost of erecting an overhead crossing, as the legislature might at any time compel it without compensation to construct such a crossing and keep it in repair.

The duty of constructing a bridge so as to carry a newly opened street or highway across a railway right of way, notwithstanding it is opened long after the construction of the railroad, is imposed upon a railroad company by a statute declaring that "it shall be the duty of the company to erect and keep in order all bridges on any highway, at such points as bridges may be necessary to cross the railroad." Illinois C. R. Co. v. Copiah County, 81 Miss. 685, 33 So. 502; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Swalm, 83 Miss. 631, 36 So. 147.

And such statute, being within the police power, does not deprive a railway company which has constructed its road previous to the opening of such highway, of its property without due process of law. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Copiah County, supra.

Nor is such statute rendered objectionable as impairing the railway company's char-road and branches upon and along, across, under, or over any public or private highway, road, street, plank road, or railroad, if the same shall be necessary; but the said company shall put such highway, road, street, plank road, or railroad in such condition and state of repair as not to impair or interfere with its free and proper use."

Held that this provision applies to streets and highways laid out over the railroad after its construction.

Railroad — new street — construction of crossing.

6. A railroad company receives its charter and franchise subject to the implied right of the state to establish and open such streets and highways over and across its right of way as public convenience and necessity may from time to time require. That right on the part of the state attaches, by implication of law, to the fran-ter, by the fact that the highway was opened subsequent to the construction of the railroad. Ibid.

But in Illinois C. R. Co. v. State, 94 Miss. 759, 48 So. 561, it was held that a railroad company could not be required to construct a bridge so as to carry a newly constructed road across its tracks, where there was no law permitting the opening of the highway.

Where it becomes necessary to repair a bridge which had been erected in order to carry a public street which was not opened until twenty years after the construction of the railroad, across a railway right of way, the railroad company is bound to make the necessary repairs to the framework and abutments of the bridge, under a statute subsequently passed providing that "when a highway crosses a railroad by an overhead bridge, the framework of the bridge and its abutments shall be maintained and kept in repair by the railroad company." Yonkers v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 165 N. Y. 142, 58 N. E. 877, affirming 32 App. Div. 474, 52 N. Y. Supp. 1074.

It was held in Northern P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 208 U. S. 583, 52 L. ed. 630, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, affirming 98 Minn. 429, 108 N. W. 269, that under the police power a municipal corporation could require a railway company to repair at its own expense a viaduct and its approaches, which carried a street over the railroad right of way, notwithstanding the fact that the street was opened after the construction of the railroad, and that the railroad company's charter did not expressly require it to construct or maintain crossings at streets thereafter opened.

A municipal corporation cannot contract away its police power, which is a continuing one, by an agreement with a railway company, so as to bind the former to build and maintain such viaduct for fifteen years: as the exercise of the police power cannot, for reasons of public policy, be thus limited by contract, nor be destroyed by compromising what is thought to be a chise of the railroad company, and imposes upon it an obligation to construct and maintain at its own expense suitable crossings at new streets and highways to the same extent as required by the rules of the common law at streets and highways in existence when the railroad was constructed.

Contract — municipal corporation — abdication of police power — validity.

7. A contract by a city, by which the police power is attempted to be forever abdicated, is ultra vires and void.

Constitutional law — police power — right of municipality to divest.

8. Neither the state nor a municipal subdivision thereof, to which that power is delegated, can by affirmative action or by inaction permanently divest itself of the authority and power to exercise it.

(June 29, 1906.)

doubtful right; and it is immaterial upon what right such contract rests, as neither the state nor the municipality can abrogate such power, which is so necessary to public safety. Ibid.

Nor is the inhibition against the impairment of the obligation of contracts violated by the municipality's subsequent action requiring the railway company to repair such viaduct at its own expense. Ibid.

So, it was held in Worcester, N. & R. R. Co. v. Nashua, 63 N. H. 593, 4 Atl. 298, that a municipality may require a railway company to construct a bridge over a highway established long after the building of the railroad, before the highway is constructed and opened, under a statute requiring that "if any railroad shall intersect or cross a highway . . . [it] shall be secured by a bridge over said road or by the erection of gates," as the town may think expedient.

And under charter authority to "require the railroad companies to construct at their own expense such bridges and approaches . . . at public crossings, and such viaducts and their approaches over their tracks where the same cross or extend along public highways or streets, and to put such streets in such condition and state of repair as not to interfere with the free and proper use of said streets or crossings, as the city council may deem necessary, and when a viaduct or viaducts cross the tracks of such railroad companies to compel them to build their portion of a continuous viaduct or viaducts over said tracks, with their approaches,"—a municipal corporation may require a railway company to construct a bridge over its tracks when a public necessity, notwithstanding the municipality was incorporated and such street laid out long after the tracks were built, and the city had built and maintained a viaduct which now required rebuilding. Harriman v. Southern R. Co. 111 Tenn. 538, 92 S. W. 213. The court said that if such requirement would be excessive or unreasonable, APPEAL by relator from a judgment of District Court for Hennepin County dismissing a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the erection and maintenance of a highway bridge over defendants' right of way. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank Healy, for appellant:

Railroad corporations are within the operation of all reasonable police regulations that go to the protection of life and property.

Camfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 42 L. ed. 260, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 864.

It is a lawful exercise of police power to require a railroad company to construct a bridge in passing over a public highway, instead of crossing it at the same grade:

Co.'s Appeal, 62 Conn. 527, 26 Atl. 122; Gillam v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 268, 3 N. W. 353.

As the construction of the bridge falls within the the police power, the duty rests upon the railroad company to erect it at its own expense.

State ex rel. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Shardlow, 43 Minn. 524, 46 N. W. 74; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Shelley, 163 Ind. 36, 71 which it was not in the present case, the court would have plenary jurisdiction to adjudge it void.

But, on the other hand, a few decisions are found opposed to STATE EX REL. MINNEAPOLIS V. ST. PAUL, M. & M. R. Co., which, however, turn upon the absence of necessary legislative enactment, and not upon the want of inherent legislative power.

Thus, the decision in Northern C. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 46 Md. 425, which holds that upon the opening of a new street across a railway right of way the cost of constructing a viaduct to carry the street over its tracks cannot be imposed upon the railway company, was based upon the fact that the ordinance under which it was sought to impose such duty upon the railway company did not include within its scope the street in question, notwithstanding which the power of the municipality to require it by proper ordinance was recognized.

And in Albia v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 102 Iowa, 624, 71 N. W. 541, where it was held that the uncompensated duty of constructing bridges or viaducts across a railway right of way was not imposed by a statute requiring that "every corporation shall . . . construct at all points where such railway crosses any public highway good, sufficient crossings and safe cattle guards," it was said that the common-law rule undoubtedly was that upon opening a road across an existing one the crossing should be made with as little injury to the old road as possible, and that whatever structures are necessary for the crossing must be erected and maintained at the expense of the one under whose authority and directions they are made.

And under such circumstances upon the opening of a new street over or under a railway right of way, the damages to be assessed in the railway company's favor are not controlled by statute, but vest as at 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

common law and include the expense of building necessary bridges and viaducts. Ibid.

So, it was held in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Troy, 68 Ohio St. 510, 67 N. E. 1051, that, in the absence of express enactment upon the subject, it was unnecessary for the court to determine whether the legislature could, under the police power, impose such burden upon a railway company, and that the duty to construct a bridge to carry its tracks over a subsequently opened street was not imposed by a statutory requirement that railway companies shall construct and maintain safe and sufficient crossings before it opens its road, which applied only where the construction of the highway or street preceded that of the railroad.

And a city cannot require a railway company to widen a bridge which carries a subsequently opened street across a railway right of way, under a requirement of the company's charter that it shall keep up at its own expense all bridges on or over incorporated roads which it has severally made necessary to be built by the establishment of the railroad, and to "cause the railway to be so constructed as not to impede the passage of travelers on the public roads," as such requirement applies to roads in existence at the time the railroad was constructed. State v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 74 N. C. 143.

As to the power to lay out streets or highways across railway property or right of way, see the note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Louisville, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1213.

As to the necessity of making compensation upon laying out streets across railway property, and the measure thereof, including damages for constructing the crossing and necessary safety appliances, see the note to New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1225.

The legislature would not have the power, either under its police powers or otherwise, to enact and enforce a statute compelling railroads, without any provisions for compensation, to bridge along streets laid out after the railroad was built.

Under the common-law rule, when a person or corporation, municipal or otherwise, laid out a way across the land, way, highway, street, or railroad right of way of another person or corporation, it was the duty of the junior occupant to bear all the expense of constructing and maintaining the crossings; which duty was a continuing one.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Proceedings in mandamus to compel defendants to erect and maintain a bridge over their right of way and railroad tracks as the same extend across University avenue in the city of Minneapolis. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: The Minnesota & Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated by chapter 1, p. 3, Laws Minn. Terr. Ex. Sess. 1857; and defendants, St. Paul, Minneapolis, & Manitoba Railway Company and the Great Northern Railway Company, are successors in interest, entitled to all its rights and subject to all its obligations and liabilities, in so far as involved in this proceeding. The line of railroad was constructed through the city of Minneapolis many years ago, upon a right of way acquired by purchase, of which defendants are now the owners. Long after the construction of the railroad, in the year 1892, the council of the city of Minneapolis, pursuant to the provisions of its charter conferring authority to that end, duly laid out and opened the street in question over and across the railroad right of way, and it has since that time been used as one of the public thoroughfares of the city. At the time the street was opened, the city, at its own cost and expense, erected a bridge over the railroad tracks, and thereafter maintained the same until the year 1903, when it was partly burned and practically destroyed; since which time there has been no passage over the tracks at this point. Subsequent to the destruction of the bridge the city council, by resolution duly adopted, ordered and directed defendants to construct a good and suitable bridge over their tracks at the intersection of this new street, at their own cost and expense. Plans and specifications were prepared by the city engineer under the direction of the council. Defendants refused to comply with the order, and thereafter these proceedings were commenced to compel a compliance therewith. The matter came on for hearing before the court below, and was submitted for its determination upon a stipulation of facts, from which it appears, among other things, that the erection of the bridge is necessary to render the street crossing safe for public travel. This must be taken, for present purposes, as conclusive upon the question of the propriety and necessity of the proposed improvement. Of course, if this stipulation was entered into by counsel for defendants on the theory that this was not a grade crossing, and that the necessity for the bridge arises solely from the fact that the street was laid over the tracks, he is not bound by it, and the question of necessity will be open on a new trial. The court below held that, inasmuch as the street was laid out and opened subsequent to the construction of the railroad, the burden of erecting and maintaining the bridge rested upon the city, and not upon the railroad company. Judgment was entered, dismissing the proceedings, from which relator appealed.

The case is an important one, not only to the railway companies of the state, but to the numerous municipalities thereof as well. In a word, the turning point of the controversy is, Shall the railway companies or interested municipalities bear the burden and expense of constructing crossings at streets and highways intersected by railroads, and maintaining them in a safe and suitable condition for public use, where the street or highway is laid out after the construction of the railroad? The precise question was not involved in any previous case in this court, except in a measure in State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. 42 Minn. 247, 7 L.R.A. 121, 44 N. W. 7, which will be referred to hereafter; and whatever may be found in former opinions in analogous cases on the subject must be treated as mere obiter remarks. Some conflicting views are apparent, but we are not required, in disposing of the present case, to reconcile them. The court is confronted with the principal question for the first time. We have been assisted by exhaustive arguments by able counsel, have considered the subject thoroughly, and the result of our deliberations is, in our opinion, fully in accord with the legislative policy of this state respecting the matter in issue, and in harmony with the law and policy of other states. Several questions are presented by the record, which will be considered in their logical order.

1. It is contended on the part of defendants that the proceedings laying out and establishing the street in question did not vest in the city the right to open the same on a grade with the railroad track; that a proper view of such proceedings, taken as a whole, will permit of no conclusion other than that the street was laid out up to the right of way and then over the same by means of a bridge which was erected by and at the expense of the city. A strict construction of the proceedings might sustain this contention; but we are of opinion that, fairly construed, a street was laid out across the right of way, and the city authorities thereby became vested with power to open the same at grade, or by an overhead crossing, as propriety, necessity, and public safety required. It is unnecessary to go further into this phase of the case, and we pass to other more vital and important questions.

2. We come, then, to the question whether the state, in the exercise of its police power, may require railroad companies to construct, at their own cost and expense, suitable crossings at street and highway intersections, in cases where the street or highway was laid out subsequent to the construction of the railroad; and further, if that power be vested in the state, whether the legislature has, by any statutory enactment, imposed the obligation upon the respondents, or whether it rests upon them at common law. It is insisted by defendants that there is no such obligation at common law; that the state has no power to cast the burden upon the railroads; and that if any statute exists which may be so construed, it is in violation of both state and Federal Constitutions, in that it denies to such companies the equal protection of the law, and operates to take from them their private property for public use, without compensation first paid or secured.

3. The question as to the power of the state, as respects streets and highways existing at the time of the construction of a railroad and over which it passes, to require the latter to construct and maintain suitable crossings, by bridges, viaducts, or otherwise, at its own expense, has been before the courts in numerous cases, and the uniform rule, so far as our examination of the authorities has extended, is that the state possesses that power. The obligation of the company in such cases arises from the rule of the common law that, where a new highway is laid out across one already in existence and use, the crossing must not only be made with as little injury as possible to the old way, but whatever structures may be necessary for the convenience and safety of the crossing must be erected and maintained by the person or corporation constructing and using the new way. Northern C. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 46 Md. 445; Dyer County v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. 87 Tenn. 712, 11 S. W. 943. The obligation exists in such cases independent of statute, and, as observed, the authorities enforce it in all cases where the streets were laid out and in existence before the advent of the railroad, and it extends to grade crossings, bridges, and viaducts, or whatever may be essential and necessary to make the crossing safe. If the duty to construct and maintain the bridge in question rests upon the railroad company, either by force of the provisions of its charter or at common law, it is clear that the city may enforce it. Its specially delegated supervision and control over streets and highways, with authority to lay out and open new ones, vest in it authority to enforce all appropriate regulations sanctioned by the police power of the state. The obligation was enforced by the city of Minneapolis in the case of State ex rel. Minneapolis v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 39 Minn. 219, 39 N. W. 153, without special statutory authority, the obligation existing, as it is contended it does in the case at bar, by force of the provisions of the charter of the railroad company.

4. The authorities are not fully agreed upon the question whether the state may, in the exercise of the police power, compel a railroad company, without compensation, to construct and maintain suitable crossings at streets extended over the right of way subsequent to the construction of the railroad. Our examination of the books, however, leads to the conclusion that the great weight of authority sustains the affirmative of that proposition. The right of the state so to act is maintained in the states of Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, New York, Tennessee, Indiana, Texas, Mississippi, Ohio, Nebraska, New Jersey, Vermont, Wisconsin, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. It involves an exercise of the police power, and the inquiry is whether such a requirement is a proper exercise of that power. It is unnecessary to enter into an extended discussion to show the extent to which the legislature may go in the exercise of this governmental prerogative. The property rights and liberty of the citizen are to be enjoyed in subordination to the general public welfare, and all reasonable regulations for the preservation and promotion thereof are uniformly sustained by the courts. "Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations, established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient." Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 85; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625; New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Drainage Commission, 197 U. S. 453, 49 L. ed. 831, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471. The reasonable limits of the exercise of the power are not readily defined, but generally speaking it extends to all matters where the general public welfare, morals, and health of the community are involved. Butler v. Chambers, 36 Minn. 69, 1 Am. St. Rep. 638, 30 N. W. 308.

A reference to a few of the adjudged cases will show the general trend of judicial opinion upon the subject before us. In Boston & M. R. Co. v. York County, 79 Me. 386, 10 Atl. 113, the court had before it a statute imposing upon the railroad companies of that state the duty of constructing crossings at subsequently laid out highways, and its validity was affirmed. The court there said: "The power of the legislature to impose uncompensated duties and even burdens upon individuals and corporations for the general safety is fundamental. It is the 'police power.' Its proper exercise is the highest duty of government. The state may in some cases forego the right to taxation, but it can never relieve itself of the duty of providing for the safety of its citizens. This duty and consequent power override all statute or contract exemptions; the state cannot free any person or corporation from subjection to this power. All personal as well as property rights must be held subject to the police power of the state."

In the case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 309, 29 N. E. 1109, the court had before it a case where the city instituted condemnation proceedings for the purpose of opening and extending a street across a railroad already in existence, and the question presented was whether the company owning the railroad was entitled, as a part of its compensation for opening the street across its tracks, to the cost of constructing and maintaining the crossing. It appeared that the railroad was constructed prior to the passage of a statute which required all railroad companies thereafter to construct and maintain such crossings and all approaches thereto. It was insisted that the statute was invalid, and had no application to the defendant, because its road was constructed prior to the opening of the street and prior to the enactment of the statute. In that case the court said: "Government owes to its citizens the duty of providing and preserving safe and convenient highways. From this duty results the right of public control over public highways. Railroads are public highways, and in their relations as such to the public are subject to legislative supervision, though the interests of their shareholders are private property. Every railroad company takes its right of way subject to the right of the public to extend the public highways and streets across such right of way. . . . If railroads, so far as they are public highways, are, like other highways, subject to legislative supervision, then railroad companies in their relations to highways and streets which intersect their rights of way are subject to the control of the police power of the state; that power of which this court has said that 'it may be assumed that it is a power coextensive with self-protection, and is not inaptly termed the law of overruling necessity.' Lake View v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 191, 22 Am. Rep. 71. The requirement embodied in § 8 [2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1885, chap. 114, p. 1937], that railroad companies shall construct and maintain the highway and street crossings and the approaches thereto within their respective rights of way, is nothing more than a police regulation. It is proper that the portion of the street or highway which is within the limits of the railroad right of way should be constructed by the railroad company and maintained by it, because of the dangers attending the operation of its road. It should control the making and repairing of the crossing for the protection of those passing along the street and of those riding on the cars. . . . The items of expense for which appellant claims compensation are such only as are involved in its compliance with a police regulation of the statute. It is well settled that 'neither a natural person nor a corporation can claim damages on account of being compelled to render obedience to a police regulation designed to secure the common welfare.' Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Joliet, L. & A. R. Co. 105 Ill. 388, 44 Am. Rep. 799. It has been held by this court in a number of cases that railroad corporations may be required to fence their tracks, to put in cattle guards, to place upon their engines a bell, and to do other things for the protection of life and property, although their charters contained no such requirements. Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Loomis, 13 Ill. 548, 56 Am. Dec. 471; Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Dill, 22 Ill. 264; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McClelland, 25 Ill. 140; Peoria & P. Union R. Co. v. Peoria & F. R. Co. 105 Ill. 110. . . . Uncompensated obedience to a regulation enacted for the public safety under the police power of the state is not a taking or damaging without just compensation of private property, or of private property affected with a public interest." "The language of § 8 is broad enough to include streets to be thereafter opened or extended as well as existing streets. . . . There is no reason for supposing that the legislature intended to refer exclusively to a railroad crossing created by running a new railroad across an existing street. The language includes also a railroad crossing created by running a new street across an existing railroad."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581, in reviewing the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 149 Ill. 457, 37 N. E. 78, after quoting the above excerpt from the prior Illinois decision, said: "We concur in these views. The expenses that will be incurred by the railroad company in erecting gates, planking the crossing, and maintaining flagmen, in order that its road may be safely operated,—if all that should be required,—necessarily result from the maintenance of a public highway, under legislative sanction, and must be deemed to have been taken by the company into account when it accepted the privileges and franchise granted by the state. Such expenses must be regarded as incidental to the exercise of the police powers of the state." See also Detroit, Ft. W. & B. I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 189 U. S. 383, 47 L. ed. 860, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 38 L. ed. 269, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437. In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 97 Wis. 418, 72 N. W. 1118, the supreme court of Wisconsin reviewed the subject at length, and reached the conclusion that the subject of crossings at streets laid out after the construction of the railroad was a proper subject for legislative control, within the police power, and the obligation to construct them might be imposed upon the railroad company without compensation. The opinion in that case points out that the decisions of the supreme court of the state of Massachusetts, which apparently laid down a different doctrine, were founded upon a statute of that state, by which the expense of such crossings was imposed upon the municipality. In the course of the discussion the court said: "The correct policy, in our judgment, is that held by the courts of New York, Maine, Illinois, and Iowa, that the probable results of a failure of duty respecting the safety of railroad crossings are so serious that the public interests require, as between municipalities and railway corporations, that such duty be lodged in some one place, undivided, absolute and with certainty, and that such place be the one where, in the estimation of legislative authority, it can be most readily, economically, certainly, and efficiently performed. Whichever place is designated, the municipalities owning the highways, or the railway corporations, the expense directly or indirectly falls on the public. These considerations are abundantly sufficient, judicially considered, to legitimately locate the whole subject of maintaining safe crossings within the domain of police regulations, so far as the legislative branch of the government may see fit to exercise its authority. It needs no extension of well-settled principles to reach this conclusion. But if it did, the increase of railroad operations, the growth of population and social and business activities, with consequent increasing dangers to persons and property, might reasonably warrant the extension. The tendency of modern development is in the direction of greater, rather than more restricted, use of police power, and necessarily so in order to meet the new dangers and increase of old dangers, constantly occurring as natural incidents of advancing civilization. We think the weight of modern authority is in accord with the views just expressed, and to the effect that everything that goes to make up a crossing safe for public use is as essentially within police regulations as any part of it."

It was held immaterial, as respects the right of the state to require those things to be done, whether the highway be laid out before or after the construction of the railroad. Their statutes were, however, strictly construed, and held not broad enough to include subsequently laid out streets, though an "obvious legislative policy" so imposing the obligation upon the railroads was recognized. In People ex rel. Kimball v. Boston & A. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 569, the railroad 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

company, long after it had constructed its road, was required by statute to construct a bridge over its track at an intersecting highway, and the act was sustained as a proper exercise of the police power. The court in that case said, in substance, that while the legislature could not confiscate property under a pretense of an exercise of the police power, yet it might impose upon railroad corporations such reasonable restrictions, regulations, and burdens as the public good required; could regulate the speed of trains, the way in which they should cross highways, and make all regulations proper to protect the lives of persons carried by them or passing upon the highways across the track. See also Albany Northern R. Co. v. Brownell, 24 N. Y. 345; Boston & A. R. Co. v. Greenbush, 5 Lans. 461. It was held by the supreme court of Tennessee, in Harriman v. Southern R. Co. 111 Tenn. 538, 82 S. W. 213, that an act of the legislature of that state empowering cities to require railroad companies to construct bridges at places where their tracks crossed the public streets, being referable to the police power, applied to railroads whose tracks were laid before the streets were opened or the city was incorporated. In that case the railroad was constructed and in operation many years before the city of Harriman, which sought therein to compel the company to construct a bridge, was founded. It was incorporated by the legislature long after the appearance and location of the railroad, and numerous streets were laid out over the railroad right of way. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Swalm, 83 Miss. 631, 36 So. 147, the court held that a railway company might be required to place a bridge over its road and to grade approaches thereto for a highway crossing it, though the railroad was in operation for many years before the highway was laid out. It appeared, in that case, that the proposed new highway crossed the tracks of the railroad company at a point where there was a cut 15 feet deep and 50 feet wide, in which the double tracks of the road were located. The court applied the rule of the cases already referred to, following a prior decision of that court. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Copiah County, 81 Miss. 685, 33 So. 502. The same doctrine is affirmed in Texas, Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Milam County, 90 Tex. 355, 38 S. W. 747. The court in that case sustained an act of the legislature imposing the duty upon railroad companies of constructing crossings over public highways, and held that it applied to cases where the highways were laid out by the county subsequent to the building of the railroad, as well as to previously existing highways, and that the expense of grading such crossings, putting in cattle guards, drain pipes, signboards, and crossing planks formed no part of the damages which the company was entitled to recover on account of the condemnation of its right of way for highway purposes. Such is the law in Connecticut (Woodruff v. Catlin, 54 Conn. 277, 6 Atl. 849), in Nebraska (State ex rel. Lancaster County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 29 Neb. 412, 45 N. W. 469; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. State, 47 Neb. 549, 41 L.R.A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557, 66 N. W. 624), in Ohio (Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Sharpe, 38 Ohio St. 150), in Vermont (Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 141, 62 Am. Dec. 625), and in Indiana (Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. State, 149 Ind. 276, 49 N. E. 2; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Cluggish, 143 Ind. 347, 42 N. E. 743; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Shelley, 163 Ind. 36, 71 N. E. 151). See also Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 561, 50 L. ed. 596, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1175.

5. A contrary doctrine may be said to be the law in the states of Kansas, Louisiana, and Michigan, but the great weight of authority, as shown by the foregoing citations, sustains the general proposition that the police power will uphold legislation of this kind. That the state has such authority, as respects all devices necessary for the safety and protection of the public, has been held by this court. State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. 42 Minn. 247, 7 L.R.A. 121, 44 N. W. 7; State ex rel. Minneapolis v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 39 Minn. 219, 39 N. W. 153; State ex rel. St. Paul v. Minnesota Transfer R. Co. 80 Minn. 108, 50 L.R.A. 656, 83 N. W. 32. In the case first cited the court held that, where the highway was laid out over and across the railroad tracks, the company was not entitled to compensation for providing and maintaining cattle guards and signboards at the new crossing, but was entitled to compensation for planking the roadway where it crosses the railroad tracks, and for the maintenance of the same. The decision in that case is in harmony with the rule laid down in Kansas and Massachusetts, but is at variance with all other courts whose decisions we have cited. The theory of this court in that case was that planking the tracks was a part of the work of constructing the highway, and in no sense a safety device or necessary for the protection of the traveling public, and did not come within a proper exercise of the police power. That case, however, sustains the general proposition that safety devices may be required at new streets; and sustains the contention of relator, if the bridge in question comes within the meaning of a safety device. But the decision rested upon the general statutes requiring cattle guards and gates to be constructed, and is not here directly in point. What was said in State ex rel. Minneapolis v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 35 Minn. 131, 59 Am. Rep. 313, 28 N. W. 3, with reference to the construction of the statute there before the court, as respects streets laid out after the location of the railroad, was not intended as a decision of the question. That question was not involved in the case, and the remark was made for the purpose of indicating that the decision was intended to be limited to existing streets only.

6. Counsel for defendants attempted to distinguish many of the cases cited, as supporting the contention of the relator, on the ground that they involved grade crossings only. The cases cited from Tennessee, Indiana, and Mississippi involved the construction of bridges over the tracks of the railroad company, but, as urged by counsel, the other cases concerned only grade crossings. But there can be no difference on principle, in so far as an exercise of the police power is concerned, between a grade crossing and a bridge over the tracks. The difference between the two is one of degree, relating solely to the matter of expense. But the expense incident to a compliance with police regulations is not an element of consideration, except, perhaps, where arbitrary and unreasonable, or resulting in a practical confiscation of property. Cases where one railroad crosses another have no application, because both stand on an equality respecting rights and obligations, while in cases like that at bar the rights of the public are superior.

7. If, then, it is within the authority of the state, in the exercise of its police power, to require railroad companies to construct and maintain crossings, either at grade or above or below the tracks, at streets laid out after the construction of the road, it becomes necessary to inquire whether the legislature of this state has so declared or ordered by any statute, or whether the obligation rests upon the railroad company at common law.

The charter of the Minnesota & Pacific Railroad Company, predecessor of defendants, provides as follows: The said company shall have the right and authority to construct their said railroad and branches upon and along, across, under, or over any public or private highway, road, street, plank road, or railroad, if the same shall be necessary; but the said company shall put such highway, road, street, plank road, or railroad in such condition and state of repair as not to impair or interfere with its free and proper use. Laws Extra Sess. 1857, chap. 1, p. 6, § 7. A statute very similar to this was held applicable to new streets by the Indiana supreme court (Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 91 Ind. 119), and the rule announced by that court may be said to have been applied, in effect, by other courts, as shown by the cases cited (Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 309, 29 N. E. 1109). While the statute on its face might be construed as intended to apply to existing highways only, a fair and reasonable construction thereof, in view of the legislative policy of the state on this subject, and the propriety and necessity for some specific regulation, will bring within its scope and purpose streets and highways subsequently laid out and opened. It is elementary that charters of public corporations, in which the rights of the public are involved, are to be construed with strictness against the corporation, and liberally in favor of the public. St. Louis River Dalles Improv. Co. v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. 51 Minn. 10, 52 N. W. 976; Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 339, 67 Am. Dec. 471. Or, as said by the New York court of appeals, in Tracy v. Troy & B. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 433, 98 Am. Dec. 54, an act of the legislature, induced by public considerations, the purpose of which is to protect the traveling public, should receive a liberal construction to effectuate the purpose of its framers. "A rigid and literal reading would in many cases defeat the very object of the statute and exemplify the maxim that 'the letter killeth, while the spirit keepeth alive.'" The operation of statutes is often extended, by construction, to matters of subsequent creation, and applied to conditions that accrue after their passage, as well as to those that existed before. Statute Law (Wilberforce) 166; Kline v. Minnesota Iron Co. 93 Minn. 63, 100 N. W. 681; Schus v. Powers-Simpson Co. 85 Minn. 447, 69 L.R.A. 887, 89 N. W. 68. In those cases we construe the fellow-servant statute, which, on its face, applied to commercial railroads, to apply to "logging" railroads, though they were unknown when the statute was enacted; and the construction there given was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in Minnesota Iron Co. v. Kline, 199 U. S. 593, 50 L. ed. 322, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159.

The language of statutes, when under liberal construction, is flexible, and general words admit of more than one interpretation. The court may carry the statute beyond the natural import of its words when essential to answer the purpose of the legislature. Black, Constr. & Interpretation of Laws, 307, 315; 2 Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 2d ed. 582 et seq.; Avery v. Groton, 36 Conn. 304; Smith v. Stevens, 82 Ill. 554; Vigo's Case (Ex parte United States) 21 Wall. 648, 22 L. ed. 690. It is "an old and unshaken rule in the construction of statutes, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to wit, that the intention of a remedial statute will always prevail over the literal sense of its terms, and therefore when the expression is special or particular, but the reason is general, the expression should be deemed general." Brown v. Pendergast, 7 Allen, 427. A large construction is to be given to statutes having for their end the promotion of important and beneficial public objects. Wolcott v. Pond, 19 Conn. 597. In Silver v. Ladd, 7 Wall. 219, 19 L. ed. 138, the Supreme Court of the United States applied this rule to an act of Congress granting lands to certain settlers, and held that the words "single man" included unmarried women. A statute of Alabama provided that whenever an officer required by law to give an official bond acts under a bond "which is not in the penalty payable and conditioned as prescribed by law," such bond is not void, but stands in the place of the official bond, subject, on its conditions being broken, to all the remedies which the person aggrieved might have had upon the bond, had it been executed in conformity with the law. The court held that the statute, being a remedial one, should be construed to apply to a bond properly conditioned, but defectively executed. Sprowl v. Lawrence, 33 Ala. 685. Numerous illustrations of the application of this rule to various statutes will be found referred to in 2 Sutherland on Statutory Construction, 2d ed. §§ 593 et seq. See also Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. ed. 773, 938.

The purpose of incorporating this particular provision in the charter of the railroad company was in the interests of the public, and to require the railroad company to keep in good repair all crossings at the intersection of highways; and, though it may be said to be declaratory of the common law, the general rules of statutory construction apply to its interpretation. At the time the legislature granted the charter of the railroad company in 1857, the city of Minneapolis was a small village, and the territory to the north and west through which the proposed line of railroad was to extend was a vast wilderness, occupied by roving bands of Indians. It was in the mind of the legislature, at that time, that the city of Minneapolis would increase in population and ultimately become a large city; that the state through which the road was to be constructed would develop and improve; that settlers would make their homes upon the public lands; and that villages and cities would spring up along the line of the railroad, thus rendering new streets and highways an absolute necessity for public use. Respondents' charter was granted with the reserved right on the part of the state to construct new highways and streets over its line of railroad, wherever made necessary by the future development of the state. It is not, therefore, in view of this condition, which was in the mind of the legislature and the railroad company, unreasonable to believe that they contemplated, when providing for the care of highway and street crossings, not only those then existing, but such as might thereafter, in the course of the growth and development of the state, become necessary to be laid across the railroad's right of way. The evils intended to be guarded against are the same, and apply equally to both new and old streets. There was no reason why the legislature should deem it prudent to provide for existing highways only; and we do no violence to the rules of statutory construction in holding that the provisions of defendants' charter were intended to include all streets and highways intersected by railroads, whether laid out before or after the building of the railroad. The expression of the statute is special, perhaps; but the reason therefor is general. The expression must therefore be deemed general. Brown v. Pendergast, supra.

A railroad company accepts and receives its franchise subject to the implied right of the state to lay out and open new streets and highways over its tracks, and must be deemed, as a matter of law, to have had in contemplation at the time its charter was granted, and is bound to assume, all burdens incident to new, as well as existing, crossings. This feature of the case was before this court in State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. 42 Minn. 247, 7 L.R.A. 121, 44 N. W. 7. That case involved the general statutes requiring cattle guards and signboards to be erected at crossings, which, on their face, like the provisions of respondents' charter, have at least apparent reference to highways crossed by railroad lines. It was there insisted that the requirement had no application to new streets, and that the railroad company was entitled to compensation for their construction, to be allowed as damages for opening the new street over the right of way. The court held that the statute applied to new streets, but that the company was entitled to compensation for planking the crossing. In the course of the opinion, the court said, in substance, that, although the street involved in that case was not in existence when the railroad was constructed, and hence the requirement of the statute referred to did not impose the duty of putting in cattle guards and signboards at the particular place at that time, yet as soon as the street was laid out and opened, the existing statute became applicable and required those things to be done; that the circumstances with reference to which the statute as a police regulation applied came into existence by the location of the new street, and the requirements of the statute became operative. "When the railroad company accepted its charter, it received its franchise subject to the authority and power of the state to impose such reasonable regulations concerning the use, in matters affecting the common safety, of its dangerous enginery, and not merely subject to the then existing regulations as applicable to then existing conditions; and whether the obligation now in question had been imposed at this time by direct act of the legislature, or, as is the case, arises from the laying out of a new highway, to which the previously existing law becomes applicable, can make no difference." The court further said that, when the franchise was granted to the railroad company to construct and operate its railroad, it was not contemplated either by it or by the state that no more public highways should be laid out which would increase the number of places where the ordinary police regulations would have to be complied with by the railroad company to its inconvenience and expense; on the contrary, that it must have been understood and contemplated, especially in a new state, rapidly advancing in population and in the development of its resources, where new towns were springing up and new avenues for travel and traffic were becoming necessary, that new streets and roads would and must be laid out, and that many of these would necessarily cross existing railroad lines; and "we cannot resist the conclusion that, so far as concerns the matter now under consideration, the charter of the relator was taken subject to the right of the state to impose this duty whenever, by reason of the establishing of new highways, it should become necessary; and hence the relator is not entitled to compensation for obedience to this requirement,"—citing Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. 30 Ohio St. 604; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Joliet, L. & A. R. Co. 105 Ill. 388, 44 Am. Rep. 799; Hannibal v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 49 Mo. 480; Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 36 Conn. 255, 4 Am. Rep. 63. The reasoning of the court in that case applies to the case at bar. In conclusion, on this branch of the case, we say, as was said by the Indiana supreme court in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 91 Ind. 119, that the provisions of the railroad charter should not receive the literal and restricted construction contended for by respondent. Neither the interest of the railroad company nor of the public require it.

8. Again, we are clear that the obligation is imposed upon the railroads at common law. The common-law doctrine that where a street or highway is laid over one already in existence, the expense of making the crossing safe rests upon the company or corporation using the new way, had its origin when railroads were unknown, at a time when the use of all highways, generally speaking, was of the same general nature, the traffic or use of either not being inherently dangerous to the free use and enjoyment of the other. Not so where a railroad crosses a public street, or a street a railroad. In such a case the operation of trains over the latter, particularly in our large cities, is highly dangerous and a menace to the public using the intersecting street. The railroad company is alone responsible for this condition, and, though it has an unquestioned right to operate its trains in such manner as the practical conduct of its business may require, the dangers resulting therefrom are of its own creation, and on every principle of right and wrong it should bear the burden of protecting the public so far as practicable from accident or injury. The common law is not a codification of exact or inflexible rules for human conduct, for the redress of injuries, or protection against wrongs, nor yet a mere figment of judicial genius; but, on the contrary, is the embodiment of broad and comprehensive unwritten principles, inspired by natural reason, an innate sense of justice, adopted by common consent for the regulation and government of the affairs of men. It is the growth of ages, and an examination of many of its principles, as enunciated and discussed in the books, discloses a constant improvement and development in keeping with advancing civilization and new conditions of society. Holmes, Common Law, 1-5, 36, et seq. Its guiding star has always been the rule of right and wrong, and in this country its principles demonstrate that there is in fact, as well as in theory, a remedy for all wrongs. The principles governing the rights and liabilities of individuals are often inapplicable to railroad companies, or other corporations, clothed as they are by the state with special rights, powers, and privileges not enjoyed by individuals. The nature and character of the business of railroad companies, the numerous hazards and dangers connected with the conduct of their affairs, render the law for the individual inappropriate and inefficient; and the courts, in testing the various pertinent principles in connection with their peculiar features, have, by methods of differentiation an analogy, evolved new and appropriate rules for the determination of their rights and liabilities. 5 Harvard L. Rev. 189.

law above referred to applies to and governs the position of relator in the case at bar, imposing the obligation of constructing the bridge in question upon the city, because the street was laid over the existing railroad. The rule in its abstract form can have no application to facts and conditions such as here shown, and cannot be held to impose upon the municipality the burden of constructing safety devices to protect pedestrians from dangers caused solely by the railroad company. In view of the fact that the railroad company takes its franchise subject to the reserved right of the state to lay new streets over and across its track, and in contemplation that it may do so (Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 140 Ill. 309, 29 N. E. 1109; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. supra), and the further fact that the company is solely responsible for the necessity of safety devices at street crossings, the same being occasioned by the operation of its trains over and across the street, and the further elementary principle that he who creates and maintains upon his premises a condition dangerous and inimical to others is under legal obligation to so guard and protect it that injury to third persons may not result therefrom, the rule of the common law as to existing, must be held to apply equally to new, streets. The right of the state to lay out and open new streets is a condition attached by implication of law to the charter and franchise of the railway company, and the obligation to maintain the street intersections in good repair is a continuing one, follows the franchise, and applies to new streets or highways as soon as they come into existence.

9. It follows, from what has been said, that the obligation to construct and maintain the bridge in question rests upon defendant, unless it is a part and portion of the crossing, for which, within State ex rel. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. District Ct. 42 Minn. 247, 7 L.R.A. 121, 44 N. W. 7, it is entitled to compensation, and in no sense a safety device. The court, in the case just referred to, held that the railroad company might be required to construct safety devices at new streets, the planking for the crossing being held in that case not to come within the scope of that expression. So, if the proposed bridge constitutes a safety device, within the meaning of that term, relator's contention must be sustained, and the order of the court below reversed. That it comes within the meaning of that expression we have no serious doubt. It appears from the record that a number of railroad tracks cross this particular street, which is in a populous part of the city and constantly used by the citizens; that trains are frequently operated over and across the same, rendering the crossing dangerous and unsafe for public use. The purpose of planking between the rails is to make the street passable over the track. But the purpose of a bridge over the tracks is for safety, and for safety alone. There can be no distinction between it and gates or signboards. They answer the same purpose. "Everything that goes to make up a crossing safe for public use is as essentially within the police regulations as any part of it." Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 97 Wis. 418, 72 N. W. 1118.

10. In the year 1892 the city council of the city of Minneapolis enacted a certain ordinance requiring the respondents to construct certain bridges and approaches there-to at the intersection of certain streets with the railroad tracks. By § 8 of that ordinance, the city council, on behalf of the city, expressly agreed that, in consideration of the performance of the conditions of the ordinance by the respondents, the city would thereafter construct and maintain all crossings or approaches made necessary by the opening of new streets. It is contended by respondents that this ordinance constituted a valid contract with the city, and, having been complied with on their part, it is beyond the power of the city to now require them to construct the bridge in question; that to require it to do so would impair the obligations of the contract, in violation of both state and Federal Constitutions. In this we do not concur. The power of the state to require the defendants to construct the bridge in question, or any other bridge, at streets crossing the right of way, is an exercise of the police power, which can be neither contracted away nor lost by inaction on the part of the public authorities. The contract was beyond the authority of the city council and ultra vires and void. State ex rel. St. Paul v. Minnesota Transfer R. Co. 80 Minn. 108, 50 L.R.A. 656, 83 N. W. 32; 5 Current Law, 637, note 71; Rochester v. Rochester R. Co. 182 N. Y. 99, 70 L.R.A. 773, 74 N. E. 953; 36 Century Dig. cols. 1160, 1161, § 1315. See also Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 42 L. ed. 948, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513, where the subject is fully considered. Though the contract before the court in the case last cited was held valid so long as acted on by the parties, the court said that it might be repudiated at any time by the municipality. In the case at bar, the contract was repudiated by the city when its council adopted the resolution requiring defendants to construct the bridge. The resolution was sufficient for that purpose. Alma v. Guaranty 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Sav. Bank, 8 C. C. A. 564, 19 U. S. App. 622, 60 Fed. 203; Board of Education v. De Kay, 148 U. S. 591, 37 L. ed. 573, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 706; Quincy v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 92 Ill. 21.

It is probable that this whole matter was set at rest by the last legislature, for the future at least, by the enactment of chapter 280, p. 413, Gen. Laws 1905. But that statute is not here involved, for this proceeding was commenced prior to its passage.

Judgment appealed from is reversed, and a new trial granted.

Affirmed by Supreme Court of United States, April 26, 1909, 214 U. S. 497, 53 L. ed. 1060, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 698.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

HARLEY METCALF, Exr., etc., of J. B. Conly, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

YAZOO & MISSISSIPPI VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— Miss. —, 52 So. 355.)

Railroad — passenger — visiting depot to leave baggage.

One who goes to a railroad station a few minutes before the arrival of his train is entitled to the rights of a passenger, although his intention is merely to leave his hand baggage and depart again to transact some personal business before train time, where by statute the railroad company is required to keep its station open at least an hour before the arrival of trains; and he may therefore hold the railroad company liable for an injury due to the unsafe condition of the premises.

Note. — Rights of one going to station to deposit baggage.

There is very little authority upon the particular question presented in the foregoing case. The decision, however, is supported by Hrebrik v. Carr, 29 Fed. 298, where it was held that a passenger who has gone aboard of an outgoing vessel may return to the wharf without losing his character as a passenger and his right to protection as such, although his purpose for going is merely to purchase tobacco.

In Abbot v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 46 Or. 549, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 885, 80 Pac. 1012, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 961, it was held that a passenger is guilty of contributory negligence which will bar his recovery for injuries received by a fall from a station platform, where, having been provided by the carrier with a well-lighted car in which to await the arrival of his train, he leaves it on a very dark night to walk

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bolivar County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Shields & Boddie for appellant.

Messrs. Mayes & Longstreet for appellee.

Mayes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1908 J. B. Conly instituted suit against the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company for the purpose of recovering damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by him some time in September of that year, by falling into an excavation made by the company around its depot at Duncan, Mississippi, which, it is claimed, was negligently left open without warning light or safety guard. Mr. Conly alleges that he fell while at the depot for the purpose of taking passage on a train, due about ten or fifteen minutes after he entered the depot, and about 7:20 P. M. After the institution of the suit Mr. Conly died, and the suit is prosecuted by the executor.

The facts are substantially as follows: Mr. Conly left Round lake, Mississippi, in a buggy about 5 o'clock, and drove to the town of Duncan, intending, as it seems, to take passage on the 7:20 P. M. south-bound passenger train on defendant's road. After arriving at the town of Duncan he proceeded to the hotel to get supper. After supper, and fifteen or twenty minutes before the train was due, he left the hotel for the depot, with his grip in his hand and a mileage book in his pocket, having in view the purpose of taking passage on the train, when it should arrive. It was the double purpose of Conly to deposit his grip in the waiting room of the depot in preparation of his contemplated trip, and then to go over to the store of a Mr. Wynn, which was but a short distance from the waiting room, as he desired to speak to Mr. Wynn on a matter of business. Conly proceeded to the depot, and entered the waiting room safely, and, after depositing his grip, turned to go out to see Mr. Wynn, and as he stepped out of the door fell into an excavation in front of same, and sustained painful injuries at least. It appears that the excavation was made by reason of the fact that the company was repairing its depot. The excavation seems to have been immediately in front of the waiting room entrance, and from 3 to 5 feet deep, and some 2 or 3 feet wide. Across this trench, and for the purpose of getting into the waiting room, some planks were placed leading into the door; but they were unguarded and without warning light. Conly said he could not see the excavation when he entered, because there was no light. As he entered, he says the light in the waiting room was shining in his eyes and blinded him, and when he came out the light was behind him, and the excavation so close to the door that, while it was bright enough to make the gravel walk visible, it did not light up this excavation. It is not our purpose to intimate how serious were the injuries Conly received. That question is left to the jury. The question before this court is simply whether or not the facts make out a case of liability on the part of the company. The court below gave a peremptory instruction to find for defendant, holding that Conly was not a passenger at the time of the injury, and from this action of the trial court an appeal is prosecuted by the executor.

Let us first review the statutes of the state on the subject of the railroad's duty in respect to its depots and waiting rooms. By § 4854 it is made the duty of every railroad to establish and maintain such depots as shall be reasonably necessary for the public convenience; and by § 4867 it is made the duty of every railroad to keep rooms open for the reception of passengers at least one hour before the arrival, and one-half hour after the departure, of all passenger trains. Thus it is that the law requires that the railroads shall have depots, and that they shall make them comfortable and accessible at reasonable times to intending pas-merely for exercise on an unlighted platform, knowing that the slope of the land is such that some portions of the platform must be some distance from the ground. This case is not of much value upon the question, as, although it might be conceded that the injured person was a passenger, yet he would be unable to recover because he was not acting with due care.

A passenger does not lose his rights as such by going from the waiting room or ticket office to the baggage room for the purpose of checking his baggage. Exton v. Central R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 356, 56 L.R.A. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

508, 46 Atl. 1099; Pineus v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 140 N. C. 450, 111 Am. St. Rep. 856, 53 S. E. 297.

Upon the somewhat analogous question of rights and liabilities of parties when passenger temporarily leaves vehicle before completion of the journey, see note to Finnegan v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 15 L.R.A. 399.

Upon the general question, when does a person who has started for a train become a passenger, see note to Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. 24 L.R.A. 521.

sengers. It would be useless for the statute to require the railroads to keep rooms open for the reception of passengers an hour before the arrival of the train, unless intending passengers could make lawful use of the rooms, within that limit of time, for any necessary or convenient purpose which is in furtherance of the bona fide intention to become a passenger. This is the manifest purpose of the statute, and the very object of having the waiting room open is to receive intending passengers and their hand baggage. When an intending passenger avails himself of the convenience which the law has established for his benefit, and which the railroad must provide, within a reasonable time before the arrival of the train, his object being to facilitate and further his purpose to take passage, even though it be to place his hand baggage in the waiting room as a matter of convenience to himself and in furtherance of his ultimate object, such person, while on the depot grounds or in the waiting room, is a passenger, and entitled to all the protection of a passenger, though he have a purpose to leave again before the arrival of the train on a matter of convenience, pleasure, or business. To hold otherwise would place the rights of persons accepting the conveniences provided by law for their use, in a precarious and uncertain condition under the law, and relieve railroads from a duty which they stand under to the traveling public, for which no sensible or just reason can be assigned. It is a matter of common knowledge that intending passengers use the waiting rooms for depositing their hand satchels and such like, many minutes before a train is due to arrive. Some may loiter around the grounds and the platforms, while others may find it convenient and necessary to cross a street on a matter of business or pleasure; but because of this it is none the less the duty of a railroad to keep its grounds and rooms in a safe condition, both for the intending passenger who imprisons himself within the four walls of the waiting room and the passenger who is on the grounds for the purpose of relieving himself from the burden of his baggage in order that he may go out for some purpose, it being certain that both come to the depot for the ultimate purpose of taking a train.

It is argued by counsel for appellee that, before there can arise the relation of carrier and passenger, there must not only be an intent on the part of a person to become a passenger and to avail himself of the facilities offered by the carrier for transportation, but there must be an express or implied acceptance by the carrier of the person so intending as a passenger. Many authorities are cited to sustain this proposition, and we find no fault with the law there announced; but the question is, What constitutes this acceptance? Must the person go to the agent of the carrier and formally announce his arrival and intention to take passage? Must the agent then and there formally accept such person, in order to establish the relation? Clearly no such formality is required, in view of the fact that it is the lawful right of every citizen to establish this relation, with or without the consent of the railroad. The true rule is that, when the railroad has opened its waiting room for the reception of passengers as required by law, and any person intending to take passage on the train next to come has resorted to the depot in lawful furtherance of that purpose and in a proper condition to be received as a passenger, there arises from these acts, as a matter of law, the relation of carrier and passenger.

The contention of counsel for appellee that the relation of carrier and passenger could not arise until after Conly had entered the depot grounds on his return from Wynn's store is unsound and too narrow. Conly had gone to the depot to deposit his satchel in the waiting room only fifteen minutes before the arrival of his train. His resort to the depot was for a lawful purpose and in furtherance of his intention. The depot was open for the reception of passengers and for their convenience. If he had hunted up the agent, and told him that he contemplated taking the next train, and desired to place his baggage in the waiting room and go out to see Wynn, the agent would doubtless have told him that the waiting room was there for the full convenience of one situated as he was. He was making the very use of the waiting room that the railroad and the law designed should be made of it. Conly was no loiterer on the depot grounds. He was no idler or trespasser; but he was there on the lawful business of an intending passenger.

We have found no case precisely like the case now on trial, but in the note to the case of Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 130 Am. St. Rep. 76, will be found many authorities discussing this subject and sustaining the principle here announced. In § 997, vol. 2, Hutchinson on Carriers, it is said: "It would be impossible to frame a clear, precise, legal definition of the word 'passenger,' which would embrace all its essential elements." In 6 Cyc. Law. & Proc. p. 536, it is said that the relation of carrier and passenger exists, as to railroad companies, "not merely when the passenger enters the train with the ticket already purchased, giving him a contract right to ride, but when he enters upon the premises of the carrier, with intention to take a train in due course."

The case of Andrews v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 86 Miss. 129, 38 So. 773, is no authority for any question involved in this case. In the Andrews Case it is shown that Andrews went to the depot more than two hours before the train he desired to take was due. He went into the private office of the agent, and requested the privilege of doing some writing on account of his own affairs, thus going to the depot and making use of its private office as an office in which to transact some business of his own. While so engaged in his own business in the private office of the depot, the depot agent and Andrews got into a personal difficulty about a private matter, and the court stated in the opinion that Andrews had gone to the depot in order that he might have a comfortable and convenient place in which to transact his own business, and was not, therefore, a passenger; that Andrews was knowingly violating the rules of the company, and could not claim its protection under the facts of that case. But the very object of Conly's visit to the depot was in furtherance of his purpose to take passage. Everything he did while there was in accordance with the rules of the company, and he was merely availing himself of those facilities which the company had placed there for the use of passengers, and which, under the law and rules of the company, he had a right to use.

In view of what we have heretofore said, we deem it unnecessary to further discuss the questions argued on behalf of appellee.

(June 23, 1910.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due under a contract for personal services. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.
28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. J. W. Russell, with Mr. Leopold M. Stern, for appellant:

Under a contract for hiring at a specified monthly wage, the servant is entitled to pay for the time actually devoted to the master's service, but is not entitled to pay for time lost on account of sickness.

Hunter v. Waldron, 7 Ala. 753; Ryan v. Dayton, 25 Conn. 188, 65 Am. Dec. 560; Nichols v. Coolahan, 10 Met. 449; Fuller v. Brown, 11 Met. 440; Wolfe v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 197, 75 Am. Dec. 388; Clark v. Gilbert, 26 N. Y. 279, 84 Am. Dec. 189; Dunlap v. Montgomery, 123 Pa. 27, 16 Atl. 41; Parker v. Macomber, 17 R. I. 674, 16 L.R.A. 858, 24 Atl. 464; McClellan v. Harris, 7 S. D. 447, 64 N. W. 522; McDonald v. Montague, 30 Vt. 357.

A custom among wholesale dealers to allow their salesmen pay for time lost on account of sickness is unreasonable.

Sweet v. Leach, 6 Ill. App. 212.

Mr. James A. Dougan for respondent.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In January, 1906, respondent was employed by appellant as a traveling salesman at a wage of $125 per month and expenses. He was discharged July 2d following, and in January, 1909, he brought this action to recover $208.40, claimed to be due on account of unpaid wages. The answer admitted the employment, but denied the service for the full period of six months; alleged about fifty-five days' lost time in the months of April, May, and June, and an overpayment of $16.40. The court below found in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

There can be no question but that respondent performed no service during the time claimed by appellant. He does not claim to, except that between April 12th and 22d, when he admits he was at home ill, he says he sent in an order for a Seattle house, and that between May 7th and 31st, when he admits being at home, he mailed about 500 postal route cards. The question then presented is, Can a servant employed by the month recover for lost time? It is well settled that he cannot. Under the old common-law rule, when the servant was employed for a fixed time, the contract was considered as an entirety, and no recovery could be had except for complete performance. The rule was early modified by the American courts, and it was held that, when, because of sickness or other reason not the fault of the servant, he was unable to continue in his employment, he could nevertheless recover pro rata for the service actually performed, less any damage caused by reason of failure of complete performance. Dunlap v. Montgomery, 123 Pa. 27, 16 Atl. 41. The same reasoning which protects the servant in permitting him to recover for service actually performed protects the master in not holding him liable except for services actually performed; and the servant cannot recover for time lost through his own illness or other inability to perform the required service. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 19, 43; Hunter v. Waldron, 7 Ala. 753; Ryan v. Dayton, 25 Conn. 188, 65 Am. Dec. 560; Nichols v. Coolahan, 10 Met. 449; Fuller v. Brown, 11 Met. 440; Wolfe v. Howes, 20 N. Y. 197, 75 Am. Dec. 388; Clark v. Gilbert, 26 N. Y. 279, 84 Am. Dec. 189; Parker v. Macomber, 17 R. I. 674, 16 L.R.A. 858, 24 Atl. 464; McClellan v. Harris, 7 S. D. 447, 64 N. W. 522; McDonald v. Montague, 30 Vt. 357; Hughes v. Toledo Scale & Cash Register Co. 112 Mo. App. 91, 86 S. W. 895. The court below was therefore in error in allowing respondent full time for the months of April, May, and June.

Respondent cites a number of cases where a recovery has been permitted because of some waiver by the master. Such cases are not in point here, as there is no waiver either alleged or proved. In fact, it appears from the correspondence of the parties that appellant had informed respondent that it was neither willing nor was it its custom to pay its salesmen for lost time, which would seem to have been acquiesced in by respondent, as in one of his letters to the company in which he refers to his illness he says: "I don't know what your system is in regard to sickness, but I am willing to stand by it."

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

1. Abandonment by servant.

In a South Carolina case the court, proceeding upon the broad doctrine that wages may be "apportioned," allowed the plaintiff in an action on the contract to recover remuneration pro tanto.¹ The doctrine is manifestly untenable. It has been explicitly rejected in two jurisdictions,² and its un-

Dec. 707, where plaintiff had covenanted to serve defendant twelve months as master in a smith's shop, and was to receive as his remuneration one fourth of the net proceeds of the shop during that time, a declaration which stated that he was prevented by sickness from discharging his duty under the contract for the space of four months, and claimed the one fourth of the soundness is taken for granted in all the cases reviewed below, in which the appropriate remedy is declared to be an action on a quantum meruit. These cases, however, although they are in full accord with respect to this point, disclose some divergence of views regarding the precise extent to which the contract should be treated as a controlling element in such an action.

Some of them merely assert in general terms the right of the servant to recover on this footing, and do not embody any definite theory concerning the evidential significance to be ascribed to the contract.³

In Vermont the prima facie measure of recovery is defined as being a proportionate part of the stipulated wages for the period which preceded the supervention of the disability.⁴ In this state the situation is apparently regarded as falling within the scope of the general rule of pleading that a person may bring suit on the common counts for the value of services rendered under a special contract, if he has performed the con-

net proceeds which accrued during the eight months, was held defective. Compare the decision of the court in Givhan v. Dailey, 4 Ala. 336.

In American Pub. House v. Wilson, 63 Ill. App. 463, where a servant hired for a year had been incapacitated by sickness after three months' work, the court cited the case of Cutler v. Powell, 6 T. R. 320, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 627, as being controlling. The actual ground upon which the judgment entered by the lower court in the servant's favor was set aside was that the jury had been erroneously instructed that, "if the contract between the plaintiff and the American Publishing House does not provide for a forfeiture of the plaintiff's salary as damages in case plaintiff should not work for the entire time stated in the contract, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for the time she actually did work, if she did not work the entire time." The criticism of the court of appeals was that the contract contained no express provision for a forfeiture of the plaintiff's salary in any event, and that to instruct the jury in the language used was in effect to tell them that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, as a matter of law, for the time she had worked, irrespective of the terms of the contract.

³ Hunter v. Waldron, 7 Ala. 756; Lake-man v. Pollard, 43 Me. 463, 69 Am. Dec. 77.

In Stolle v. Stuart, 21 S. D. 643, 114 N. W. 1007, where a woman who was engaged, together with her husband, to perform services on a farm, was held entitled to recover the value of her services, the decision was rendered with reference to S. D. Comp. Laws, § 3773, regarding the effect of the incapacity of an employee in terminating the contract.

The rule laid down in Ryan v. Dayton, 25 Conn. 188, 65 Am. Dec. 560, is that, where the contract is for the personal services of the person hired, and cannot be performed by the agency of another, there is an implied condition that an inability to labor during a part of the time so far constitutes an excuse for not laboring during such time that the party hired is not thereby deprived of the right to a reasonable compensation for the services actually performed. A distinction was drawn between contracts of personal service for a definite period, and contracts to do a specific piece of work, such as building a house or constructing a machine; the ground of the distinction being that the performance of the former class of contracts cannot be delegated, while the performance of the latter class may be effected by the agency of a person other than the contractor. The nondelegable quality of the service rendered under the former description of contracts was to be regarded as operating to the advantage of the servant as well as of the master. Accordingly, the reasonable implication is that, if the master accepts the benefits of a contract involving this incident, it is on the understanding that he accepts its drawbacks also, and one of those drawbacks is that the servant may be disabled, without any fault of his own, from completing his contract. For the reason that the case did not necessarily require a decision upon the point, the court declined to express a definite opinion regarding the correctness of the Vermont doctrine, and say whether the servant "would necessarily be entitled to a proportional part of the sum agreed to be paid for the whole time, and that it should not be reduced so as to indemnify the employer for the loss which he has sustained by the nonfulfilment of the agreement."

That a person who is prevented by sickness from completing the performance of an independent contract is entitled to sue on a quantum meruit for the value of the part completed was held in Hillyard v. Crabtree, 11 Tex. 264, 62 Am. Dec. 475; Green v. Gilbert, 21 Wis. 396.

⁴ In Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 557, an action of book account for wages at a stipulated monthly rate, the court laid it down that, where a servant is discharged from his contract by the act of God, the contract may be "apportioned," and that he is "entitled to recover, as upon a quantum meruit pro rata." The court argued as follows: Viewing the present as a contract for the personal services of the plaintiff, which could only be performed by himself, we think that, from its nature, a condition was impliedly attached to it, that an inability to labor during a part of the time stipulated, produced by inevitable necessity, should so far constitute an excuse for not laboring during that period that he should not thereby be deprived of a right to a reasonable compensation for the service performed by him under it; and that the rule that where a person by his own contract creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any ac-tract on his part. For the purposes of the application of that rule, partial performance, accompanied by a valid excuse for the failure to perform completely, is deemed to be equivalent to complete performance, so far as regards the period during which services were actually rendered.

The New York doctrine is that the measure of recovery is the value of the services rendered, "not exceeding the rate of compensation secured by the terms of the contract."⁵ So far as its practical results are concerned, this doctrine is essentially the same as that adopted in Vermont. But its rationale is that, in order to do justice between the parties, a definite evidential value should be attributed to the contract, and not that the contract should be regarded as having been fully performed pro tanto. The writer is of opinion that both the doctrines just stated are unsatisfactory, for the reason that in numerous instances they must operate unfairly either for the employer or the employed.

cident by inevitable necessity,—which, properly understood, we do not intend to impugn,—is not applicable to such a contract. The court then cited several old English authorities regarding the effect of an act of God in discharging contracts of various descriptions, and proceeded thus: "These services being of a personal character, the contract could not be performed by another; and, as the plaintiff was disabled to perform it himself, by reason of sickness, which was the act of God, upon the authority of the foregoing cases the contract was discharged. The inquiry then arises, What is the result? It appears to me apparent that the plaintiff must, at least after the expiration of the four months, be permitted to recover, as upon a quantum meruit pro rata, for the services rendered. Common justice requires this, and I should be sorry to find that it was not tolerated by the principles of the common law. To hold, in a case like this, where the plaintiff has been discharged of his contract by the act of God, that there can be no apportionment, upon the technical ground that the contract is entire and its performance a condition precedent, is, to my mind, leaving the substance, and adhering to the shadow. If the plaintiff is relieved from the contract, how can the defendant interpose it as a reason why the plaintiff should not recover for the labor actually performed, though performed under the contract and while it was in force? Suppose a minor was to contract to labor for another for a given time and for a given sum, could he not at any time repudiate the contract, and recover for such services as he might have rendered?"

In Seaver v. Morse, 20 Vt. 620, the above case was cited as an authority for the doctrine that recovery may, under the circumstances in question, be had pro rata on a 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In Vermont it has been laid down that the servant is not entitled to prosecute his remedy by way of a suit on a quantum meruit until the time when he would have been entitled to receive the stipulated wages, if he had remained in the employment until the expiration of the agreed term.⁶ This consequence is unavoidable if it be assumed that the contract may properly be treated as an existent and controlling factor. But obviously it cannot be predicated if the contract is regarded as being wholly discharged; and this, it is submitted, is the correct view of the juridical situation.⁷

Whatever theory may be adopted regarding the nature of the servant's remedial rights, there is manifestly no ground upon which a right of action can be predicated in a case where his disability supervened before he had performed any service under his contract.⁸

Where a servant has died after a period of sickness, it is evident that, if the effect of his absence from work upon the ability of contract to be "apportioned" It was also followed in Hubbard v. Belden, 27 Vt. 645. See note 11, infra.

In Patrick v. Putnam, 27 Vt. 759, the same doctrine applied in the above cases was again applied, but a counterclaim for damages was allowed.

⁶ Tebo v. Ballard, 36 Vt. 612. The court said: "Without entering upon any discussion of the cases involving the subject of the right to recover compensation for the work actually performed under such contracts as this, when the party engaged to do the service fails to complete the stipulated term of service, it is quite obvious that the other party ought not to be subjected to any greater disadvantage than is involved in the loss of service for the residue of the term. In contracts of this kind, where there is no time stipulated when payment for service is to be made, the law implies that it is to be made at the end of the term. If, in this case, the boy had continued in the service of the defendant, no duty of payment, and no right to demand or sue for the payment, would have accrued till the expiration of the term. Because he found occasion, in his temporary misfortune, to cease from service without performing the contract, we think it would be difficult to assign a reason why he should thereby be invested with the right to demand and sue for his pay at an earlier day than he would have had if he had performed his part of the contract."

⁷ In Ryan v. Dayton, 25 Conn. 188, 65 Am. Dec. 560, it was held that the servant's right of action accrues immediately.

his personal representatives to recover compensation in respect to that period is considered merely with reference to the right of the master to rescind, they will be entitled to recover if he refrained from exercising that right.⁹ This rule is obviously applicable whatever may have been the duration of the incapacity, and the nature of the bodily or mental conditions by which it was produced. But with reference to the doctrine that permanent incapacitation produces of itself an actual dissolution of the contract, it has been held that, in the case of a mortal sickness, such a dissolution takes effect at the beginning of the sickness, even though in its earlier stages it may have been regarded both by the servant and his physician as merely temporary. In this point of view it is clear that no wages would accrue during the sickness. But the doctrine is one of questionable soundness.

In a case where the wages are payable in instalments, the servant is clearly entitled to recover such instalments as were already due and payable when he was incapacitated from work.¹⁰

2. Dismissal by master.

In cases where the physical incapacity of the servant is so serious or so prolonged as to justify the master in terminating the employment, and it is terminated by him on that ground, the amount recoverable will be computed on the same footing as in cases where the servant himself abandoned the contract.¹¹ But manifestly no compensation could be recovered in respect of the residue of the term.¹²

If the physical incapacity of the servant was not of such severity or duration as to justify the master in terminating the contract, the remedial rights of the former are, of course, similar to those predicated in cases of wrongful dismissal.

3. Servant released from engagement.

Where a servant, after having been incapacitated for some time by sickness, is released from his engagement, he is entitled to recover on a quantum meruit for the value of the work performed by him.¹³

b. Doctrine of the maritime law.

By the maritime law the wages of a seaman for the whole voyage are recoverable, where he is permanently disabled by sickness or injury.¹⁴

¹¹ In Hubbard v. Belden, 27 Vt. 645, a farm hand hired for six months was entirely disabled for about one week by an injury. After that he was able to do light work, but did not recover his full capacity for about six months. On account of the severity of his injury and the remoteness of the prospect of his recovery, the defendant had hired a substitute. Held (citing Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 557), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover remuneration to the extent of the benefits derived by the defendant from the partial performance.

Div. 184, 82 N. Y. Supp. 494, affirmed in 178 N. Y. 637, 71 N. E. 1133, the plaintiff was hired as a salesman for a term of five years beginning in May, 1898. In July, 1898, the defendant made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but the plaintiff continued, at the request of the defendant, to work, at a lower salary, for the assignee as long as the business remained under his control. In August, 1899, the defendant was again given control of the business, and discharged the plaintiff in February, 1901. The plaintiff had been absent, by reason of sickness, for two weeks before his discharge, and for another period of two or three weeks within the preceding six months. Held, that the plaintiff, since he had not shown either a substantial performance of his contract or a condonation by the defendant of defective performance, could not recover damages on account of his discharge.

The rule laid down in Chandler v. Grieves, supra, was adopted in Walton v. Neptune, 1 Pet. Adm. 152, Fed. Cas. No. 17,135; Ex parte Giddings, 2 Gall. 56, Fed. Cas. No. 5,404.

II. Performance temporarily interrupted by reason of the physical disability of the servant.

a. Doctrine of common-law courts.

1. Servant's rights in respect of work actually done.

In order to entitle a servant to recover compensation under an entire contract, he must show that he had substantially performed his part of the agreement. But he need not prove that his health was such during the whole of his term, as to enable him to devote all his time actively to his employer.¹ This rule is applicable whatever may be the length of the period during which he was incapacitated from work. The most that the master can demand is that some allowance should be made on account of the absence of the servant.

A servant who resumes work after having been temporarily disabled by sickness is entitled to recover a proportionable part of the stipulated wages in respect of the services rendered by him before he fell sick.²

2. Servant's rights in respect of the period during which he was disabled.

In some of the older English text-books and decisions, it is laid down that if the servant falls sick, or is otherwise disabled by the act of God, the master must not abate any part of his wages for the time during which he was incapacitated.³ But the later authorities show that this doctrine is subject to some limitations, the precise extent of which has not yet been determined with precision.

(1) One limitation is obviously necessitated by the rule which empowers the master to rescind the contract, in some instances, on account of the servant's disability, even when it is merely temporary. A statement which takes due account of that rule will assume something like this form: A servant temporarily prevented by sickness or injury from discharging his duties is entitled to recover his wages for the period during which his disability continued, unless his physical condition was such as to justify the master in dismissing or suspending him, and he was, as a matter of fact, dismissed or suspended.⁴

(2) It would seem necessary to predicate a special limitation as regards cases where the duration of the disability is considerably larger than the period for which the parties are bound by the contract. It is difficult to suppose that a court would hold that, if a servant hired by the week has

In one case Lord Mansfield observed that the master "cannot deduct wages in proportion to the continuance of the servant's sickness." R. v. Christchurch, Burr. Sett. Cas. 494.

⁴ In Cuckson v. Stones, 1 El. & El. 248, plaintiff agreed to serve the defendant for the term of ten years in the capacity of a brewer. In consideration of the premises, and of the due, full, and complete service of the plaintiff, the defendant agreed to pay him £20 on execution of the agreement, to furnish him with a house and coal during the whole of the term of ten years, and to pay him the weekly sum of £2 10s during the term. Some years after entering the service, the plaintiff fell ill, and was confined to his room for about six months. His wages were paid for about three months, and then suspended. After he was able to attend again personally to business, he was paid as before under the agreement. To an action by the plaintiff to recover wages for the period during which he had been ill, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not, during any part of the time for which such wages were claimed, ready and willing or able to render, and did not in fact during any part of such time render, the agreed or any service. On showing cause against a rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff on the plea, it was held that the averment that the plaintiff was not ready and willing or able was not supported by his physical inability, for a time only, and not through his own default, to attend personally to the business; and that, the contract not having been rescinded, the defendant was not entitled to suspend the weekly payments during that time; and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to the verdict. Lord Campbell, Ch. J., said: "[The plaintiff] could not be considered incompetent by illness of a temporary nature; but if he had been struck with disease so that he could never be expected to return to his work, we think the defendant ought to have dismissed him, and employed another brewer in his stead. Instead of being dismissed, he returned to the service of the defendant when his health was restored, and the defendant employed him and paid him as before. At the trial, the defendant's counsel admitted that the contract was not rescinded. The contract being in force, we think that here there was no suspension of the weekly payments by reason of the plaintiff's illness and inability to work. It is allowed that, under this contract, there could be no deduction from the weekly sum in respect of his having been disabled by illness from working for one day of the week; and while the contract remained in force, we see no difference between his being so disabled for a day, or a week, or a month."

been disabled for several weeks, the master will be bound to pay him the wages for the whole of that period unless he has been formally dismissed or suspended. But the writer has not found any decisions which furnish any explicit information concerning this phase of the subject. Having regard to the actual facts which they involve, the first two cases cited under the next paragraph might be viewed as pointing, more or less distinctly, to the existence of a rule which will preclude recovery under the circumstances mentioned. But this, as will be seen, was not the ratio decidendi in either case.

(3) A third limitation is that which was admitted in two cases which proceeded upon the ground that employees hired by the week or any shorter time are not entitled to compensation for periods during which they are disabled.⁵ The soundness of this qualification, however, in so far as the courts may have intended to propound it as one of general application, seems to be very questionable. The conception of the servant's rights which it represents is inconsistent with that which is exemplified by another decision which was based upon the theory that the wages of an employee hired by the week should be disallowed or allowed, in respect of a period of disability, according as he is or is not engaged in one of those kinds of work which are commonly described as "manual."⁶

But the decision is itself not entirely satisfactory, if it imports an adoption of the broad position that the question of the master's liability or nonliability can be solved in every instance by the test suggested. The character of the work, it is apprehended, is simply one of the elements to be considered in determining that question. All that can warrantably be asserted in this connection is that the payment of wages in respect of periods of disability is by usage much less common in the case of servants who are, than in the case of servants who are not, engaged in manual work.

(4) Another limitation is indicated by a decision to the effect that, if the servant's disability is so prolonged that his master's interests will suffer unless someone else is

This decision was followed in Warren v. Whittingham, 18 Times L. R. 508 (plaintiff, who had covenanted to devote the whole of his time to his employer's business, was absent for ten weeks).

For other cases in which the doctrine that wages may be recovered in respect of a period during which the servant was temporarily unable to work, see Dartmouth Ferry Commission v. Marks, 34 Can. S. C. 366 (arguendo); Goode v. Downing, 5 Terr. L. R. 505 (bartender hired by the month was absent for five days).

In Hughes v. Toledo Scale & Cash Register Co. 112 Mo. App. 91, 86 S. W. 895, it was laid down broadly, without any special reference to the length of the absence from work in the given instance (six weeks out of a term of one year), that a person hired for a definite period is not entitled to recover wages for the time during which he is sick and unable to fulfil his contract. The general rule thus formulated was clearly opposed to the weight of authority. The case upon which the court relied, Patrick v. Putnam, 27 Vt. 759, was one in which plaintiff had left altogether after working thirty days out of the year for which he was hired, and was therefore not in point.

For cases embodying the rule that, until some action has been taken by the authorities, the right of a public officer to his salary is not affected by his permitted absence on account of sickness, see O'Leary v. Board of Education, 93 N. Y. 1, 45 Am. Rep. 156, reversing 9 Daly, 161; Devlin v. New York, 41 Hun, 281.

to be paid for the period during which he is incapacitated from working. Freundlich's Case, cited in 33 Fed. 701, followed in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 41 Fed. 319.

⁵ In a Canadian case, where the foreman of a shop hired by the week had been disabled for several weeks, it was laid down that there is no rule of law to the effect that a servant engaged by the week or day is entitled to wages during absence through illness. Miller v. Morton, 8 Manitoba L. Rep. 1. This statement was made with reference to a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant by a trial judge sitting without a jury. No cases were cited by the court in its very brief judgment.

In Adlets v. Progressive Shoe Co. 84 Mo. App. 288, where a salesman in a store hired by the week had been sick for five months, the court proceeded upon the doctrine that the employment of the plaintiff contemplated actual services, and that, as he was unable by reason of sickness to render these, he was not entitled to compensation.

⁶ In Mott v. Baxter, 13 Colo. App. 63, 56 Pac. 192, it was laid down that, in the absence of proof of an agreement to that effect, it will not be presumed, in an action for wages by a stenographer hired at fixed sum per week, that she was to lose her wages for the time she was necessarily absent on account of sickness. The court observed that a deduction from wages on account of sickness is not customary in the case of employees performing clerical work. The length of the period of absence is not stated. Presumably it was short, as the deduction claimed is referred to as a "small item."

hired to perform his duties, the master may engage a substitute, and deduct the sum required for his remuneration from the wages of the disabled servant.⁷

In view of the uncertain effect of the authorities regarding the extent of the obligation of the master to pay remuneration in respect of periods of disability, in cases where the obligatory term of the contract is short, the practical conclusion to be drawn is that a master who finds that a servant is disabled by a sickness or injury so serious that it is likely to continue for a considerable period ought, if he desires to secure himself from liability, to exercise the right of dismissal, which under such circumstances he undoubtedly possesses.

Where the contract is terminable by notice, and notice is given after the servant is disabled, he is entitled to recover the wages accruing to the date when the period of notice expires,⁸ but the master's liability does not extend any further.⁹

A master who has settled with a servant without keeping back any of his wages on account of time lost by reason of his physical incapacity is precluded from afterwards asserting any right which he might otherwise have possessed in the premises to make a deduction on that ground.¹⁰ On the other hand, a servant may by his own pleadings estop himself from asserting any rights which he might otherwise have possessed in the premises.¹¹

If it is a general rule of the given employment that an employee is only to be paid for the actual time that he is on duty, it is manifest that the sole question to be determined in an action for wages in respect of a period of incapacity is whether he had notice of the rule.¹²

It has been held in England that a work-

⁷ Hunter v. Waldron, 7 Ala. 756. There the plaintiff, who had been hired as overseer of a plantation for a year, had been incapacitated by sickness—on one occasion for four weeks, on another for two weeks. The court said: "The fair mode of adjusting compensation in such case is to allow a deduction to the defendant for any loss he may have sustained in consequence of the plaintiff's illness, and pay him the remainder of the sum agreed for the year." It was held to be error to give an instruction which would lead the jury to suppose that a deduction in respect of the period of absence could be made only by virtue of an express agreement; that, in the absence of a contract, the law gives the master the right to recoup damages for that period; and that the burden lies on the servant to show that he is entitled to be paid for that period. The broad language thus used is presumably to be construed with relation to the facts involved. It can hardly be supposed that the court intended to repudiate the original doctrine of the common law, as stated at the beginning of this section, and to substitute, as applicable to all cases, a converse theory to the effect that the master is prima facie entitled to deduct from the servant's wages a sum proportioned to the time lost by reason of his sickness. Such a theory would, it is submitted, be opposed to the general current of the authorities.

¹⁰ Prussing Vinegar Co. v. Meyer, 26 Ill. App. 564. There the evidence shows that during the plaintiff's sickness it was the defendant's intention to pay him his salary without deduction; that it was in pursuance of such intention that the credits proved were given, and the balance of the current salary paid in full, and that it was not until the time of the plaintiff's discharge that the defendant conceived the idea of charging back to him the amount of his salary during his sickness, and of claiming on this ground a set-off in an action on a promissory note given to the servant.

In Dickinson v. Norwegian Plow Co. 101 Wis. 157, 76 N. W. 1108, the defendant had kept no record of the time lost on account of sickness by a servant he employed by the year, and made no charge against him therefor, but at the end of each year settled with him and paid him the balance due. On a final settlement the employer sought only to retain a certain sum by which he claimed the salary for the last year had been reduced. The court, citing the above decision, held that he thereby waived any claim for said loss of time.

¹¹ In Nichols v. Coolahan, 10 Met. 449, a contract was made by N. and C. that N. should have $11 per month and board so long as he should work for C.; C. informing N. that he (C.) might not have two days' work for him. N. worked for C. several months, and brought an action for his wages, and annexed to his writ a bill of particulars, in which he charged the price agreed on per month, and gave C. credit for a certain sum on account of three weeks' sickness of N., during which time he was unable to work. C. filed in offset an account against N. for board during his sickness. Held, that the contract was a hiring by the month; that C. was not entitled to payment for N.'s board during his sickness; but that N. could not recover wages during any part of the time of his detention from work by sickness.

man engaged at a weekly salary, who has claimed and received compensation under the workmen's compensation act of 1897 in respect of partial incapacity for work resulting from injury received by him during the course of his employment, is not entitled to claim his wages during the time for which he has been incapacitated.¹³ But this decision merely embodies the conclusion of the court with regard to the effect of the statute in question. It is not to be regarded as enouncing a general rule applicable to every case in which the servant has been indemnified by his master for a disabling injury. As a claim based on the obligation of the master to pay the stipulated wages, and a claim for indemnity for an injury received in the course of the employment, constitute independent and distinct causes of action, it seems clear that, apart from the operation of some statute, the satisfaction of a claim of the latter description is not a bar to an action for wages.

3. Servant not bound to make up for lost time.

A servant whose contract covers a definite term is under no obligation to continue working after the expiration of the term, in order to make up for time lost by reason of illness or conditions of the weather which rendered it impracticable to perform his duties.¹⁴

4. Servant's rights as affected by specific stipulations.

In order to protect the employer against the possible damage which may be caused by the unexpected absence of a disabled servant, it is sometimes stipulated in the contract of hiring that a certain amount of wages shall be forfeited by any servant who fails to give notice of his disability.¹⁵ By a more uncommon description of agreement, resorted to only in those employments which demand an unusually high degree of physical efficiency, the master reserves the right of suspending the servant for a definite period, if he fails to keep himself in the sound condition required for the satisfactory performance of the given work. Such stipulations are valid, and from the time when the right of suspension is exercised the master's obligation to pay the agreed compensation ceases, either partly or entirely, according as it may be provided in the contract.¹⁶ court, this aspect of the case was not discussed, the decision being put upon another ground.

¹⁴ Rickard v. Couto, 5 Haw. 507.

In Corsi v. Maretzek, 4 E. D. Smith, 1, where the plaintiff, a singer, had stipulated to conform strictly to the regulations of the opera company "commonly in use," it was held that, as a condition to his right of salary, he was bound, in case of anticipated indisposition, to give notice thereof to the director on or before 1 o'clock on the day of performance, evidence having been adduced establishing the existence of a general regulation to that effect in this and similar establishments. The contract also provided for forfeiture of a month's salary in case the plaintiff should fail to attend at any stated performance, except in the event of sickness certified to by a doctor to be appointed by the director. Held, that the provision was binding upon the plaintiff, although the person appointed by the director was a homeopathic practitioner. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The court said: "The fact of the plaintiff's nonattendance at the concert in question having been proved, it rested with him to show by Dr. Quin that he was incapable of attending from sickness. He was either required to do this, or prove that he had in due time notified the doctor or the manager of his illness. He offered no such testimony; but, having shown that Dr. Quin practised upon principles of homeopathy, he insisted that he was not a doctor, and that, the defendant having failed to appoint a doctor, he was at liberty to show by general testimony that he was ill upon the night in question. . . . By the terms of the contract, the selection of the doctor was left entirely to the defendant, and it was for him to judge of the fitness or capacity of the person to be selected. All that he was required to do, in the fair interpretation of the contract, was to appoint a person who made it his business to practise physic, and it was wholly immaterial to what school of medicine the person so selected belonged, or whether he belonged to any. The legal significance of the term 'doctor,' when employed as it is in this contract, means simply a practitioner of physic. The system pursued by the practitioner is immaterial. The law has nothing to do with the merits of particular systems."

¹⁶ In Russell v. National Exhibition Co. 60 App. Div. 40, 69 N. Y. Supp. 732, the plaintiff was engaged to play baseball, under a contract which authorized his discharge without pay for a definite period for lack of sound physical condition, and required him to keep himself in the best physical condition to play ball during the

Where one of the regulations of a friendly society which a servant has joined in compliance with the rules of his employer explicitly provides that he shall be entitled to sick pay during sickness, but not while receiving wages from his employer, he clearly cannot recover any wages in respect of a period during which he was in receipt of the sick pay.¹⁷

5. Effect of specific statutory provisions.

An employer who, when sued for wages alleged to be payable in respect of a period of sickness, seeks to escape liability on the ground of the claims being barred by a regulation made by an executive official in pursuance of the terms of a statute, must, of course, show that the regulation in question was authorized by the statute relied upon.¹⁸ playing season, providing that, if he failed to do so, the defendant might, on reasonable notice, deduct from the amount due or to become due a proportional part of plaintiff's consideration while his disability continued. In an action by the plaintiff for his salary, after he had been suspended under the stipulation, it was held that an instruction stating that a discussion of plaintiff's condition was not necessary because plaintiff was entitled either to a cancellation of his contract or to suspension for a definite period was erroneous as eliminating a proper defense, since plaintiff's physical condition was an essential element of the contract. It was also held that a notice that plaintiff was suspended without pay until he was in a fit condition to play according to his contract constituted a suspension for a definite period, within the meaning of the contract, since it was as definite as the cause assigned for suspension would permit.

b. Doctrine in civil-law jurisdictions.

1. Scotland.

The Scotch decisions are obscure and conflicting, and possibly different rules are applicable, according as the servant's incapacity was due to sickness or to injuries received in the course of his employment.

With regard to the former description of incapacity, it is laid down by the older authorities that a servant who is hired for a fixed period is entitled to his full wages, though he should by sickness be disabled from his service for a part of that time.¹ This broad doctrine, however, has not been accepted by all the authorities.² The only reported decision which bears on the subject is one in which a farmer was held not to be entitled to deduct any part of the wages of a servant hired for a year, on account of his having been disabled from work by sickness purporting to be made in pursuance of this section provided that "no employer of any time-expired islander shall be required to pay the wages of any such islander during sickness." In a proceeding by a time-expired islander to recover a sum deducted from his wages for a period during which he was sick, it was held (affirming the decision of the Queensland supreme court) that this regulation did not fall within the enabling words of § 47 of the act, and was consequently ineffective to exclude the operation of the common law in the case of such agreements as were made in the statutory form. Accordingly, as the written agreement for service contained no stipulation regarding such a deduction, the respondent was held to be entitled to recover. The court expressed its inability to see how the power to make regulations could be treated as authorizing regulations which altered the law regarding the obligations of masters and servants under agreements drawn up in the form prescribed by the statute.

² In Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, § 179, it is laid down that sickness will excuse nonperformance for a short time, but that, if the inability should continue long, and a substitute should be required, the master will be discharged from his counter obligation to pay wages.

This also is the opinion of Pothier, who says (Louage, art. 168) that when a servant hired for a year, month, or other fixed period is disabled by sickness for any considerable portion of the term, the master is entitled to deduct a proportionate part of his wages; but that, if the indisposition is slight, and only prevents the servant from working for a few days in the year, no deduction can be made. See Fraser, Mast. & S. p. 141.

during eleven weeks of that period.³ We also find a judicial expression of opinion, which is relevant in this connection in a dictum that "it was shameful in any master to say that he was entitled to compensation for a period of sickness during which his servant was incapacitated from labor."⁴ According to Lord Fraser (Master and Servant, p. 142), this statement cannot be taken, and was possibly not intended, as a general statement of legal doctrine. But one of the judges of the court of sessions has declined to indorse this criticism.⁵

Apparently the only conclusion that can be drawn from this curiously nebulous body of authorities is that a servant has ordinarily no right to be paid wages for time during which he was not fulfilling his part of the contract, the only exception to this rule being predicated where the disability is of a very short duration in proportion to the period of hiring.⁶

With regard to the effect of injuries received by a servant in the course of his employment, it is laid down in one text-book that a disability arising from this cause will excuse his nonperformance of the contract, and will not entail a forfeiture of his wages for the period of incapacity.⁷ In another treatise it is stated broadly that "if a man be disabled in the course of his service, and in consequence of doing his duty, as where a groom is kicked by his master's horse, he is entitled to full wages till the covenanted issue of the service, however remote."⁸

In the opinion of Lord Fraser, this doctrine, in so far as it draws a distinction between sickness caused by hurts received in the master's service, and sickness caused by other accidents, is contrary to principle. His conclusions are summed up in the following passage (Mast. & S. p. 141); "If an injury occurring to a servant in the discharge of his duty can be imputed to the recklessness or negligence of his master, then the servant's true remedy is an action for damages. On the other hand, if the injury is due to pure accident, there seems no reason why the master should be required to make compensation therefor. As wages are the counterpart for service given, and none is given, it is not only hard on the master, but not reconcilable with the law of contract, that he should be obliged to pay just the same as if the contract were fulfilled. It is thought that the better rule is that a servant disabled without fault on his part, and without fault on the part of the master, has no claim for wages during disablement, though this may have been caused by injury sustained when in the performance of his work."

2. Louisiana.

In this state the doctrine applied in the case of overseers of plantations, who are nominally engaged by the year, is similar to that which has been adopted in common-law jurisdictions. Protracted sickness is deemed to be a sufficient cause for discharging them. But until an overseer has been discharged, his wages continue to accrue, unless the contrary has been stipulated.⁹ Presumably a like rule prevails with regard to other classes of servants hired for a fixed period, and remunerated in money. If a servant whose remuneration is to consist of a share of the crop raised by him is discharged on account of long-continued sickness, the master is required to pay him a proportionable part of the value of the crops for the time during which he has actually been employed.¹⁰

3. Quebec.

Apparently the only reported case directly in point is one in which it was held that a servant hired by the month, who abandons his employment on account of sickness while one of the months is still incomplete, is entitled to his wages for the time during which he has worked.¹¹ In another case the question whether the employer was liable for a portion of the servant's wages which had been kept back during a long period of disability was alluded to, but not determined.¹²

³ White v. Baillie (1794) Morr. 10147. In his treatise on Master and Servant (p. 142), Lord Fraser asserts that this case is not of high authority, as it appears to have been decided on its own circumstances, and "without laying down any general rule on the subject."

III. Effect of physical disability considered with reference to circumstances importing fault on the servant's part.

a. Disability anticipated when contract was made.

It has been held that no recovery in respect of the services actually rendered can be had in a case where the disability by which complete performance was prevented was of such a nature that the servant must necessarily have foreseen that it would accrue before the end of the period covered by the contract.¹³

But the mere fact that a disease which temporarily rendered the servant incapable of discharging his duties had been contracted before he was hired will not preclude him from claiming compensation for the period of incapacity, unless it is shown that he was aware, at the time of the hiring, that the effect of the disease would be to incapacitate him.¹⁴

b. Disability caused by injury sustained by reason of the servant's own negligence.

The writer has not found any decisions by courts of common law which show to what extent a servant's remedial rights are affected by the circumstance that his disability was due to his own negligence. The few authorities which bear upon the point are cited in the note below.¹⁵

IV. Duty of servant to resume work after removal of his disability.

One of the general rules of the law of contracts is that, whenever any special matter does not operate to annul a contract, but only to suspend performance temporarily, it is the duty of the obligor to resume performance after the cause of the suspension has been removed.¹ Ordinarily, therefore, a servant who has been compelled by physical incapacity to discontinue his work is bound, after the removal of that incapacity, to return to his master and complete the stipulated services. Unless this duty is fulfilled, he will stand, in respect to the recovery of compensation, in the position of one who has wrongfully abandoned the contract. But this consequence is not predicable where ill health constituted, under the express terms of the contract, a sufficient ground for terminating it;² nor where his sickness was of such severity, and its duration a matter of such uncertainty, that his master was justified in refusing to await his recovery, and in engaging a substitute;³ nor where the servant's capacity for work was which the superintendent was president. The plaintiff acquiesced in this arrangement as long as he was on the force. It also appeared that constables are subject to a stoppage of part of their pay if the superintendent thinks proper to make such deduction. Held, that plaintiff had no action against the benefit society for the money deducted from his pay, and that his remedy, if any, would be against the city for non-payment of his full wages.

¹³In Jennings v. Lyons, 39 Wis. 553, 20 Am. Rep. 57, the plaintiff agreed that he and his wife should work for the defendant, a farmer, for one year for a lump sum. The wife was pregnant at the time when the contract was made, and, after working about four months, left the employment in anticipation of her confinement. Both the plaintiff and his wife were then discharged, and about six weeks afterwards her child was born. Held, that the nonperformance of the contract was not excused by a sickness of this character, and that no action on a quantum meruit could be maintained.

¹⁵In a Scotch case it was held that a servant hired for a year, who, through his own recklessness, receives in the course of his employment an injury which disables him from work, is not entitled to recover his wages for the remainder of the term of service. M'Ewan v. Malcolm (1867) 5 Scot. L. R. 62; Fraser, Mast & S. p. 140.

In § 160 of the English merchant shipping act of 1894 (§ 8 of the act of 1854), it is provided that a seaman disabled by sickness which was due to his own fault is not entitled to full wages.

In Johnson v. Huckins, 1 Sprague, 67, Fed. Cas. No. 7,390, the court proceeded upon the assumption that this was the rule of admiralty law.

But under the doctrine applied in two more recent cases, a seaman disabled in the service of the ship during a voyage is entitled to wages for the remainder of the voyage after he is removed to a hospital on shore, whether he is injured by the negligence of the officers or crew or through his own contributory negligence. The City of Alexandria, 17 Fed. 390; The Governor Ames, 55 Fed. 327.

²*Seaver v. Morse*, 20 Vt. 620, where it was stipulated that the contract might be terminated if either party should become dissatisfied, provided that, when the cause of dissatisfaction was made known, it could not be removed. The position of the court was that it clearly would not be in the power of the master to "remove the cause" if sickness should be the ground of dissatisfaction.

not restored until after the expiration of the agreed term;⁴ nor where, having regard to the circumstances, the portion of his wages to which he would have been entitled, under his contract, for the work done after returning, would not have constituted a fair remuneration;⁵ nor where his master refused his offer to resume the performance of his duties, unless he would assent to a condition which it was unwarrantable to impose;⁶ nor where, after his sickness began, he requested and obtained from his master a conditional release from his obligations, and the circumstances under which it was to be subject to revocation have not supervened;⁷ nor where the master has so acted as to be chargeable with a waiver of any claim, which he might otherwise have had, to forfeit the wages.⁸

The wrongful refusal of the master to allow the servant to resume work after his recovery will justify the servant in treating the contract as rescinded, and claiming the reasonable value of his services.⁹

V. Master's right of recoupment for damage caused by servant's death or disability.

In one case the court in its argument took it for granted that the compensation found to be recoverable in respect of work performed by a deceased employee should be reduced to the extent of the damages sustained by the employer in consequence of the loss of profits which would have accrued to him through the services of the employee, if they had not been interrupted by the death of the latter.¹ There is also authority for the doctrine that the master is entitled to deduct from the wages of a servant who has been unable, by reason of physical incapacity, to attend to his duties for a portion of the stipulated term, the damages caused by his imperfect performance of the contract.²

⁴ Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 557. The court said: "His services were of a personal character, and the time of performance material to the rights of the parties. The defendant could not be required to accept of the services at another time, and the plaintiff was as much excused from their performance by reason of his sickness as he would have been in case of death; and the contract being annulled by this act of God, and not simply suspended for a time, there is no reason why the plaintiff should have proffered to work for the defendant after being restored to health. Such proffer the defendant might have rejected, and it could have had no possible effect upon the rights of the parties upon what was already past."

⁶ Fahy v. North, 19 Barb. 341. There the condition deemed to be unjustifiable was that the servant should agree to pay a certain sum as damages for the time lost by his sickness. In some states this condition would be deemed valid.

question in the case was whether a person who contracts to labor for a definite time, and "fails to fulfil his contract by reason of sickness, is liable to have the amount of his recovery reduced by the damages sustained by the employer in consequence of his not being able to complete the full term of service," proceeded as follows: "It is certain that in most analogous cases, where one is allowed to recover for part performance of an entire contract, unless hindered in the performance of his contract by the other party, . . . he is liable to such deduction. He is allowed to recover only what his services have benefited the other party, as compared with full performance. The other party is not liable to divide the loss sustained by the innocent misfortune even of the plaintiff. This is so held in the case of clearing land, building wall and other erections upon the land of the employer, as decided in the cases cited in argument. So, too, an infant even, who is of course not bound to full performance of his contract, and who may abandon it at any time, and recover upon a quantum meruit, is still held liable to have deducted from his wages any damages his employer may have sustained in consequence of not serving the full term stipulated. Thomas v. Dike, 11 Vt. 273, 34 Am. Dec. 690, and subsequent cases." Reliance was also placed upon the following remarks of Bennett, J., in Fenton v. Clark, 11 Vt. 557: "It is not the object of the law to punish the party for a violation of his contract, but to make the other party good for all damages he may sustain by such violation. Common justice required that the plaintiff should have been permitted to recover so much as the defendant had been benefited by the labor, after deducting any damages he may have sustained by reason of the violation of the contract." Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff in accordance with the report submitted by a referee to the effect that, in consequence of the defendant's being unable to hire another hand at as low a rate of wages after the plaintiff left, as he could have done at the time when the plaintiff was hired, his damages from the nonperformance of the contract were more than the amount claimed by the plaintiff.

But a doctrine which involves the acceptance of the theory that a person may be liable in a positive sense for a loss which, ex hypothesi, has been sustained without any fault on his part, seems to be so essentially inconsistent with the fundamental principles by which juridical responsibility is determined, that its soundness may be regarded as highly questionable, to say the least.³ With all deference to the authority of the courts which consider that the employer should be allowed to recoup damages, the writer ventures to suggest that the most that he can reasonably demand is that, in computing the amount recoverable, regard should be had to the average value of the given services during the whole of the term, so that his liability may be adjusted on such a footing as will prevent the employee or his personal representatives from deriving any actual advantage from the interruption or suspension of the work.⁴

In Hunter v. Waldron, 7 Ala. 753, and Wilson v. Smith, 111 Ala. 170, 20 So. 134, the master is said to have a right to "recoup damages" on account of loss caused by the servant's absence. But possibly the court merely meant that a deduction proportioned to the length of the absence might be made from his wages.

³ It will be observed that in the Vermont case cited in note 2, supra, Chief Justice Redfield made no attempt to cope with the difficulty created by the consideration that his doctrine operated so as to attack the consequences of culpability to an extent wholly beyond the control of the employee. But apart from the general consideration, his reasoning appears to be in some respects extremely unsatisfactory. He laid much stress upon the analogy of the rule applied in cases where an entire independent contract is not fully performed, owing to the innocent misfortune of the contractor. This rule, it is submitted, is wholly irrelevant in determining the reciprocal rights and liabilities of master and servant in the present connection. Those rights and liabilities are an outcome of the peculiar incidents of the relationship created by a contract of hiring, and must always be considered with due reference to the original doctrine, which rendered the master responsible for the full amount of the servant's wages, whatever the duration of his disability. Moreover, the rule relied upon has, it is apprehended, never been so construed as to charge the contractor with any liability other than the loss of the remuneration which his misfortune has prevented him from earning. The other rule adverted to by the chief justice, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

viz., that applied in cases where a minor abandons his employment, is equally irrelevant. Between cases in which nonperformance is caused by vis major, and those in which nonperformance results from the voluntary act of the defaulting party, there is such a fundamental difference that it is unjustifiable to argue, by way of analogy, from one class of cases to the other. In the one instance there is no element of culpability involved. In the other the essence of the juridical situation is that, although there is culpability involved, the policy of the law with regard to the protection of minors operates so as to qualify the consequences which, when adults are concerned, result from a breach of such contracts as those now in question.

⁴ In McLellan v. Harris, 7 S. D. 447, 64 N. W. 522, it was explicitly laid down that the administrator of a deceased servant is "entitled to recover for his services upon a quantum meruit without recoupment."

ELIAS DUNCAN.

(80 Kan. 196, 101 Pac. 992.)

Estoppel — theory advanced on former trial.

1. Where a demurrer to a petition is sustained and the case is thereupon dismissed without prejudice, at the request of the plaintiff, a theory of the law advanced by counsel for the defendant on the argument is not conclusive upon him in a subsequent action on the same matter between the same parties.

Same — assertion in prior action.

2. Where a litigant, as a part of his cause of action or defense, asserts that he is indebted to a third person not a party to the litigation, such assertion is not conclusive upon him when subsequently used by such person.

This note presupposes that a judicial admission is receivable as evidence against the party in a subsequent suit between him and a stranger, and simply presents the question whether in such suit such admission is conclusive against him.

For reasons sufficiently stated in FIRST NAT. BANK v. DUNCAN, the vast majority of cases have held or at least recognize that a judicial admission made by a

In Morgan v. Kinnard, 23 La. Ann. 645, it was held that a judicial admission in the defense to the payment of a note given for the price of land, that the defendant had no title, will not estop him from setting up title to the land as against one who had illegally secured possession of the land.

So, in Water Supply Co. v. Georgetown, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 327, 81 S. W. 660, where a water company, in an action between an individual and the city in regard to taking water from a spring, and in which the company was made a party, adopted the answer of the city, pleading prescription, it was held that such company was not thereby estopped from showing, in a subsequent suit between it and the city, a title independent of the grant from the city.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Elias Duncan executed two promissory notes, one payable June 1, 1905, the other June 1, 1906, secured by a real-estate mortgage which contained a clause providing that a failure to pay the first note promptly should render the other at once due. The first note was not paid at maturity. The First National Bank of Lincoln, Nebraska, purchased the second note between June 1, 1905, and June 1, 1906, and after the latter date brought action upon it, and, having failed to recover, now prosecutes error. Duncan pleaded matters constituting a sufficient defense against the original payee,

However, in Tennessee it seems to be held that a judicial admission is conclusive against the party even in a subsequent suit against him by a stranger. Stillman v. Stillman, 7 Baxt. 174; Watterson v. Lyons, 9 Lea, 566; Chilton v. Scruggs, 5 Lea, 308.

And this has been applied even as against a married woman. Cooley v. Steele, 2 Head, 605; Stephenson v. Walker, 8 Baxt. 289.

So, in McEwen v. Jenks, 6 Lea, 289, it was held that an admission under oath made in a deposition in a suit, although the deponent was not a party, operated as an estoppel in a subsequent suit. It does not appear in this case whether the parties in the subsequent suit and in whose favor the admission was made were strangers to the first suit.

But even in Tennessee, it has been held that where statements in pleadings are made inconsiderately or without due knowledge of the facts, the party making them will not be estopped. McLemore v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 111 Tenn. 639, 69 S. W. 338.

Conclusiveness of plea of guilty in subsequent civil action.

The rule that a judicial admission is not conclusive against the party in a subsequent suit brought by a stranger to the first suit has been frequently applied in cases where it was sought to hold as conclusive a plea of guilty in a criminal prosecution in a subsequent civil action. These cases, however, have uniformly held that a plea of guilty in a criminal prosecution is not conclusive against the defendant in a subsequent civil action. Risdon v. Yates, 145 Cal. 210, 78 Pac. 641; Young v. Copple, 52 Ill. App. 547; Rudolph v. Landwerlen, 92 Ind. 37; Hauser v. Griffith, 102 Iowa, 215, 71 N. W. 223; Crawford v. Fowler, 9 Ohio C. D. 209; Meyers v. Dillon, 39 Or. 581, 65 Pac. 867, 66 Pac. 874; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 449.

and maintained that the bank stood on no better footing, because it had acquired the second note after it had matured by virtue of the accelerating clause, through the non-payment of the first note. For present purposes this may be treated as the only issue that was tried, and the only question here presented is whether the pleadings filed or tendered by the bank alleged facts sufficient to preclude Duncan from denying its right to claim as an innocent purchaser.

The court refused to allow the bank to amend its reply during the trial by adding allegations, the substance of which may be thus stated: On October 25, 1905, the original payee sued Duncan on the first note, asking also a foreclosure of the mortgage. The bank intervened in the action and filed a cross petition asking a recovery on the note held by it. Duncan demurred to the cross petition on two grounds, namely, that the bank had no capacity to sue, and that sufficient facts were not stated to constitute a cause of action. At the hearing on the demurrer, Duncan's counsel argued that the note sued on by the bank was not due because the bank could not take advantage of the accelerating clause of the mortgage. The court sustained the demurrer without indicating upon what ground the ruling was based. The bank then asked an order, which was granted, dismissing the cross petition without prejudice to a future action. Apart from any question of discretion, no error was committed in refusing to allow the amendment, for the reason that its allegations were immaterial. They were offered on the theory that they showed that Duncan, in previous litigation with the bank, had derived an advantage from taking the position that the second note had not been matured in June, 1905, by the nonpayment of the first note; the argument being that he could not thereafter assert that the second note did become due at that time. The argument fails at several points. The allegations of the proffered amendment merely amount to this, that in the course of an argument in the earlier case an attorney for Duncan expressed the opinion that the bank could not avail itself of the accelerating clause of the mortgage,—a pure question of law. This is not enough in itself to estop Duncan from maintaining that the bank, having received the second note after a default in the payment of the first, was not a purchaser before maturity. Leavenworth Light & Heating Co. v. Waller, 65 Kan. 514, 70 Pac. 365. And it receives no aid from the other averments. No advantage is shown to have resulted to his client from the suggestion of the attorney. Nothing in the proposed amendment indicated that the demurrer was sustained on the theory so presented, or why it was sustained. Moreover, the ruling culminated in nothing. No judgment was rendered upon it. The case having been dismissed without prejudice, the bank could at any time have begun a new action in which it could have required the court to consider again every question presented. There was no adjudication against it at any point. Under the circumstances, the dismissal having been permitted, the ruling on the demurrer was of no more effect than an expression by the court of an opinion upon an abstract question,—an intimation of the kind of judgment it would be likely to render on the matter argued, should occasion therefor arise. The sustaining of the demurrer having been announced, the court might have refused to allow a dismissal and have entered a final judgment against the bank. Pugsley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 69 Kan. 599, 77 Pac. 579. In exercising its discretion in favor of permitting the case to be disposed of without a final judgment, it in effect vacated the ruling on the demurrer, and left the parties exactly where they were before the action was begun.

The court also sustained a demurrer to a portion of the bank's reply, of which the following is the substance: In the action already referred to, brought by the original payee on the first note, the petition alleged that the second note had been transferred to the bank before maturity. Duncan in his answer alleged that he had been damaged by breach of warranty and by fraud and deceit in connection with the transaction in which the notes were given. During the trial his attorneys, to enhance his damages, stated that the bank had bought the note before maturity, and argued to the jury that, for that reason, he would have to pay it. The court instructed the jury that the bank was an innocent holder of the note. These facts are relied upon as precluding Duncan from disputing the bank's claim to be an innocent holder of the note, both because the matter had been already adjudicated and on the ground of equitable estoppel. Neither phase of the contention is sound. The doctrine of res judicata cannot apply, for the parties were not the same in the two actions. Although the bank intervened in the first action, it afterward voluntarily withdrew from it. No principle of equity forbade Duncan to deny in the action brought by the bank what he had asserted in that brought by the original payee, to which it was not a party. No estoppel against Duncan can arise in favor of the bank on account of his conduct toward the payee, by which it was not affected. "If a record or judicial proceeding contains material declarations or admissions of a party to the same, it may be offered in evidence in behalf of one who was not a party; but it will not be conclusive against the party who made the declarations or admissions." Murphy v. Hindman, 58 Kan. 184, 48 Pac. 850. A number of cases to the same effect are collected in notes in 16 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1050, to which may be added Limerick v. Lee, 17 Okla. 165, 87 Pac. 859, and Com. v. Monongahela Bridge Co. 216 Pa. 108, 64 Atl. 909, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1073. In volume 2 of Wigmore on Evidence, § 1065, it is said: "The moment we leave the sphere of the same cause, we leave behind all questions of judicial admissions. A judicial admission is a waiver of proof (ante, § 1057); and a pleading is, for the purpose of the very cause itself, a defining of the lines of controversy, and a waiver of proof on all matters outside these lines of dispute. But this effect ceases with that litigation itself; and when we arrive at other litigation, and seek to resort to the parties' statements as embodied in the pleadings of prior litigations, we resort to them merely as quasi admissions, i. e., ordinary statements which now appear to tell against the party who then made them."

The principle involved is thus stated in Carradine v. Carradine, 33 Miss. 698: "Admissions made in the progress of a suit, as a substitute for proof of any material fact, or by pleading and setting forth particular facts as grounds of complaint or of defense, amount in law to estoppels; but they are only so as to the parties to the suit, and in the same suit in which they are made. It would be contrary to all principle to hold a party absolutely concluded by allegations which he had seen fit to make, or by grounds of defense which he thought fit to set up, in one suit, when he was afterwards sued by another party in an action involving the same matter. Such allegations or admissions are made with reference to the particular suit, and cannot operate as estoppels beyond it, because, as to strangers to it, there is no privity or mutuality; and as their rights are wholly unaffected by such allegations, admissions, or defenses, so must his rights as against them not be concluded thereby. It is a common thing for parties sued for the recovery of property to plead property in a stranger, and rely upon that as a defense, and successfully; but it was never heard of that the stranger brought his action against the defendant founded on that evidence alone, and the defendant was held to be estopped by it." The judgment is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

JOSEPH POWERS

v.

JAMES D. HOUGHTON et al., Plffs. in Err.

(159 Mich. 372, 123 N. W. 1108.)

Malicious prosecution — replevin — want of title.

One in possession of chattels without title cannot maintain an action for damages for malicious prosecution against one who wrongfully institutes a replevin action against him for them.

(December 30, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shiawassee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Albert L. Chandler, for plaintiffs in error:

The judgment for defendant in replevin includes defendant's damages for taking and detention of the replevied property and costs of suit.

Wells, Replevin, § 764; Cobbey, Replevin, § 1170; Drewyour v. Merrell, 112 Mich. 681, 71 N. W. 486.

Malice cannot be made from the fact that plaintiffs in replevin failed to get a verdict. 1 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. pp. 350, 352.

Mr. Samuel G. Houghton also for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Kilpatrick & Pierpont, with Mr. Odell Chapman, for defendant in error.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 6, 1905, defendants herein

Note. — Right of one having possession but no title to property to maintain an action for malicious prosecution for seizure of the property in an action against him.

In Cooley, Torts, at page 349, the statement is made that, in some cases, it has been held that an action may be maintained for the malicious prosecution, without probable cause, of any civil suit which has terminated in favor of the defendant, and a number of cases in support of this rule are cited. And the same author goes on to say that recently the question has been much litigated, and many learned opinions on the subject have been handed down, with the result that the preponderance of the authority seems now to be in favor of the right to maintain the action, and a large number of recent cases are cited as authority for this proposition. There is, however, much authority for the proposition that an sued out a writ of replevin against the plaintiff herein, before a justice of the peace for Shiawassee county, under which sixteen lambs were, by the officer, taken and turned over to defendants. That action resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff herein, and the lambs in question were returned to him, the costs were paid by defendants herein, and no appeal was taken. In December, 1906, plaintiff brought suit against defendants, in an action of trespass on the case, for malicious prosecution. Upon the trial, plaintiff herein testified that he had sold the lambs in question on October 3, 1905, to one Collister, receiving from Collister $5 upon the purchase price thereof. This was three days before the writ of replevin was issued. The lambs were taken from him under the writ, when he was in the act of delivering them to Collister. Plaintiff recovered a judgment, and defendants have sued out a writ of error.

We have, then, in the case at bar, this situation: The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the malicious prosecution of a civil action, by which he was deprived of neither his liberty, reputation, nor property, but simply of the possession of property belonging to another. Pollock, in his work on Torts, 8th ed., at page 316, states the rule as follows: "Generally speaking, it is not an actionable wrong to institute civil proceedings without reasonable and probable cause, even if malice be proved. For, in contemplation of law, the defendant who is unreasonably sued is sufficiently indemnified by a judgment in his favor, which gives him his costs against the plaintiff,"—citing Quartz Hill Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Eyre, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 674, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 488, where it said: "In the present day, and according to our present law, the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution." This is the English rule, which has been somewhat modified in America. In Cooley on Torts, 3d ed., at page 345, the rule is stated to be that "in some cases an action may be maintained for the malicious institution of a civil suit, but the authorities are not entirely agreed what cases are embraced within the rule." Among those malicious civil suits giving a right of action, he enumerates arrest, attachment, garnishment, insanity cases, injunctions, receivers, and other suits that interfere with person or property. Under the last class of cases, he says (page 348): "So a suit for malicious prosecution will lie where the plaintiff's property or business has been interfered with by the appointment of a receiver, the granting of an injunction, or by writ of replevin." As supporting the text touching writs of replevin, he cites Brounstein v. Sahlein, 65 Hun, 365, 20 N. Y. Supp. 213; McPherson v. Runyon, 41 Minn. 524, 16 Am. St. Rep. 727, 43 N. W. 392. Both of these cases have been examined. In the first, not only was the plaintiff's property interfered with, but his business was largely injured. In the second, property of the plaintiff had been taken on the writ. In our own state, the case of Brand v. Hinchman, 68 Mich. 590, 13 Am. St. Rep. 362, 36 N. W. 664, is to some extent applicable. There, an attachment was sworn out by defendant Hinchman, and placed in the sheriff's hands for service. A deputy visited Brand's store, but made no actual levy, the subject-matter of the suit being adjusted. This court found, however, that there was at least a technical taking and possession of Brand's property, and the proofs showed that damage resulted to his business as a result of the swearing out of the writ (without probable cause). The case of Antcliff v. June, 81 Mich. 477, 10 L.R.A. 621, 21 Am. St. Rep. 533, 45 N. W. 1019, is authority for the proposition that a gross and fraudulent abuse of the process of the court, resulting in damage, gives a right of action to the person sustaining the damage.

But we have been unable to find a single adjudicated case (and counsel for plaintiff action will not lie for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit where there is no interference with the person or property of the defendant, and the conclusion reached by the court in the foregoing case is not without many able precedents tending to support it.

In jurisdictions where such an action will lie, it would seem that the mere fact that the defendant in the replevin action did not have the title to the goods seized would not preclude him from maintaining an action for malicious prosecution, if the other essential elements were present. And, in fact, it might be argued that the fact that the title to the property was not in the defendant, but in a third person, would tend to show malice and lack of probable cause. There would seem to be nothing in the general nature of such an action, at least, which would take it out of the rule, if such a rule did prevail.

A search of the authorities, however, has failed to disclose any other case in which an action for malicious prosecution has been brought where the plaintiff had been made the defendant in a suit to replevin property of which he had no title.

A somewhat similar situation was presented in Duncan v. Griswold, 92 Ky. 542, 18 S. W. 354, where it was held that malicious prosecution would not lie for the attachment of the plaintiff's goods as the property of a third person.

has called our attention to none), where it is held that the defendant in a replevin suit, having no property in the goods taken, may maintain an action for malicious prosecution against the unsuccessful plaintiff in the original action. The authorities are not harmonious upon the question where the property of the defendant in the original action is taken, and upon that question we express no opinion.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

ALEXANDER DAVIDSON, Respt.,
v.
FLOUR CITY ORNAMENTAL IRON WORKS, Appt.

(107 Minn. 17, 119 N. W. 483.)

Master — emery wheel — duty to guard.

1. Emery wheels are included within the machinery required to be guarded, as provided by § 1813, Rev. Laws 1905.

Same — negligence.

2. Where it is practicable to maintain a guard over emery wheels, it is negligence per se to operate the same without a guard.

Same — injury to servant — failure to guard.

3. The statutory duty is a continuing one, requiring the guard to be maintained while the wheel is in operation, and that duty is not discharged by merely furnishing a suitable guard and exercising reasonable care in the selection of an operator.

Same — fellow servants — nonassignable duty.

4. In this case the duties of the operator required him to change wheels from time to time to meet the exigencies of the work, and in making the change it was necessary to take off the guard. The operator removed the guard and made the change, but neglected to replace the guard, and while revolving the wheel burst and caused the injuries sustained by respondent. Held, the operator and respondent were not fellow servants. The defenses, contributory negligence and assumption of risk, have no application, and appellant was responsible for the failure to maintain the guard.

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying a new trial after verdict for plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lancaster & McGee and G. A. Lyon, for appellant:

The servant was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant while both were aiding in the common business of the same master, and he cannot maintain an action for such injury against the master, who was not chargeable with any personal negligence or wrong.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant is engaged in the manufacture of ornamental iron work in the city of Minneapolis. One Sandstrom, who had been in the employ of appellant for about a year, was operating an emery wheel about 24 inches in diameter, which revolved at the rate of about 1,000 revolutions per minute. The guard provided for this wheel had been temporarily removed by Sandstrom, and while running without the guard the wheel burst, and one of the pieces struck respondent, who was at work some 40 feet distant, and inflicted a compound fracture of the thigh bone. Respondent recovered a verdict, and 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) it is argued here: (1) That the statute (§ 1813, Rev. Laws 1905) had no application to emery wheels; (2) that the evidence conclusively established the fact that Sandstrom and respondent were fellow servants; (3) that the verdict was excessive.

1. The first part of § 1813 reads: "All saws, planers, . . . all set screws, drums, and machinery, . . . as far as practicable, shall be fenced or otherwise protected." And the last reads: "No grindstone, emery wheel, or machine in any factory, mill, or workshop, shall be used when the same is known to be cracked or otherwise defective." This provision is not exclusive of and inconsistent with what precedes, but is an addition thereto. Emery wheels are fairly within the first part of the section; but, notwithstanding the fact that such wheels must be guarded, there is an additional prohibition against using such wheels when they are cracked or defective.

2. Sandstrom had been employed to work upon the emery wheel, and we shall assume that he had been properly instructed not to use it without a guard. In the course of his duties it became necessary for him to change wheels to suit the implements he was required to polish, and in making such change he was obliged to remove the guard. On the occasion in question he had changed the wheel, but proceeded to use it without restoring the guard, when, after about a day's time, it exploded. A failure to comply with the statute constitutes negligence per se, but contributory negligence and assumption of risks are defenses which may be interposed in proper cases. Christianson v. Northwestern Compo-Board Co. 83 Minn. 25, 85 Am. St. Rep. 440, 85 N. W. 826; Wuotilla v. Duluth Lumber Co. 37 Minn. 153, 5 Am. St. Rep. 832, 33 N. W. 551; Tvedt v. Wheeler, 70 Minn. 161, 72 N. W. 1062; Gray v. Commutator Co. 85 Minn. 463, 89 N. W. 322; Seely v. Tennant, 104 Minn. 354, 116 N. W. 648; Callopy v. Atwood, 105 Minn. 80, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 593, 117 N. W. 238; Anderson v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. 67 Minn. 79, 69 N. W. 630; Swenson v. Osgood & B. Mfg. Co. 91 Minn. 509, 98 N. W. 645; McGinty v. Waterman, 93 Minn. 242, 101 N. W. 300, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 39; Schutt v. Adair, 99 Minn. 7, 108 N. W. 811. The statute requires such machinery to be guarded so as to protect workmen, whether operating the machinery or engaged in the discharge of any other duties in the factory. Christianson v. Northwestern Compo-Board Co. supra. In that case the party was injured while working about an unguarded saw, but not directly in connection with it. In Seely v. Tennant, supra, the deceased was caught by an unguarded revolving shaft while passing by it in the performance of duties not directly connected with it.

There is no dispute as to the facts, and the question of contributory negligence and assumption of risk have no place in this case. Respondent was engaged in other duties at some distance, and was entirely ignorant of the failure to replace the guard on the wheel. The question at issue is one of statutory construction. If the duty imposed by statute was a continuing one, and the master was required to maintain the guard while operating the wheel, in addition to installing it in the first place, then the operator charged with the control and management of the wheel and guard was the representative of the master. On the other hand, if the master discharged his duty by furnishing a suitable guard and by exercising reasonable care in the selection of an operator, and gave him suitable instructions, then the operator was a fellow servant of respondent at the time he negligently failed to replace the guard. Cases of this kind differ from those where, under the common law, the master is charged with the duty of providing a safe place and proper tools and instrumentalities. In those cases the exercise of reasonable care only is required. But with reference to dangerous machinery which it is practicable to guard, the rule has no application. The statute has adopted the rule of absolute duty. The master cannot delegate the performance of the act to another and thus avoid responsibility. Baddeley v. Granville, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 423, 17 Eng. Rul. Cas. 212, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 52; Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 130, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 42; Groves v. Winborne, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 402; Sommer v. Carbon Hill Coal Co. 32 C. A. 156, 59 U. S. App. 519, 89 Fed. 54; Lore v. American Mfg. Co. 160 Mo. 608, 61 S. W. 678.

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to consider what the limitations of the application of this rule may be in cases where those intrusted with the duty of maintaining such guards negligently remove them contrary to instructions. There is much room for discussion and difference of opinion upon that branch of the subject. Whether there be any logical distinction we need not now determine. So far as the facts of this case are concerned there should be no hesitancy in applying the rule of absolute nondelegable duty. The operator was required, in the performance of his duties, to remove the guard in order to put on another wheel. It then became the duty of the master to furnish the new wheel with a guard, to the same extent as in the first instance, when the guard was furnished. To that extent the master selected the operator as his representative, and his failure to attach the guard was the master's act. The instructions to the jury were quite as favorable as appellant was entitled to, and we discover nothing prejudicial in the reference by the court to the master's duty to provide a reasonably safe place for the employees.

The verdict was large, but we cannot see that it was excessive.

Affirmed. i

Elliott, J., dissenting:

I am not able to see why Sandstrom and the respondent Davidson were not fellow servants. They were ordinary operatives, each engaged in his own work. Neither had any control over the other. Sandstrom removed the cover from the emery wheel, for the purpose of changing the wheel, and carelessly started the machine without replacing the cover. The appellant had complied with the statute, and but for the negligence of Sandstrom the accident could not have occurred. The employer had done everything it was possible to do, and if the fellow-servant rule is in force in this state, the plaintiff should not have recovered a verdict. I therefore respectfully dissent.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF OHIO

v.

J. M. LYNCH.

(81 Ohio St. 336, 90 N. E. 935.)

Intoxicating liquor — right to bring into dry territory by agent.

It is not a violation of the act entitled, "An Act Further to Provide against the Evils Resulting from the Traffic in Intoxicating Liquors, by Providing for Local Option in Counties" (99 Ohio Laws, 35), for one who lives in a county in which the traffic in intoxicating liquors is prohibited under the provisions of the said act, to go into a county where such traffic is not pro-

Headnote by the COURT.

Note. — Intoxicating liquors: is one who obtains liquor for and delivers it to another, using the latter's money, guilty of selling the same.

As shown by the following cases, as well as those cited in the note to Reed v. State, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 268, to which this note is supplemental, the general rule is that one who, at the request of another and with money furnished for that purpose by him, purchases from a third person, and delivers to the former, intoxicating liquors, is not guilty of making a sale, as he acts merely as agent for the real purchaser, unless it hibited, and purchase intoxicating liquor in any quantity for his own use, and bring the same into the county where he lives to be used therein by him as a beverage; and such a person may, under said statute, not only himself purchase intoxicating liquor as, and for the specific purpose, aforesaid, but he may also do so by another, whom he has constituted his agent for that purpose.

(January 18, 1910.)

EXCEPTIONS by the State to instructions given by the Court of Common Pleas for Champaign County in a prosecution for illegally selling intoxicating liquors which resulted in a verdict of guilty. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Walte, for plaintiff:

A person in dry territory cannot receive money from another, and go into wet territory, purchase intoxicating liquors with the money, carry the liquor back to the place appears that he is personally interested in the sale or acts for the seller: Reynolds v. State, 52 Fla. 409, 42 So. 373; State v. Turner (Kan.) 109 Pac. 983; Givens v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 267, 91 S. W. 1090; Givens v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 91 S. W. 1091; Killman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 512, 112 S. W. 90; Killman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 570, 112 S. W. 92; Schoenherstedt v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 638, 117 S. W. 829; Lafrentz v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 125 S. W. 32.

On proof by unimpeachable witnesses that the defendant received money from another person, accompanied by a request to procure whisky with it, which he bought from a third person and delivered as requested, the defendant cannot be convicted of having on hand intoxicating liquor for the purpose of illegal sale. Bray v. Commerce, 5 Ga. App. 605, 63 S. E. 596.

So, where the defense to a charge of violating the prohibitory liquor law is that the defendant purchased intoxicating liquors for those who advanced him money for that purpose, and that he acted merely as their agent, it is error to refuse to instruct the jury to acquit the defendant if they believe the evidence in support of such defense. State v. Turner, supra.

But a prima facie case of a violation of a prohibitory liquor law is made by evidence that the defendant was requested by other persons to procure liquor for them, receiving money from them therefor, which he shortly afterwards delivered to them, as the burden of explaining where and from whom he obtained the liquor rests upon the defendant. Ibid.

It was held in Johnson v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 77 S. W. 225, that a conviction for violating the local option law would be sustained where it appeared that the defendant, upon being asked if he could obtain whisky for another, said he did not of receiving the money, and deliver it to the person who furnishes the money, to be used by him as a beverage, and not be guilty of "furnishing" as the term is used in this statute.

Lamma v. State, No. 44 of the Ohio Law Rep. for Feb. 8, 1909, p. 69; Nisi Prius Rep.; State v. Freeman, 27 Vt. 520; People v. Neumann, 85 Mich. 98, 48 N. W. 290; Dukes v. State, 77 Ga. 738; State v. Munson, 25 Ohio St. 381.

Messrs. C. B. Helserman and Joseph W. Flaughner for defendant.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error and one Bennett were inmates of the Champaign county infirmary. In Champaign county it was, under the provisions of the county local option statute, unlawful for any person, personally or by agent, to sell, give away, or furnish intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, know, but would try, and, taking the price of a pint, departed and returned in about ten minutes with the liquor.

A conviction for an illegal sale in a district where the sale of liquor is prohibited cannot be sustained on proof that the defendant, at the request of and with money furnished by a third person, purchases liquor for, and delivers it to, the latter within such district, as such facts show that the defendant was merely agent for the purchaser, and was not the seller or agent for the seller. DuBois v. State, 87 Ala. 101, 6 So. 381; People v. Converse, 157 Mich. 29, 121 N. W. 475; Tate v. State, 91 Miss. 382, 44 So. 836; STATE v. LYNCH; State v. Wirick, 81 Ohio St. 343, 90 N. E. 937; Way v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 40, 35 S. W. 377; Brignon v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 71, 38 S. W. 786; Phillips v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 40 S. W. 270; Kirby v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 584, 80 S. W. 1007; Dupree v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 91 S. W. 578. See also cases cited in the note to Reed v. State, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268.

And the doctrine just stated is not affected by the fact that the defendant advanced the necessary money to purchase the liquor, which was refunded by the one for whom the liquor was purchased upon its delivery to him. DuBois v. State; Tate v. State; and Brignon v. State,—supra. See also Potts v. State, infra.

Nor is it affected by the fact that the defendant, upon the receipt of the liquor in the dry territory, placed it in his cold storage, from which his principal withdrew it as desired. People v. Converse; Way v. State; Phillips v. State; and Kirby v. State,—supra.

Nor by the fact that the defendant received pay for storing the liquor, from the one for whom it was purchased. Kirby v. State and Dupree v. State, supra.

Where an express agent in a local option age. Bennett gave money to the defendant for the purpose of going into an adjoining county in which the local option law was not then operative, to purchase for him, Bennett, a quart of whisky to be used by him as a beverage. The defendant did go into the other county, purchased the whisky, returned with it to Champaign county, delivered it to Bennett, and it was there consumed by both Bennett and the defendant. The defendant was indicted and tried in Champaign county on the charge of furnishing intoxicating liquor to be used as a beverage. On the trial the court charged the jury, in substance, that it was not a violation of the statute for a person in a "dry" county to go into a "wet" county and purchase liquor in any quantity for his own use, to be used as a beverage, and that such a person may, under this statute, not only go himself into a wet county and purchase intoxicating liquor in any quantity, to be used as a beverage by himself in a dry county, but that he may do so by another whom he has, in good faith, constituted his agent for that purpose.

The prosecuting attorney excepted to the charge, and although the defendant was found guilty by the jury, and was sentenced by the court, the prosecuting attorney has brought the case here, as provided by Rev. Stat. 1908, §§ 7305, 7306, 7307, 7308, for an answer to the sole question, as stated by himself: "Can a person in dry territory receive money from another, and go into wet territory, purchase intoxicating liquors with the money, and deliver it to the person who furnishes the money, to be used by him as a beverage, and not be guilty of furnishing as the term is used in this statute?" The prosecuting attorney argues for a negative answer to this question, and his argument in brief is this: That the word "furnish" in its ordinary and generally accepted meaning signifies to "provide" or "supply." Yet, if we substitute either of these alleged equivalent words for the one used in the statute, the application of the statute to the facts of this case is not made any clearer than when we consider it with the legislature's own chosen word, "furnish." In fact, the abstract meaning of words rarely affords decisive aid in determining the construction of a document or a statute. When attempting to arrive at the meaning and specific intent of a given phrase or sentence, we are generally obliged to consider words in their concrete use, having regard to the general county sold an express order for the price of a case of beer, and, because the purchaser did not know the name of a liquor dealer in a county where the local option law was not in force, wrote an order for beer for him, the beer being left in a shed at the rear of the express office, from which it was taken as the purchaser desired it,—the agent of the express company was not guilty of violating the local option law, as no sale was made by him. People v. Converse, supra.

So, where one in a prohibition state, at the request of, and with money furnished by, another, ordered for the latter intoxicating liquor from a dealer in another state where the sale thereof was authorized by law, and, upon a receipt of several bottles, delivered one of them to the former, the sale occurred in the latter state, and there was no violation of a statute making it an offense to aid in an unlawful sale, purchase, or other unlawful disposition of liquor, or to act as the agent of the purchaser in procuring an unlawful sale thereof. Vernon v. State, 161 Ala. 83, 50 So. 57.

But in a prosecution for violating a statute declaring it an offense "if any person shall act as agent or assistant of either the seller or purchaser in effecting the sale of any liquor, bitters, or drinks, the sale of which without license is unlawful," where the defendant is not charged with selling liquor, but with violating such statute, the place where the sale is consummated becomes immaterial, notwithstanding the defendant ordered it for another person who furnished the money therefor, as the offense defined by 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such statute is committed whenever assistance is rendered either the seller or purchaser in effecting a sale in a place where the sale of liquor is prohibited by law. Powell v. State (Miss.) 51 So. 465.

One who, with money furnished by a minor, purchases for and delivers intoxicating liquor to him, will be guilty of violating a statute against selling liquor to minors, as the furnishing liquor to such persons by anyone except a parent, or without special written direction from the father or guardian, constitutes a violation thereof. Com. v. Davis, 12 Bush, 240.

So, one who acts as agent for a minor in obtaining intoxicating liquor will be guilty of furnishing it to a minor, unless he honestly believes, after making a proper and reasonable inquiry into the facts, that the minor was of age. Burnett v. State, 92 Ga. 474, 17 S. E. 858.

But it was held in Cox v. State (Miss.) 3 So. 373, that one who, at the request of and with money furnished by a minor, purchases and delivers to him intoxicating liquor, is not guilty of making a sale.

And where the defendant, at the request of a minor, made out for him an order for a dozen bottles of beer, which he sent to another state to be filled, and upon its receipt paid the C. O. D. charges and took the beer to his cold storage, and about ten days later the minor paid him for it and withdrew the beer as he desired it, the defendant is not guilty of selling liquor to a minor. Potts v. State (Tex. Crim. Rep.) 96 S. W. 1084.

purpose which the draftsman had in view, together with any other circumstances which may aid us in attaining his mental point of view.

Now in the study of this statute (act March 5, 1908 [99 Ohio Laws, pp. 35-38]), and especially of its title and § 2, which is directly under review in this proceeding, it is very clear that it is aimed at the repression of "the evils resulting from the traffic in intoxicating liquors," and the punishment of dealers conducting such traffic. The significant language of § 2 is as follows: "Whoever . . . violates any of the provisions of this act, or in any manner, directly or indirectly, sells, furnishes, or gives away, or otherwise deals in any intoxicating liquors as a beverage," etc. The statute seeks to prohibit the traffic or dealing in intoxicating liquors in counties in which a majority of the electors have voted "in favor of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and therefore it provides that not only those who sell intoxicating liquors, but also those who furnish, give away, or otherwise deal in them in evasion of the law against the sale of liquors, shall likewise be guilty of a misdemeanor. This was the construction, and no more, which was given to the word "furnish" in State v. Munson, 25 Ohio St. 381; State v. Freeman, 27 Vt. 520, and People v. Neumann, 85 Mich. 98, 48 N. W. 290, cited by the prosecuting attorney.

For the foregoing reasons, we are unable to accept the construction of the statute, which is claimed on the part of the state, to justify its contention that the charge of the court in this case was erroneous; and we may add a few other considerations leading to the same conclusion.

Admittedly Bennett could have gone in person to another county where the traffic in intoxicating liquors was not prohibited, and there could have bought liquors for his own use in any quantity, and could have transported them to the county of his residence, where the traffic was prohibited, and could have there consumed them. We frankly confess that we are entirely unable to understand why one may not lawfully do by the agency of another that which he may lawfully do himself. The prosecuting attorney contends that the maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se," cannot apply in criminal law. Why not in a case like this? There can be no aiders or abettors where there is no crime. When the liquor was purchased and paid for in a place where the traffic was not prohibited, it thereupon became Bennett's property. The defendant did not, and could not, sell or give it to Bennett, for it was not his to sell or give away. For the defendant to carry and deliver to Bennett his own was not furnishing it to him. If it be conceded that the mere delivery to the purchaser under such circumstances constitutes furnishing within the meaning of the statute, then one who has in his house, in dry territory, liquor which he has lawfully obtained, makes his servant or member of his family liable to indictment under this statute, whenever, in obedience to his request, some of it is brought to the owner. In the absence of a clear expression to that effect, we are not willing to adopt such an extreme construction.

Exceptions overruled.

Messrs. S. T. Bledsoe and J. B. Thompson, for defendant in error:

The iron-safe clause is not a warranty, as the clause is without consideration, and is, in its essential features, merely a provision for the preservation of testimony.

quired to be produced by a policy of fire insurance will excuse a noncompliance with the requirement if due to no fault of the insured. Ins. Co. v. Dunbar, 88 Ill. App. 574; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, supra.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On July 21, 1906, T. H. Newbern, defendant in error, sued the German Alliance Insurance Company, a corporation, plaintiff in error, in the United States court for the Indian territory, southern district, at Pauls Valley, to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy issued by said company May 11, 1905, covering such losses as might be sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the destruction by fire of his store building, stock of general merchandise, and office furniture and fixtures therein contained, in the town of Byers, Indian territory. Four other suits on similar policies, pending here on appeal, and presented by this record, have been consolidated with this suit and abide the event. Each of said policies contain the following, called the "iron-safe clause:"

"Warranty to keep books and inventories, and to produce them in case of loss. The following covenants and conditions on the part of the German Alliance Insurance Company of New York are hereby made a part of the policy to which this clause is attached:

"First. The assured will take an itemized inventory of stock hereby insured at least once in each calendar year, and, unless such inventory shall have been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, the same shall be taken in detail within thirty days after said date, or this policy shall be null and void from and after the expiration of said thirty days, and upon demand of the insured, within three months from date of this policy, the unearned premium for the unexpired time of this policy shall be returned.

"Second. The assured will keep a set of books which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of the business transacted, including all purchases, sales, and shipment of such stock, both for cash and credit, from the date of the inventory provided for in the first section of this clause, and during the continuance of this policy.

"Third. The assured will keep such books and inventory, and also the last preceding inventory, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy, or the portion thereof containing the stock described therein, is not actually open for business; or, failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories at night, and at all such times, in some place not exposed to fire which would ignite or destroy the aforesaid building; and, in case of loss, the assured specifically warrants, agrees, and covenants to produce such books and inventories for the inspection of the company.

"In the event of failure on the part of the assured to keep and produce such books and inventories for the inspection of said company, this entire policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon."

After answer filed in which the company, in effect, insisted in defense thereto that the terms and conditions of said clause were conditions precedent to plaintiff's right to recover, and had not been kept and performed by him, there was trial to a jury. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant demurred to the evidence, which was overruled and exceptions saved, whereupon defendant introduced its testimony. There was verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and, after motion for a new trial filed and overruled, defendant brings the case here, and assigns as error the overruling of said demurrer.

The facts and inferences therefrom reasonably deducible are few and undisputed. They disclose that the inventory provided for in the policy was taken in due time preceding the fire, but was not thereafter produced; that the fire which destroyed the stock and building covered by the policy occurred on the night of March 5, 1906; that about 8 o'clock that night, and while said store was open for business, the insured took the same out of his safe, which was kept in the office, for the purpose of consulting the same with a view to writing a letter; that, after writing the letter, he set the invoice book in which it was contained back into the safe, and went to wait on some customers in another part of the store, leaving the safe unlocked; that he locked it about two hours thereafter, when he closed up for the night. The fire occurred about midnight, and the next morning, on opening the safe after it had cooled, the inventory was not there. The theory upon which the case was tried was that it had been stolen from the safe, and this we think is fairly inferable from the evidence. It is not claimed that the loss of the inventory was due to the bad faith of plaintiff, neither is it relied on in the briefs that there was error in the charge of the court.

In support of defendant's contention, it is in effect urged that this "iron-safe clause" is a promissory warranty, and that plaintiff has not substantially complied with its terms. Whether promissory warranty, or not, we think this contract, like all others, should be reasonably interpreted and construed so as to work no injustice or lead to absurd consequences. We do not think it was intended to make plaintiff's right of recovery depend in every instance on the actual production of the inventory. There are exceptions. We think all required by the "clause" is that the insured shall produce the inventory after the fire, if within his power; and that it should be construed as charging him with responsibility for its loss and consequent inability to produce in all cases where such loss has been due to a wrongful, fraudulent, or negligent act on his part. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 25 S. W. 720; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Schwartz, 115 Ga. 113, 57 L.R.A. 752, 90 Am. St. Rep. 98, 41 S. E. 240. Or, as stated in the syllabus in Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 180 U. S. 132, 45 L. ed. 460, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 326: "Failure of an insured to produce the books and inventory, as required by a policy of fire insurance, under penalty of forfeiture, means a failure to produce them if they are in existence when called for, or if they have been lost or destroyed by the fault, negligence, or design of the insured." It cannot be said that the failure to produce in this instance was due to either of the causes enumerated, but was rather due to the result of an unavoidable casualty, and that, too, while the insured was acting within his rights under the terms of the policy. The policy provides: "The assured will keep such books and inventory, and also the last preceding inventory, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy, or the portion thereof containing the stock described therein, is not actually open for business,"—thereby clearly implying that, when the building is actually open for business, the inventory may be kept in an unlocked safe. In the case last cited it was held, in effect, that where a loss of the inventory occurred during the confusion incident to the exercise by the insured of a right under the policy, a failure to produce it will not vitiate the policy, when the insured uses that degree of care on the occasion that a prudent man, acting in good faith, would exercise.

Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, supra, was error to the United States court of appeals for the eighth circuit to review a decision affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action on insurance policies covering property in Ardmore, Indian territory. The facts were that on the night of April 18, 1905, between the hours of 1 and 3 A. M., a fire accidentally broke out in the town of Ardmore some 300 yards from plaintiffs' place of business. Efforts were made to check the flames, which failed, and when so near to said place of business that the windows of the store were cracking from heat, and the building was about to take fire, one of the plaintiffs entered the building for the purpose of taking therefrom and removing to a safe place the books of the firm, thinking it better to remove them than to take the chances of having them destroyed by fire. He opened the safe in which they were deposited for the night, and removed them to his residence, some distance away. In the hurry and confusion incident to the removal, the inventory was lost, and could not be produced after the fire. It was not claimed that its loss was due to either fraud or bad faith on the part of plaintiffs or either of them. It was insisted in that case, as in this, that the terms of this clause of the policy had not been kept and performed by plaintiffs, and it was complained most that the last inventory of their business had not been produced. The court in effect held that the insured, in attempting to remove the books from the safe to a place of safety, were acting within their rights under the terms of the policy, and in passing said: "We are of opinion that the failure to produce the books and inventory referred to in the policy means a failure to produce them if they are in existence when called for, or if they have been lost or destroyed by the fault, negligence, or design of the insured. Under any other interpretation of the policies, the insured could not recover if the books and inventory had been stolen, or had been destroyed in some other manner than by fire, although they had been placed 'in some secure place, not exposed to a fire' that would reach the store. If the plaintiffs had the right, under the terms of the policy, as undoubtedly they had, to remove their books and inventory from the safe to some secure place not exposed to a fire which might destroy the building in which they carried on business, surely it was never contemplated that they should lose the benefit of the policies if, in so removing their books and inventory, they were lost or destroyed, they using such care on the occasion as a prudent man, acting in good faith, would exercise,"—and affirmed the judgment of the trial court.

And so, paraphrasing, we say that if plaintiff had the right, as undoubtedly he had, to keep his inventory in an unlocked safe during the time his store building mentioned in the policy was actually open for business, surely it was never contemplated that he should lose the benefit of his policy if, in so doing, it was lost, he using, as it has been found in this case he did use, such care on the occasion as a prudent man, acting in good faith, would exercise.

We are therefore of opinion that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the evidence, and for that reason the judgment of the trial court in this and each of the causes abiding the event is affirmed.

ARCHIE R. GALBRAITH, Appt.,

v.

ADAM WEBER et al., Respts.

(— Wash. —, 107 Pac. 1050.)

Principal and agent — agent's authority — reliance upon.

1. One purchasing a horse which has been placed in the hands of an agent for sale has

Note. — Implied or apparent authority of agent to take note payable to himself.

Although an agent is conceded to be a general agent with general power to sell or collect, or both, and take payment either in cash or credit, yet he does not possess all the power and authority over the property of his principal which the principal possesses and may exercise, and such general power gives an agent no authority to substitute himself as creditor in place of his principal, or transfer a debt of his principal to himself by taking in payment thereof a note payable to himself. This general proposition finds support in the following cases: Scott v. Gilkey, 153 Ill. 168, 39 N. E. 265; Evarts v. Lawther, 165 Ill. 487, 46 N. E. 233; Corning v. Strong, 1 Ind. 329; Summers v. Hutson, 48 Ind. 228; Robinson v. Anderson, 106 Ind. 152, 6 N. E. 12; Franklin Sav. Bank v. Colby, 105 Iowa, 424, 75 N. W. 346; Baldwin v. Tucker, 112 Ky. 282, 57 L.R.A. 451, 65 S. W. 841; McCulloch v. McKee, 16 Pa. 289; Hoffman v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 161, 23 L. ed. 539.

Most of the foregoing cases involved the authority of an agent to accept a note running to himself in payment of a pre-existing debt which he was authorized to collect, rather than authority to accept such a note in payment of property sold and delivered by him contemporaneously with the giving of the note, he being in possession of the property for the purpose of sale. Baldwin v. Tucker (cited and commented on in GALBRAITH v. WEBER), however, involved this precise point, and it was held that authority to an agent to sell pianos for cash or on credit gave rise to no apparent authority in him to sell such property for his principal and take in payment therefor a note payable to himself. The court said that the purchaser was bound to know that there was a limitation upon the agent's authority a right to rely upon the agent's having authority to fix the price.

Same — agent's statements — contradiction — effect.

2. The mere fact that an agent for the sale of a horse for $3,000 took $1,000 for it is not sufficient, as matter of law, to charge the purchaser with notice that he is exceeding his authority, although he at first said he had no authority to accept the latter sum, where he subsequently states that he has received such authority.

Trial — agent's authority — question for jury.

3. The jury must determine whether or not the authority of an agent in possession of a horse for purposes of sale includes apparent authority to take notes payable to himself for the purchase price, where there is nothing to show that he might not have taken cash in payment.

(April 2, 1910.)

which would prevent him from taking a note payable to himself for purchase money.

In Robinson v. Anderson, a local agent of a machine company who acted as its agent in the sale of a machine, taking notes in payment therefor running to the company, was held to have no authority, by reason of these facts, together with the possession of the notes so taken, to cancel same and take in lieu thereof substantially similar notes, except that they were payable to himself, and not to his principal. The court said that an agent could not thus substitute himself as creditor in the room of his principal.

In Summers v. Hutson, it was held that an assignee of a non-negotiable note payable to an agent, accepted by him in payment of the purchase price of chattels intrusted with him to sell, had no title thereto as against his principal, the assignee holding under an assignment by the agent.

As to the facts Clark v. Haupt, 109 Mich. 212, 68 N. W. 231, is somewhat similar to GALBRAITH v. WEBER. It was, however, disposed of upon a different proposition. The person who assumed to act as agent in the sale of a piano had, in a conversation prior to the sale in the presence of his principal, represented to the buyer that he was the general manager of the principal's piano business. Later, however, and when the question of reduction in price arose, he told the buyer that he would see his principal and see what they could do. He thereafter returned and represented to the buyer that he was authorized to make a reduction of about 50 per cent from the price theretofore asked for the piano, and upon that basis sold the same, taking in payment therefor part cash, and a portion in a note, but it does not clearly appear whether the note was payable to his principal or to himself, as the court did not reach a point where that question was important, it being held that, after the agent had informed the buyer that he would see the principal in

The facts are stated in the opinion.

When the purchaser has knowledge of the agent's instructions he is as much bound by them as the agent.

Messrs. Arthur McGuire and Sam B. Hill, for respondents:

A principal is not only bound by the acts of his agent, whether general or special, within the authority which he actually has given him, but is also bound by his agent's acts within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits his agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing.

reference to the transaction, that was notice to the buyer that he did not then have authority to sell in the manner proposed, and that any statements thereafter made by him as to his authority were incompetent to prove same, and that there was no other proof thereof; the court not treating the fact that the piano was at the time in the possession of the buyer, having been placed in his possession by the agent, as any proof of authority to sell, at least, on substantially different terms than those theretofore proposed, in view of the admission of the 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

agent to the buyer that before making the sale he would have to consult his principal for authority to do so.

A case which apparently supports the doctrine of GALBRAITH v. WEBER is Schleicher v. Armstrong (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 327, which holds that where an agent was in the lawful possession of an engine under authority to sell it, the fact that in making the sale he took purchase-money notes payable to himself did not invalidate the purchaser's title to the engine.

When the principal has clothed his agent with the indicia of authority to receive payments, as by intrusting him with the possession of the goods to be sold, the purchaser is warranted in paying the price to the agent at the time of sale.

Schleicher v. Armstrong (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 327.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover possession of a horse. There is involved the question of the authority of an agent of plaintiff on making the sale of the horse to the defendants. Upon a trial before the court and a jury, a verdict was returned in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial being denied, judgment was entered upon the verdict. Plaintiff thereupon appealed to this court.

There is competent evidence tending to show the following facts: The appellant resides near Spokane, and the respondents reside near the town of Quincy, more than 100 miles distant from Spokane. Prior to this controversy appellant and respondents were entire strangers to each other. Early in February, 1906, one W. C. Bouquet came to Quincy with the horse in his possession, and offered it for sale for $3,000. He had in his possession, with the horse, two certificates of registration, one issued by the secretary of the American Shire Horse Association, the other issued by the secretary of the Shire Horse Society of London, showing the pedigree of the horse. Bouquet exhibited the horse in and about Quincy, and continued his efforts to find a purchaser for a period of six or eight weeks. Respondents knew of this, and then offered him $1,000 for the horse. Bouquet then told respondents that he had not authority to take $1,000, that he would have to consult Mr. Galbraith, and that he would go into town and telegraph to Galbraith. The next day he informed respondents that he had a telegram from Galbraith saying it would be all right to accept $1,000. The sale was then consummated for that sum on the 27th day of March, 1906. The horse, the two certificates of registration, and a bill of sale executed upon a form which Bouquet evidently had in his possession for that purpose, were delivered by him to respondents. The bill of sale was signed "Archie R. Galbraith, W. C. Bouquet, Agent." In payment of the horse respondents gave their two promissory notes for $500 each, payable to W. C. Bouquet, which they delivered to him. The appellant never had any communication whatever with respondents until he visited Quincy a year later. The only knowledge respondents had concerning Bouquet's authority was such as they might infer from the facts as above related. We now turn to the facts occurring at the other end of the line. The horse, being the property of appellant, was by him placed in the possession of Bouquet for the purpose of taking it to Quincy to sell, where it was taken by Bouquet, as we have stated. Appellant also then gave to Bouquet the two certificates of registration, to be delivered to the purchaser. Appellant valued the horse at $3,000, and evidently desired to sell it for that sum, but it is not shown that Bouquet was instructed by appellant to sell it for no less sum. Bouquet was authorized to sell it on time and take good notes in payment. Appellant says Bouquet was not authorized to sell it for cash, but we think the circumstance shown would warrant the jury in believing Bouquet did have authority to sell it for cash. Soon after the sale, Bouquet returned to appellant at his home near Spokane, and delivered to him three promissory notes for $900 each, purporting to be signed by respondents; Bouquet representing they were given in payment of the horse. These were accepted by appellant, he believing them to be genuine, and no objection was made to the price. Appellant made inquiry by correspondence with banks where respondents were known, and received favorable reports as to their financial worth. Soon thereafter Bouquet disappeared. Appellant's counsel state in their brief that Bouquet cashed or discounted the two $500 notes at a bank before disappearing, though the evidence does not clearly so show. This fact, however, is of little consequence, since it is not denied but that the notes have been paid, or are still legal obligations against respondents. Upon the falling due of the first of the $900 notes in March, 1907, they were discovered to be forgeries, and appellant then first learned of the sale of the horse for $1,000 and the giving of the two $500 notes to Bouquet in payment thereof. Thereupon appellant visited respondents at Quincy, and demanded the possession of the horse, claiming that Bouquet had no authority to sell it for $1,000, and also that he had no authority to take the notes payable to himself.

Learned counsel for appellant assign error upon certain instructions given and refused by the trial court, relating to general and special agency, and the exercising of apparent authority by an agent. Error is also assigned upon the court's refusal to direct a verdict in favor of appellant. The substance of counsel's contention upon these assignments, as we understand them, is that the evidence did not warrant the giving of any instruction upon the question of general agency, or upon the question of the exercise of apparent authority by an agent, and that the evidence does not support the verdict. It is argued that the evidence does not show that Bouquet possessed the authority assumed by him in making the sale, and that his apparent authority was not such as to justify the respondents in dealing with him in the manner they did.

The difficulty in a case of this character is in applying the general rule of apparent authority to the facts of the particular case. From the foregoing statement of the facts, which the evidence tends to show, and which we think the jury were warranted in believing, it will be seen that this case presents a question of apparent authority in the agent, rather more than one of actual authority, so far as the question of price and manner of payment thereof are concerned. The authority to take the horse to Quincy for the express purpose of selling it to whomsoever Bouquet could induce to buy it is conceded. The question of Bouquet's apparent authority to agree upon the price, and to receive payment by notes payable to himself, are the questions concerning which we are to inquire as to whether or not the evidence was such as to make them questions of fact for the jury. Let us first notice the general principles of law governing cases of this character. We find them well stated by Justice Wiswell in Heath v. Stoddard, 91 Me. 499, 503, 40 Atl. 547, 549, as follows: "A principal is not only bound by the acts of his agent, whether general or special, within the authority which he has actually given him, but he is also bound by his agent's acts within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits his agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 969, and cases cited. Whether or not a principal is bound by the acts of his agent, when dealing with a third person who does not know the extent of his authority, depends not so much upon the actual authority given or intended to be given by the principal, as upon the question, What did such third person dealing with the agent believe, and have a right to believe, as to the agent's authority, from the acts of the principal? Griggs v. Selden, 58 Vt. 561, 5 Atl. 504; Towle v. Leavitt, 23 N. H. 360, 55 Am. Dec. 195; Walsh v. Hartford Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 5. For instance, if a person should send a commodity to a store or warehouse where it is the ordinary business to sell articles of the same nature, would not a jury be justified in coming to the conclusion that at least the owner had by his own act invested the person with whom the article was intrusted with an apparent authority which would protect an innocent purchaser? In Pickering v. Busk, 15 East, 43, quoted by Mellen, Ch. J., in Parsons v. Webb, 8 Me. 38, 22 Am. Dec. 220, Lord Ellenborough says: "Where the commodity is sent in such a way, and to such a place, as to exhibit an apparent purpose of sale, the principal will be bound and the purchaser safe." Along the same line, in the text of 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1333, we find the following: "The apparent authority, so far as third persons are concerned, is the real authority, and when a third person has ascertained the apparent authority with which the principal has clothed the agent, he is under no further obligation to inquire into the agent's actual authority." We will first notice Bouquet's apparent power to fix the purchase price. Where the agent has exclusive possession of the property of his principal, with authority and for the express purpose of selling it to any purchaser he may find, as in this case, we think a purchaser from such agent would clearly have the right to rely upon the agent having power to agree upon the purchase price. 2 Enc. L. & P. 1001; Mechem, Agency, § 362; 1 Clark & S. Agency, § 245; Bass Dry Goods Co. v. Granite City Mfg. Co. 113 Ga. 1142, 39 S. E. 471.

It is argued that, since Bouquet had informed respondents before the sale that he did not have authority to sell the horse for $1,000, this was notice to them that he exceeded his authority in selling for that price. But this argument loses its force when we are reminded that Bouquet told respondents the following day that he had a telegram from appellant saying it would be all right to accept $1,000. So, after all, respondents had no information as to the price Bouquet had authority to sell for, other than what Bouquet himself told them. It is further argued that the great difference between $3,000 previously asked, and $1,000 finally accepted, was sufficient to suggest to respondents that Bouquet was probably exceeding his authority. There is no evidence in the record to the effect that Bouquet ever told respondents that he was not authorized to sell for less than $3,000. Indeed, the acceptance of the three $900 forged notes by appellant indicates that Bouquet was authorized to sell for less than $3,000. All that Bouquet ever said to respondents as to the limit of his authority was that he did not have authority to take $1,000, informing them the next day he did have such authority. It is true the appellant testified the horse was worth $3,000; but the jury were not required to believe it was worth that sum, especially in view of other testimony as to its earning power. So we do not think that these circumstances were so extraordinary as to enable us to say, as a matter of law, they showed want of authority on the part of Bouquet to agree upon a sale at $1,000.

We will now notice Bouquet's apparent authority to receive notes in payment, payable to himself. We have seen that Bouquet was clearly authorized to sell the horse on time and take payment in notes. We have no evidence of any special instructions as to the form in which the notes were to be made. In view of the conceded power of sale in Bouquet as agent, and his exclusive possession of the horse for that express purpose, it would seem clear that respondents would have the right to regard him as also having authority to sell for cash and collect the purchase price. Mechem, Agency, § 338; 1 Clark & S. Agency, § 239; 2 Enc. L. & P. 1003; 31 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1358. We then conclude that the jury were fully warranted in believing that Bouquet, so far as the rights of respondents are concerned, had authority to sell the horse and receive either cash or notes in payment. Many authorities have been cited to the effect that power in an agent to sell does not give power to barter or exchange, or take notes in payment payable to the agent. We will notice two of these which are most favorable to plaintiff's contention. In the case of Hoffman v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 U. S. 161, 23 L. ed. 530, cited by appellant, a note was taken by an insurance agent payable to himself, with other property, in payment of premiums, when he had no authority to receive anything but cash. It was held that such action on his part was without real or apparent authority, and the company was not bound thereby. That case we think differs from this, in that the insurance agent had no power to accept anything but cash, while in this case the jury might believe from the evidence Bouquet had power to accept either notes or cash. Counsel also cite Baldwin v. Tucker, 112 Ky. 282, 57 L.R.A. 451, 65 S. W. 841. That case is apparently much like this, and, were we inclined to follow it, would serve as authority here. The decision, however, was rendered by a divided court, decided by four justices as against three dissenting. It involved the taking of a note in payment of a piano by an agent, payable to himself, and not thereafter accounted for to his principal. The piano appears to have been in possession of the agent for purpose of sale at the time of the sale and delivery by him. The question was as to whether or not the act of the agent in taking the note payable to himself was sufficient to warrant the court in taking the case from the jury, and deciding as a matter of law that the agent exceeded his apparent authority. The majority held that it was. We are impressed, however, with the remarks of Justice Hobson, in his dissenting opinion, concurred in by two of his brethren, as follows: "No authority can be found for the proposition, so far as I am aware, that the taking of a note by an agent in his own name is, as a matter of law, conclusive to the purchaser that the agent is exceeding his authority.

. . . As between two innocent persons one of whom must suffer, the loss should fall on the principal who has armed the agent with apparent authority, and thus enabled him to obtain the advantage of the person with whom he trades, rather than on the purchaser, where the agent acts within the apparent scope of his authority, and there is nothing in the transaction to put the purchaser on notice that he is exceeding his authority. Where authority is conferred by parol, the rule is that the apparent scope of it is a question for the jury. It seems to me the same rule should be applied where the agent is sent to take charge of his principal's interest in a territory distant from his principal, and the secret arrangements between the principal and the agent are unknown to the public dealing with him."

Like the learned dissenting justice in that case, we have had no authority called to our attention to the effect that the mere taking of a note by a sales agent, payable to himself, in payment upon a sale made by him of property in his exclusive possession for the purpose of sale and delivery, authorizes the taking from the jury the question of the agent's apparent authority in so doing. The case of Schleicher v. Armstrong (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 327, supports this view, though the question does not seem to have been elaborately discussed. It may be conceded that where an agent has authority to sell for cash only, he cannot take payment in notes payable in the future, either to himself or the principal, and it may be also conceded that, where the agent has authority to sell upon credit only, he is not authorized to take such credit except in the name of his principal. We mean such authority as a purchaser is bound to notice. This case presents a different situation since the jury would be fully warranted in believing that Bouquet had authority to take either notes or cash in payment, as we have seen. The only sound reason that can be assigned for prohibiting the giving of notes payable to Bouquet for this horse is that, by so doing, it placed within his power the ability to convert such notes to his own use, and defraud his principal. This reason might apply if Bouquet was at the time of the sale without authority to sell for cash; but since the evidence was such that the jury might believe he had the authority to receive cash as well as notes in payment, it at once becomes plain that respondents, by giving notes payable to Bouquet, were not thereby placing it in his power to defraud his principal any more than as if they had paid him in money.

In view of the power of sale vested in Bouquet, the fact that he had exclusive possession of the horse for that express purpose, the fact that the transaction occurred a hundred miles or more distant from the residence of the owner, the owner not being present at any time during the whole six or eight weeks his agent was attempting to make the sale, the fact that respondents and appellant were entire strangers to each other, the fact that Bouquet had also in his possession certificates of registration showing the pedigree of the horse, ready for delivery with the horse to whomsoever he might sell, leads us to the conclusion that the jury were warranted in believing from all the circumstances that Bouquet was acting within his apparent authority, as respondents had a right to view it.

We are of the opinion that the evidence was not such as to enable the court to dispose of the question of Bouquet's apparent authority as a matter of law, and that the cause was properly left to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

HIRAM CAMPBELL, Respt.,

v.

CHICAGO GREAT WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(108 Minn. 104, 121 N. W. 429.)

Railroad — crossing — injury — negligence.

1. Plaintiff saw a horse and wagon without a driver approach the railroad tracks at a constantly used crossing of a busy city street. He took hold of the reins suspended from the top of the vehicle. Defendant's railroad train, while the engine whistle was being blown and the train was running at the rate of 35 miles an hour, came suddenly into view around a sharp curve some 200 feet away. The horse became frightened, plunged forward, and jerked plaintiff on the track. The oncoming train struck him, and produced the injuries for which the jury awarded damages. Its verdict is sustained, despite objection based on the absence of proof of defendant's negligence, on plaintiff's contributory negligence, on the instructions given by the trial court, and on other grounds.

Same — duty of traveler.

2. One who goes near enough to a railway track to be in danger from any cause is required by law to exercise due care to avoid harm. This rule does not, however, amount to a hard and fast requirement that such a person must stop, look, and listen, and continue to look under all circumstances and at all times; nor is such person bound to anticipate negligence on the part of persons operating trains on such a track.

(May 28, 1909.)

Note. — Right of one going on railroad crossing to rescue property to recover for injury.

The rule as to the right of recovery for an injury received on a railroad crossing while attempting to rescue property seems to be that one is entitled to run some risk in attempting to save his property from damage, and that he may recover for any injury received in so doing, provided he has not recklessly exposed himself to danger.

Thus, in Wasmer v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 80 N. Y. 212, 36 Am. Rep. 608, the act of plaintiff's intestate in attempting to rescue his horse and wagon from a railroad track running through a city street, although he saw a train approaching, was held not to prevent a recovery. The court said: "The horse and wagon had some value, and we may assume, from the humble occupation in which the intestate was engaged, that they were of great value to him. He had the right, and was under some sort of duty, to rescue them from danger if he could. He therefore had business in the place where he was when he was killed. It cannot be said that he went there for no purpose, and that he unnecessarily placed himself in danger. The whole transaction took but a moment. He saw the train coming. The impulse to save his property was a natural one. He had no time for reflection. He saw how distant the train was, and, supposing that he could rescue his horse, started. He got across the track, and would have been safe, but for the sliding of the wagon wheel in consequence of the elevated rail. It is easy enough now to see that his effort was a

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Mower County denying its alternative motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lafayette French, A. G. Briggs, and H. Loomis, for appellant:

The obligation to exercise care is not alone upon one who expects to cross a railway, but is equally upon one who goes near to it, so as to be in danger therefrom from any cause.

Flagg v. Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junction R. Co. 96 Mich. 30, 21 L.R.A. 835, 55 N. W. 444; Moore v. Kansas City & C. Rapid Transit R. Co. 126 Mo. 265, 29 S. W. 9; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Taliaferro, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 545, 19 S. W. 432; Olson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 81 Wis. 41, 50 N. W. 412, 1096; Hargis v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 75 Tex. 19, 12 S. W. 953; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Buckner, 28 Ill. 299, 81 Am. Dec. 282; Deville v. Southern P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 383; Cornell v. Detroit Electric R. Co. 82 Mich. 495, 46 N. W. 791; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 81 Ind. 264; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stinger, 78 Pa. 219.

The fact that plaintiff's attention may have been diverted by attempting to control the horse would not relieve him from the charge of negligence.

hazardous and unsafe one. But can we say, as matter of law, that he, situated just as he was, with no time for cool reflection, failed in that care which men of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same circumstances? We think not."

So one is not, as a matter of law, negligent in going upon a crossing, in the face of an approaching train, for the purpose of driving off his sheep, where, unless his foot had caught because of a defect in a plank, he would have had time to get off the track in time. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Beall, 13 Ohio C. C. 605.

But one who goes upon a railroad track to save his team, when he has been warned of and must have seen a train approaching, is guilty of such negligence as to preclude recovery. McManamee v. Missouri P. R. Co. 135 Mo. 440, 37 S. W. 119.

And one who, against the warning of his companions, leaves a position of safety to go to the rescue of his horse and his buggy, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Jaggard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff saw a wagon with a horse attached, but without a driver, approaching defendant's railroad tracks at a constantly used crossing of a busy city street. As the horse was about to step on the tracks, plaintiff took hold of the reins, which were suspended from the top of the wagon by a hook. At this point, if he had looked, he could not have seen up defendant's tracks towards the north more than about 200 feet, because the tracks there curved sharply as they passed "a little wooden building" about that distance from the crossing. While plaintiff was backing this horse away from the railroad track, and when he was safe under ordinary circumstances, defendant's train, running 35 miles an hour, burst into view some 200 feet to the north. Sharp blasts of the whistle were blown, the horse became frightened, plunged forward, jerked plaintiff upon the track, and ran on across the tracks. Defendant's train hurled plaintiff aside and inflicted the injury for which recovery is here sought. The jury found a verdict for him in the sum of $1,500. This appeal was taken from the order of the trial court denying the defendant's usual motion in the alternative.

1. The facts have been stated, as they must be, under the circumstances, in accordance with the construction of the testimony introduced most favorable to the plaintiff. On argument in this court, defendant's negligence was frankly admitted for the purposes of this appeal. The speed at which the train was running the jury might have found was wrongful. It was contended, however, that the affirmative testimony that the bell was ringing so overbalanced plaintiff's testimony that he did not hear the ringing of the bell as to exclude which was overturned on a railroad crossing, assumes the hazard; and where he is run over by a passing engine, no action can be maintained by his representatives. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Driskell, 101 Ill. App. 137.

And in Deville v. Southern P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 383, one who went upon a railroad crossing to rescue his team was held guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to his injury.

And the act of going upon a farm crossing to hurry cattle across in front of an approaching train precludes recovery. Morris v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 148 N. Y. 182, 42 N. E. 579.

In the case of CAMPBELL v. CHICAGO G. W. R. Co. it will be noticed that the person injured went upon the crossing to rescue property with whose presence on the track he had no original connection; but notwithstanding this fact, a recovery was allowed.

this consideration from the determination of negligence. This, however, is a consideration which, under the present circumstances, affects plaintiff's contributory negligence, not defendant's actionable wrong.

2. The gist of this appeal upon the merits is that plaintiff was shown to have been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, or that the circumstances in connection with this contributory negligence were such as to require a new trial to be granted. We are of opinion that the trial court properly refused to accept either of these views. Plaintiff was engaged in caring for the property of another, then in a position of peril to itself and of probable danger to defendant's property and to the passengers it was engaged from time to time in transporting. According to his testimony,—which for present purposes must be assumed to be true,—he was not standing on the railroad track, nor near enough to be struck by the train, before the train came into view. He did not intend to go dangerously near it. He expected to back the horse to a place of safety.

Plaintiff was not required to exercise the care of a person approaching and about to cross the railroad tracks. It will be assumed that, under the circumstances of this case, plaintiff was within the rule of law requiring one who goes near enough to a railroad track as to be in danger from any cause to exercise due care to avoid harm. That obligation must, however, vary with circumstances. It does not amount to a hard and fast requirement that such persons must stop, look, and listen, and continue to look at all times and under all circumstances. Plaintiff's testimony on direct examination as to looking and listening the jury might have found exonerated him from contributory negligence. His cross-examination was not so favorable to his interests. The result was for the jury.

The jury might properly have found from the testimony that plaintiff had glanced up the track at one time and had seen nothing. The train would have covered in four or five seconds the distance he could have seen it, because of the curve previously stated. The duty to exercise care is, in the nature of things, continuous, but due vigilance did not require plaintiff to keep his eye fixed in the direction from which the train came. If stress be laid upon the signals which defendant insists plaintiff should have heard, then the emergency element becomes conspicuous. In any view, the situation of the horse and the vehicle constituted to a limited extent a distraction of his attention, the effect of which as a justification was for the jury.

Finally, plaintiff put himself in no position of danger. He could have safely accomplished his humane purpose if it had not been for the negligence of the defendant. He did not anticipate, and as a matter of law was not required to have anticipated, that negligence. He was not bound to have foreseen that defendant would run its train around the sharp curve which prevented its observation at an unlawful and dangerous rate of speed, across a much-used thoroughfare. He had the right to rely upon the exercise of commensurate care on defendant's part, in exposing either persons or property to unnecessary and great peril from so dangerous an instrumentality as a rapidly moving train. On principle, the question of contributory negligence was for the jury. Its conclusion is sustained by the record.

The authority most nearly resembling the present case is Lorenz v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 115 Iowa, 377, 56 L.R.A. 752, 88 N. W. 835. There deceased was struck by a train on defendant's road at a street crossing. At the time he was attempting to head off and drive back a cow. In considering the question of contributory negligence, McClain, J., said: "In determining what constitutes contributory negligence, . . . only whether the person injured did use the care which the circumstances required of him. Now, while the rule is well settled in this state, and generally elsewhere, that it is contributory negligence for a person to go upon a railway track without looking or listening to ascertain whether there is danger from an approaching train, yet his duty in that respect is to exercise the care which reasonably prudent persons would exercise under such circumstances. The duty to look and listen is not an absolute one, but one the exercise of which is dependent on conditions." A verdict for plaintiff was affirmed.

The authorities cited by defendant to sustain the contention that "the obligation to exercise care is not alone upon one who expects to cross a railway, but is equally upon one who goes near to it, so as to be in danger therefrom from any cause," without exception involve circumstances so different from the circumstances in the case at bar that they are not controlling. In Flagg v. Chicago, D. & C. G. T. Junction R. Co. 96 Mich. 30, 21 L.R.A. 835, 55 N. W. 444, plaintiff, instead of alighting, remained in a wagon to which a young horse was attached while a train was approaching. In Moore v. Kansas City & I. Rapid Transit R. Co. 126 Mo. 265, 29 S. W. 9, plaintiff drove a team of horses which he knew were easily frightened by the cars, on defendant's right of way. while there was nothing to prevent him from driving down a safe street. In Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Taliaferro, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 545, 19 S. W. 432, plaintiff attempted to drive in front of an engine which he saw coming. In Olson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 81 Wis. 41, 50 N. W. 412, 1096, plaintiff left, unhitched and unattended, within 19 feet of the track, a young, high-lived team of horses. In Hargis v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 75 Tex. 19, 12 S. W. 953, plaintiff, having crossed the track in safety, voluntarily and unnecessarily stopped. In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Buckner, 28 Ill. 299, 81 Am. Dec. 282, a deaf person drove an unmanageable horse across a track and when a train was approaching. In Dewille v. Southern P. R. Co. 50 Cal. 383, plaintiff left a span of horses unhitched at train time. In Cornell v. Detroit Electric R. Co. 82 Mich. 495, 46 N. W. 791, plaintiff drove a young horse along a street railway for the purpose of testing the horse. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 81 Ind. 264, plaintiff attempted to lead his horse across a track in front of an engine. In these cases, plaintiff's own conduct initiated the peril. In the case at bar, the plaintiff had no connection with the original presence of the horse and wagon on the track. He should not be penalized for undertaking an errand of mercy.

3. Defendant has laid especial stress upon the instruction by the court to the effect that as plaintiff was not on the crossing, but was jerked upon it by the action of the horse, then plaintiff was not negligent, and defendant was liable if it was negligent. If stress were laid upon the emergency feature of this case, it might be that this instruction was correct in itself. The charge of the trial court must be approved, however, on other grounds; for, after the court had practically completed its charge, it inquired whether counsel desired to call attention to other matters. Counsel for the plaintiff then suggested that the ruling as to plaintiff's contributory negligence in the respect here involved was "stated a little broader than might be warranted." The court thereupon charged that the plaintiff was bound to exercise ordinary care at all times up to the time of the accident, and that if he had notice or knowledge that the train was approaching, or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have taken notice, it would have been negligent for him to have gone upon the railroad track, and that in such event he would be guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover. This instruction appears to be as favorable to defendant as properly might be. If defendant thought otherwise, it should have then pointed out its impropriety to the court.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

RE THEODORE NEFF.

(84 C. C. A. 561, 157 Fed. 57.)

Statute of frauds — signature of one party — effect.

1. A promise signed by the promoter of a corporation to pay for stock taken by a subscriber upon its surrender within a certain time is not invalid under the statute of frauds because not signed by the subscriber.

Bankruptcy — maturing contract.

2. The bankruptcy, before the time arrives, of one who has promised to return the amount paid for stock of a corporation if it is surrendered within a certain time, does not prevent the claim upon the contract from being a fixed liability, absolutely owing, at the time of the bankruptcy, so as to be provable under the bankruptcy act, since the promisee may treat the bankruptcy as a repudiation of liability and immediately bring an action for damages.

(November 20, 1907.)

Note. — Promise by bankrupt to pay a fixed sum conditional upon exercise of an option by promisee, the time for which had not expired at the time of bankruptcy, as basis of provable claim.

Section 63a of the bankruptcy act of 1898 provides that debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are (1) a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him, whether then payable or not; (4) founded upon an open account or upon a contract, express or implied. This section was considered and applied in the case of RE NEFF. When that case was before the district court, that court said that if the agreement there involved was to be regarded as a loan of money secured by collateral in the form of the stock which, upon payment of the loan, was to be surrendered or delivered up with the notes, then the claim based thereon represented a fixed liability, etc., within clause 1 of § 63a. But the court said that if the agreement was to be regarded as a contract to purchase the stock at the prices and upon the terms specified, the adjudication in bankruptcy disabled the promisor from performing the agreement, and was equivalent to an anticipatory breach thereof, and that coincident therewith rights of action arose in favor of the claimants to enforce the agreement, with the result that the claim became provable under § 63a (4).

A PPEAL by the trustee in bankruptcy of Theodore Neff from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio allowing a claim against the bankrupt's estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lurton, Severens, and Richards, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. E. E. Clevenger and Cook Dandorf for appellant.

Mr. A. H. Mitchell for appellee.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

These three appeals have been heard together as they involve the provability of a number of claims against the bankrupt of like character. In tenor and substance the contracts are alike. That presented by Emily M. Nichols is an example and is as follows:

$2,500 Bellaire, Ohio, Feb. 7, 1905.

Two years after date, I, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Miss Emily M. Nichols twenty-five hundred and no 100 dollars at the office of the Avery-Caldwell Mfg. Co., upon surrender of certificate No. 38 for 2,500 shares of preferred stock of said company, value received, interest 7 per cent per annum.

Some of these contracts related to the stock of a manufacturing corporation known

It will be at once observed that one or the other of the two constructions so placed upon the agreement must prevail. It is also thought that no fault is to be found with the statement of the district court that if the agreement constitutes a loan, it is provable, if at all, under clause 1, and that if it constitutes a contract to purchase stock upon exercise of an option by the promisee, it is provable, if at all, under clause 4. If the district court be right, the method and reasoning by which the circuit court of appeals reaches its decision, which, considered as a result, is perfectly satisfactory, affords some difficulty. It will be noticed that the latter court in its opinion says that the contract is plainly an agreement to purchase the shares of stock named, at the time and price stated, and at another point in its opinion says that the creditor, by offering to file his claim, manifested his election to treat the bankruptcy as a breach of the agreement, which entitled him to maintain a right of action for damages. The source of the difficulty in this opinion arises from the fact that the court makes no reference to clause 4, but directs its discussion solely to answering the contention that the claim was not a fixed liability, absolutely owing, at the time of the filing of the petition. This, too, is done without reference to the disposal of the question as made by the district court. It would seem, however, that if the contract is to be regarded as an agreement to purchase stock, and if the bankruptcy constitutes an anticipatory breach thereof affording a right of action for damages,—and this is what the circuit court of appeals says,—a claim based upon such a situation cannot be regarded as a fixed liability. Loveland says in the third edition of his work on Bankruptcy, at page 345, that a fixed liability, absolutely owing, means that the obligation to pay exists at the time of the filing of the petition, and is sufficiently definite in amount to permit of computation. Now the damages accruing from the breach of this agreement to purchase stock cannot be determined by mere computation, but can be arrived at only by the prosecution of an action for the breach of the contract.

28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Strictly speaking, therefore, the claimant is bound to rely upon the language of clause 4 for the enforcement of his claim.

Concerning contingent claims it is said in 1 Remington on Bankruptcy, page 382: "The test as to whether a claim is really contingent, or is simply unliquidated or unascertained by legal proceedings, would seem to be this: Have all the facts necessary to be proved to fasten liability already occurred? If so, the claim is not contingent, although the liability and the extent of damages may not yet have been ascertained by the consideration of a court, as evidenced by judgment or decree, nor even the full extent of damages arising been already suffered. The contingency, in other words, is a contingency of facts necessary to fasten liability at all, not a contingency of the court's judgment on the facts, nor a contingency as to the extent of the damages resulting from the injury. . . . The subject of contingent claims is an abstruse subject, and one that has not been clearly analyzed in the decisions. On the one hand it is to be borne in mind that neither the adjudication of bankruptcy nor the discharge affects merely contractual relations, unless such relations at the time of bankruptcy, or by virtue of the bankruptcy, have been merged in a 'debt, demand, or claim.' . . . On the other hand, it is equally to be borne in mind that if it has become thus merged at the time of bankruptcy, whether it amounts to the certain, liquidated, and definite money demand technically known as a 'debt', or constitutes merely a 'claim' or 'demand' against the debtor, it constitutes a 'provable debt,' as the term is used in bankruptcy."

To avoid the result which consistency would otherwise demand, of extending this note so as to embrace the whole question of contingent claims, it has been confined, as indicated by the title, to cases like RE NEFF, in which the contingency consists in the exercise by the promisee, of an option that could have been exercised before the bankruptcy. It will be observed that in the NEFF CASE the promisee could have rendered the obligation of the promisor absolute by as the Avery-Caldwell Company, and others to the stock of the Federal Casket Company. It was agreed, as a fact, that the contract set out and others of like character were made by the persons signing the same as promoters, and to induce sales of the stock of the corporations named, and that, in consideration of this agreement, the claimants became subscribers to the stock of said companies, paying therefor the amount named in each contract, and received therefor the shares of stock mentioned. It was also agreed that both of these corporations were insolvent before the bankruptcy of said Neff, and that this stock was of no value. The stock certificates were filed as part of the proof in each case, and tendered to the trustee. The contracts are plainly agreements to purchase the shares of stock named, at the time and price stated. They rest upon a sufficient consideration, and are written agreements to take and pay for the shares named and signed by the parties, to be charged and delivered to and accepted by the promisees. There is, therefore, nothing in the objection as to the contracts being invalid under the statute of frauds because not signed by claimants also. Thayer v. Luce, 22 Ohio St. 62; Himrod Furnace Co. v. Cleveland & M. R. Co. 22 Ohio St. 451; Lee v. Cherry, 85 Tenn. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 800, 4 S. W. 835; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 345c. The status of a claim must depend upon its provability at the time the bankrupt petition was filed. At that time it must come within the definition of § 63 of presenting the stock and demanding payment at any time within the two years there specified. Cases of conditional liability which is also unmaturing, in the sense that the promisor cannot be made liable until a certain date, are not included, although the date of maturity may be subsequent to that of the bankruptcy. For instance, cases involving the contracts of bankrupt sureties, guarantors, indorsers, and drawers present a somewhat different question, for in such cases the liability of the bankrupt is conditional not upon the exercise of an option at any time by the promisee, but upon the default of the person primarily liable, which cannot occur until a specified time. So, too, cases in which the person primarily liable on an instrument for the payment of money agrees to pay collection or attorneys' fees in case of default in payment of the principal sum are excluded, for the reason that such a promise is conditioned upon the default of the promisor, which also cannot happen before the date fixed for the maturity of the instrument.

The ultimate result, namely, that the debt is provable, reached in the NEFF CASE, finds support in other Federal decisions, although not many cases have been found in which that precise question was raised.

The case of Re Pettingill, 137 Fed. 143, 14 Am. Bankr. Rep. 728, is sufficiently set out in the NEFF CASE.

In Re Swift, 50 C. C. A. 264, 112 Fed. 315, it was held that upon the adjudication in bankruptcy of a broker who purchased stock upon a margin for a customer (such contract being construed under the local law as an undertaking to deliver the stock to the customer on demand and tender of the part of the price not already advanced), the customer might treat the contract as broken by the act of bankruptcy, and prove his claim for damages which related back to the time of the adjudication. The court in this case said: "It provides, without apparent restriction, for proof of debts founded on contracts, express or implied, and also, in a general way, for liquidating unliquidated claims; but, in the absence of any express provision for contingent engagements, including those for property to be delivered on demand and payment of purchase money, there seems to be some difficulty in applying the statute. However, we need not go into the troublesome questions that are raised by this omission, because we have already seen that in the case at bar the proceedings in bankruptcy rendered unnecessary a demand and tender, and, like the great mass of matters affected by such proceedings we must hold that this proof of debt relates to the time when they were commenced. From that time the stocks in question were put beyond the power of the stockholders to deliver effectually. The contract ripened simultaneously with the beginning of the proceedings in bankruptcy, as the consequence thereof, in connection with the adjudication which followed. Of course, as everything related back to the filing of the petition, the ripening of the claim did not occur before it was filed, nor afterwards, but simultaneously with it, as already said. Consequently, by necessary effect, there was created and existed, when the proceedings commenced, a provable claim. Whether Dee had the option of withholding his claim and ripening it by a demand subsequently, . . . he waived that option by his proof of debt, and he thus elected, as he had a right to do, to assume that demand and tender had been rendered unnecessary, and to liquidate his claim accordingly." From the foregoing language it seems clear that the court regarded the claim as provable under § 63 a (4).

And it was held in Re B. H. Gladding Co. 120 Fed. 709, that where an employer gave "vacations with pay" to its employees, but withheld the payments until the following January with the understanding that if the employment should be severed before such time the vacation pay should be forfeited, the employees presenting a claim therefor against the employer's trustee in bankruptcy were entitled to priority under § 64b, which provides for payment in full of claims for wages due to workmen, clerks, etc., although the proceedings were commenced before January, since the bankruptcy defeated the object of the withholding of the pay-the bankrupt act; it cannot be benefited by its status at a later date. The defense is that these claims were not "fixed liabilities," "absolutely owing," at the time of the filing of the petition against the bankrupt. This is based upon the fact that the liability of the bankrupt is made dependent upon the surrender of the stock certificate at a date which had not then arrived, and that it was optional with the promisees to surrender or keep the stock until that time, and that the liability of the promisor was undetermined and contingent until such surrender at the time named.

That the promisor might refuse performance until the time named is true. But if, before the time of performance, one absolutely repudiate liability and disavow unequivocally any purpose to perform at any time, the other party may treat such repudiation, at his election, as a breach of the agreement and sue for his damages. This is the rule as settled in Hochster v. De la Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 576, and approved by the Supreme Court in Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 44 L. ed. 953, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 780, and by this court in Foss-Schneider Brewing Co. v. Bullock, 8 C. C. A. 14, 16 U. S. App. 311, 59 Fed. 83, and Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Alley, 19 C. C. A. 599, 43 U. S. App. 169, 73 Fed. 603; McBath v. Jones Cotton Co. 79 C. C. A. 203, 149 Fed. 383; Michigan Yacht & Power Co. v. Busch, 75 C. C. A. 109, 143 Fed. 929. So, if one of the parties absolutely disables himself from performing the contract by putting performance out of his power, the other party may treat that as a repudiation and bring his action to recover damages then or wait the time of performance, at his election. This aspect of the question of an anticipatory breach is well put by Fuller, Chief Justice, in Roehm v. Horst, cited above, when he says: "It is not disputed that if one party to a contract has destroyed the subject-matter, or disabled himself so as to make performance impossible, his conduct is equivalent to a breach of the contract, although the time for performance has not arrived; and also that if a contract provides for a series of acts, and actual default is made in the performance of one of them, accompanied by a refusal to perform the rest, the other party need not perform, but may treat the refusal as a breach of the entire contract, and recover accordingly."

In Lowell v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 264, 274, 28 L. ed. 423, 426, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390, 395, the company had failed, and transferred its business to another company. The court held that this authorized one insured to treat the contract as at an end and to sue to recover back premiums paid, although the time of performance had not arrived. Mr. Justice Bradley, for the court, said: "Our third conclusion is that, as the old company totally abandoned the performance of its contract with the complainant by transferring all its assets and obligations to the new company, and as the contract is executory in its nature, the complainant had a right to consider it as determined by the act of the company, and to demand what was justly due to him in that exigency. Of this we think there can be no doubt. Where one party to an executory contract prevents the performance of it, or puts it out of his own power to perform it, the other party may regard it as terminated and demand whatever damage he has sustained thereby. We had occasion to examine this subject in the recent case of United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 339, 28 L. ed. 168, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, to which we refer." See also Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 252, 32 L. ed. 669, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 295.

Bankruptcy is a complete disablement from performance and the equivalent of an out and out repudiation, subject only to ments, which was merely to secure a continuance of service from the employees. While this case does not involve the provability of a claim under § 63a, it seems to present a sufficient analogy to warrant its citation in this connection.

Where, however, a son agreed to pay his father or his heirs or assigns a certain sum either during the latter's lifetime or five years after his death, in consideration of the father's promise not to make any disposition of his estate in such manner as to deprive the son of the share therein to which he would be entitled if the father should die intestate, it was held that, notwithstanding the intervention of the son's bankruptcy, the father had a contingent claim, and not a present enforceable one, and that, therefore, he could not assert it either as a fixed liability, absolutely owing, etc., or as founded upon a contract, express or implied. Re 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hartman, 166 Fed. 776. The court pointed out that the contingency of the father's adherence to his promise could occur only by, and not until, his dying intestate, or having made a will complying with his agreement, and this fact would seem to be a distinguishing feature of the case, placing it within the category of those which have been heretofore expressly excluded. It is here cited for the purpose of accentuating the distinction upon which such exclusion is based.

The general question of what constitutes a fixed liability as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, is considered in the note in 54 L.R.A. 369.

On effect of immaturity of claim at time of bankruptcy upon right of set-off, see note to Richardson v. Anderson, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 396.

the right of the trustee, at his election, to rehabilitate the contract by performance. In the case styled Re Swift, 50 C. C. A. 264, 112 Fed. 315, this consequence was considered by the court of appeals for the first circuit in a very satisfactory opinion by Putnam, Ch. J. There the obligation of a broker to deliver certain shares of stock on demand was held to be breached by bankruptcy, and that no prior demand was essential, a right of action accruing simultaneously with the bankrupt petition, which was the act of disablement to which the adjudication related. In Re Pettingill (D. C.) 137 Fed. 143, 147, Judge Lowell, in a very able and discriminating opinion in which the authorities are considered in the light of the requirements for a provable debt under the present bankrupt law, reached the conclusion that "if the bankrupt, at the time of bankruptcy, by disabling himself from performing the contract in question, and by repudiating its obligation, could give the proving creditor the right to maintain at once a suit in which damages could be assessed at law or in equity, then the creditor can prove in bankruptcy on the ground that bankruptcy is the equivalent of disablement and repudiation. For the assessment of damages, proceedings may be directed by the court under § 63b, act July 1, 1898, chap. 541 (30 Stat. at L. 562, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3447)."

In that case it was held that a contract guarantying "the redemption" of corporate shares three years after date of issue was a provable claim, although the time for redemption had not arrived at date of bankruptcy.

It is sufficient that a claim becomes provable as a consequence of bankruptcy. The right to sue for and recover damages then accrues. As Judge Lowell puts it in Re Pettingill, cited above: "For admission to proof, however, the claim need not arise before bankruptcy, nor need the contract be broken theretofore. It is sufficient for proof if the breach of contract and bankruptcy are coincident."

The creditor by offering to file his claim manifests his election to treat the contract as broken. This the court held he might do. The decree in each case is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

T. J. CRAWFORD

v.

J. M. CRAWFORD.

(— Ga. —, 67 S. E. 673.)

Fraud — fiduciary relation — brothers.

1. The fact that the plaintiff and the defendant are brothers does not of itself create a confidential or fiduciary relation between them. There is no presumption that such relation exists between brothers solely from the fact that they are so related. If a confidential or fiduciary relation exists between brothers, it must be shown by proof; and the burden is upon the party asserting the existence of such relationship to affirmatively show the same.

Headnotes by HOLDEN, J.

Limitation of action — fraud — injury to property.

2. Where one practises upon another fraud and deceit, whereby the latter is induced to accept property in settlement of a debt much greater in amount than the value of the property, an injury is done to property, and not to the person, and the statute of limitations in reference to actions for injuries to property applies.

Same — proper diligence — pleading.

3. Where an action is brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted to the plaintiff in consequence of the perpetration of fraud charged to have been practised upon him by the defendant, the cause of action, as stated in the declaration, being apparently barred by the statute of limitations, and it is sought to relieve such action of the bar of the statute by alleging that it was brought within the statutory period after the discovery of the fraud, if it does not appear from the petition that the plaintiff used proper diligence to discover the fraud, the petition should be dismissed upon appropriate demurrer thereto.

CROSS WRITS of error to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for alleged fraud in the settlement of a debt, the defendant by his cross writ seeking review of an order overruling a demurrer to the petition. Main writ dismissed. Judgment on cross writ reversed.

Statement by Holden, J.:

The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant, making substantially the following allegations: They are brothers, and were

Note. — Is action based on fraud governed by statute of limitations applicable to injury to property or injury to the person.

Aside from CRAWFORD v. CRAWFORD, but very little authority has been found on the question here presented.

In Miller v. Wood, 41 Hun, 600, it was held that an action brought to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of fraudulent representations made by the defendant, whereby the former was induced to purchase at its face value a mortgage which was in fact worthless, was governed by the statute of limitations ap-born and reared in the same county. The defendant is six years older than the plaintiff. The plaintiff came to Atlanta in 1892, and the defendant a number of years prior thereto, both for the purpose of engaging in the practice of medicine. Prior to the plaintiff's removal to Atlanta he loaned the defendant, in 1890 or 1891, $2,500, and took his note for the same. After such removal, he loaned the defendant various other sums until January 1, 1896, which at that time, with the prior loan, aggregated $5,000, on which date the defendant gave the plaintiff a note for $5,000, due one day after date. The defendant asked the plaintiff to deal in stocks, with the latter's money, with the understanding that the defendant would sustain the losses, and they would equally divide any profits made. During the first six months of 1895 the plaintiff invested in stocks for a short time and made profits of $70, one half of which was paid to the defendant. Later on plaintiff lost $800, which defendant refused to pay, and has never paid. During the summer of 1896 defendant repeatedly told plaintiff's wife that "he was badly involved financially; that he intended to let his creditors take his property, for the reason that he was unable to pay what he owed." Plaintiff went to defendant on or about October 12, 1896, for the purpose of collecting the money due him. Defendant told plaintiff that "he owed large sums of money that he was unable to pay; that he was insolvent, and would lose everything that he had;" that defendant's wife owned a lot covered by a mortgage to secure $2,000, which she would convey in settlement of the indebtedness; and that, if plaintiff did not accept this proposition, he would lose such indebtedness. Plaintiff was raised with defendant, and had gone to school to the defendant, and had implicit confidence in him. Plaintiff accepted the proposition, and on or about October 12, 1896, defendant's wife conveyed the lot to plaintiff's wife; the latter assuming the mortgage thereon. The lot was worth $3,500, less the amount secured by the mortgage, and plaintiff received only $1,500, less $35 interest paid on the debt secured by the mortgage. Defendant at the time of the conveyance stated that there was $35 interest due on the note secured by the mortgage, and that he did not have the money with which to pay the same; and it was paid by the plaintiff. Plaintiff continued to rely on and believe the statements of the defendant until September, 1903. "Petitioner alleges that he continued to rely on and believe the statements of said defendant hereinbefore alleged and set forth, until September, 1903, when he went to defendant, knowing that he had been successful, and believing that he had emerged from the insolvency which he had declared to petitioner was hanging over him in 1896, and demanded of the said defendant the payment of the said balances due him. There were a number of conferences between defendant and petitioner. Your petitioner urged that he was entitled to the full payment of the money due him, and recalled the statements which defendant had made at the time of the settlement. Finally negotiations and conferences came to an end, when defendant denied that he had represented himself to be insolvent, and stated to your petitioner that he was 'twenty-one,' meaning that your petitioner was twenty-one years of age at the time of said settlement. For the first time petitioner's confidence in defendant was shaken. Petitioner had never doubted defendant's statements, nor the claim that he was insolvent in 1896, until he denied having made the statements. Your petitioner then employed an attorney and investigated the financial condition and responsibility of the defendant in 1896, when he claimed to be insolvent and unable to pay his debts. The result of this investigation disclosed to your petitioner for the first time since the plicable to actions for "injuries to property." The court said: "As an action for damages, it is within the six years' limitation, and is consequently barred unless it is excepted by the statute from that limitation. The six years' limitation applies to an action to recover damages for an injury to property (Code Civ. Proc. § 382, sub. 3), and 'an injury to property' is defined by the Code to be 'an actionable act, whereby the estate of another is lessened, other than a personal injury or the breach of a contract.' § 3343, sub. 10. By this circumlocutory process, the Code brings an action to recover damages for fraud and deceit within the six years' limitation." This case was affirmed in 116 N. Y. 351, 22 N. E. 553.

So, in Laufer v. Sayles, 5 App. Div. 582, 39 N. Y. Supp. 377, it was said that if a 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

claim as to a deed which was alleged never to have been executed was treated as an action for damages for the fraudulent procurement of a deed, and the consequent destruction of plaintiff's title, it would be an action for "injury to property," and governed by the statute of limitations applicable to such injuries.

In Dunn v. Miller, 96 Mo. 324, 9 S. W. 640, where an owner of property was dispossessed because of a suit of ejectment based upon a forged deed, it was held that a suit in equity, brought by him to cancel the forged deed and annul the judgment in ejectment, was governed by the statute of limitations applicable to "real actions," and not the statute applicable to "personal actions."

settlement was made that said defendant was solvent and able to pay all he owed, including his indebtedness to petitioner, at the time he claimed to be insolvent and unable to pay. Petitioner's attorney then took the matter up with defendant, and finally an agreement to arbitrate the matter was reached. Petitioner's counsel prepared a submission to arbitration in writing, which was satisfactory to petitioner, and presented the same to defendant for his signature. Said defendant refused to go further with the arrangement, saying that he had been advised by his attorney that the claims of petitioner were barred by the statutes of limitations. Petitioner avers that each and every statement made by defendant to petitioner's wife, as hereinbefore alleged, was false when made, and was known by said defendant to be false, and that said statements were made for the purpose of having them repeated to your petitioner, and to create alarm upon his part concerning the money due him by said defendant. Your petitioner alleges that the statements made to him by defendant, that he was owing large sums of money, that he was insolvent and unable to pay what he owed, and that he would lose everything he had, and that your petitioner would lose what defendant owed him unless he accepted the property aforesaid in settlement, were false when made, and defendant knew that they were false when made. Said statements were made for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding your petitioner, and did deceive and defraud him. As a result of the aforesaid false and fraudulent statements, your petitioner was defrauded, injured, and damaged to the amount and value of $4,335; that at the time of said settlement defendant was due petitioner the principal sum of $588; that in said settlement he received property of the value of $1,500 only; that the statement of defendant that he was unable to pay the interest on the note was false, and was made as a part of the scheme and plan adopted by defendant to deceive and defraud your petitioner. Petitioner alleges that J. M. Crawford was solvent on the 1st day of January, 1896; that he has been solvent at all times since said date, and that he is solvent now; that defendant did not owe large sums of money which he was unable to pay in October, 1896; that he was able to pay all he owed on said date; and that he took advantage of your petitioner, and of their relations of confidence, friendship, and relationship which had existed from childhood. Petitioner alleges that on the 12th day of October, 1896, defendant did owe sums of money, but how much and to whom your petitioner does not know; but your petitioner alleges that said defendant was able to pay all such sums, and that he did pay all such sums in full, and that he did not let his creditors take his property because he was unable to pay what he owed at the time, but that he retained his property and paid all he owed. Since the fall of 1903, when your petitioner first discovered the frauds herein alleged, numerous conferences have occurred between defendant and petitioner regarding the matter, and that on the 17th day of October, 1906, they entered into an agreement to arbitrate all differences of a financial nature between them; that the matters herein complained of comprise all differences of a financial nature between defendant and himself; and that the agreement or submission was entered into for the purpose of submitting these matters to arbitration. Petitioner attaches a copy of said submission hereto, marked 'Exhibit A,' and makes the same a part of this petition. Petitioner alleges that he has fully complied with the terms of said submission, that he selected an arbitrator within the time stipulated, and notified said defendant of the selection and of the name of the party selected, and requested him to make his selection and notify the party selected by your petitioner; but that said defendant refused, and still refuses, to make his selection. Petitioner avers that said defendant has committed a breach of said agreement. And your petitioner denies that his action is barred by the statute of limitations; but avers that, if there has been any question concerning the limitation, the conduct of the defendant, his agreement above referred to, and the breach thereof, brought the causes of action within the statute. Petitioner brings this action of deceit; and prays that he be awarded judgment against said defendant for amounts in damages equal to the sums of which the said defendant defrauded him, with interest thereon." The agreement to submit the matters between the plaintiff and the defendant to arbitration, signed by both of them, referred to no particular debt, but referred generally to "certain matters of financial differences" between them.

The defendant filed a demurrer upon the following grounds: "(1) That no cause of action is set out in said petition. (2) That said petition shows on its face that part of the sum claimed, to wit, $800, is an alleged debt arising out of a transaction involving speculating in futures, and for that reason is illegal, and cannot be recovered in law. (3) That said petition shows that as to the other amount claimed to be due by this defendant, the same was long since settled by defendant with petitioner, and no indebtedness on account of same now exists. (4) That said petition shows on its face that the statute of limitation has run against any and all of the indebtedness claimed to be due by defendant to petitioner. (5) Defendant further demurs to the petition on the ground that it is really an effort on the part of petitioner to rescind the trade or settlement made with defendant in reference to the claimed indebtedness of $5,000, and that the petitioner discloses that no offer has ever been made by petitioner to rescind said trade or settlement, nor is there any offer in the petition to rescind said trade or settlement, and to give back to petitioner the property which was received under said trade or settlement." The demurrer was overruled. Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted. The defendant filed a crossbill of exceptions to the ruling on the demurrer.

Fraud which must have been discovered if usual and reasonable diligence had been exercised is not a good reply to the statute of limitations.

It is not enough to show that fraud was not discovered. It must also be shown that it could not have been discovered if usual and reasonable diligence to discover it had been exercised.

Holden, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The fact that the plaintiff and the defendant are brothers does not of itself create a confidential or fiduciary relation between them. There is no presumption that such relation exists between brothers, arising solely from the fact that they are so 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

related. If a confidential or fiduciary relation exists between brothers, it must be shown by proof; and the burden is upon the party asserting the existence of such relationship to affirmatively show the same. The facts that the defendant is six years the senior of the plaintiff, that they were reared together, and that the plaintiff attended a school taught by the defendant, are not sufficient to establish a confidential or fiduciary relation between them. Nothing appears showing a controlling influence by the defendant over the will, conduct, and interests of the plaintiff, nor does it appear that any trust relation existed between them, such as that of partners, or principal and agent, nor any other relation which would warrant the conclusion that they occupied towards each other what is known in law as a confidential relation. It appears from the petition that the plaintiff came to Atlanta some years prior to the transaction complained of, for the purpose of practising the medical profession, which would indicate that at the time the transaction occurred on which the suit is predicated, the plaintiff was not only a man of mature years, but engaged in a profession the practice of which requires more than ordinary intellectual capacity. On the subject of confidential relations, see Civil Code 1895, § 4030; Shevlin v. Shevlin, 96 Minn. 398, 105 N. W. 257; Smith, Fr., § 102.

2. In the briefs filed by counsel for the defendant in error, it is insisted that the plaintiff is barred from his action in any event, inasmuch as the facts giving rise thereto were discovered in 1903, and suit was not commenced until 1906, three years thereafter. They contend that the statute of limitations applicable to the case is that prescribed in Civil Code 1895, § 3900, which requires the bringing of actions "for injuries done to the person" within two years after the right of action accrues. We do not consider that deceit practised upon another, whereby he is simply induced to incur a financial loss, can be classed as an "injury done to the person." Counsel cite the cases of Johnson v. Bradstreet Co. 87 Ga. 79, 13 S. E. 250; Hutcherson v. Durden, 113 Ga. 987, 54 L.R.A. 811, 39 S. E. 495; Gordon v. West, 129 Ga. 532, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 549, 59 S. E. 232, which they contend make it appear that deceit is an injury to the person. The Johnson Case, supra, was an action for libel, and this character of action was held to be an action for injury to the person, so as to fall within the provision of law that no action "for homicide, injury to person, or injury to property shall abate by death." In the Hutcherson Case, supra, it was ruled that an action for seduction was for an injury

"done to the person," and was barred unless brought within two years after the accrual of the right of action. And in the Gordon Case, supra, a similar ruling was made with respect to an action for false imprisonment, malicious use of process, or malicious abuse of process. All wrongs of the character dealt with in these decisions involve an infringement of one of the primary rights of man, namely, that of "security of person." This class of wrongs, notwithstanding the fact that the person upon whom they are inflicted may not suffer any actual injury, necessarily violate the right of the injured party to protection in the security of his person; and, as was pointed out in the cases above cited, are properly classed as "injuries to the person." Mr. Hilliard, in his work on Torts, classifies separately "torts to persons" and "torts to property," treating among the former wrongs of the same and kindred nature with those dealt with in the decisions referred to supra, while among the latter he includes "fraud" as a wrong to property. "Deceit" is, of course, a species of fraud. See 1 Hilliard, Torts, 464; 2 Id. 137. We cannot conceive of instances where fraud and deceit practised on another would result in an injury to the person; and perhaps it was for this reason that, in arranging the divisions of our Civil Code, fraud and deceit were dealt with in the chapter (Civil Code 1895, title 9, chap. 1) headed, "Injuries to Person or Property." In a New York case (Cleveland v. Barrows, 59 Barb. 364), which involved an action for fraud and deceit, the contention was made that "the term 'injury to property,' as used in the Code, must be construed to mean a direct, corporeal damage or wrong done to specific property, and not to the mere personal rights, or 'rights of property.'" On page 374 of 59 Barb., the court said: "By referring to the cause of action as stated in the complaint, it will be seen that it is there alleged that, in consequence of the defendant's false and fraudulent statements and representations, the plaintiff was induced to pay, and did pay, $1,900 for the property, which was not worth at the time over $900. The presumption is from the allegations in the complaint that the plaintiff paid the purchase price in money. What he has paid, therefore, over and above the value of the property purchased, the defendant has obtained wrongfully, by means of his fraud. Fraud is a wrong, and, if a party thereby obtains from another property, it is an injury to the property of such other, in the same sense precisely as though the wrongdoer had taken the property tortiously and converted it."

is said: "Torts to the person, . . . include (1) bodily injuries, whether direct, as assault and battery, or consequential, resulting from negligence or otherwise; (2) injuries to the health or comfort of an individual; (3) torts which affect personal liberty." On page 912 of the same work, when speaking of "Torts to Personal Property," the following text is employed: "It may readily be conceded that where a rightful possession of goods and chattels has once been gained, either by a just occupancy or by a legal transfer, whoever, whether by force or fraud, dispossesses the holder of them, is guilty of a tort, remediable by action; 'for,' as remarked by Blackstone, 'there must be an end of all social commerce between man and man unless private possession be secured from unjust invasion; and, if an acquisition of goods by either force or fraud were allowed to be a sufficient title, all property would soon be confined to the most strong or the most cunning, and the weak and simple-minded part of mankind (which is by far the most numerous division) could never be secure of their possessions.'" The act of 1767, prescribing certain limitations for actions (Cobb's Dig. p. 559), made no reference to injuries to either person or property. It created a bar of four years for "actions upon the case," and this was the class of actions in which at common law relief might be had for damages resulting from fraud and deceit. Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 343. Under that act, therefore, an action of the character we are now dealing with would not have been barred until the expiration of four years from the accrual of the right of action; and four years was treated as the period of limitation governing an action for deceit in the sale of promissory notes with a representation of the maker's solvency, in a case decided by this court in which the right of action accrued while the act of 1767 was of force. Pledger v. Coulter, 26 Ga. 443. That act was supplanted by the act of the general assembly approved March 6, 1856 (Acts 1855-56, p. 233), from which latter act the limitations now embodied in the Code were taken. The act of 1856 made no reference to actions upon the case, but, in prescribing therein certain limitations of actions, made the classifications of "suits for damages to real estate," "suits for injuries to personal property," and "suits for injuries done to the person," prescribing a bar of four years for the two former, and of two years for the last named. There is nothing in this act to indicate any intention on the part of the legislature to change the period of limitation of four years which previously applied to actions for fraud and deceit (as being actions upon the case) to one of two years, unless it could be said that such actions could not be classed otherwise than as "injuries done to the person." It is the right of action which the statute bars. Deceit alone—which is practised on the person—gives no rights of action. There must be a resultant damage to create such right. Civil Code 1895, § 3813, is as follows: "Fraud by one, accompanied with damage to the party defrauded, in all cases gives a right of action." Section 3814 declares: "Wilful representation of a material fact, made to induce another to act, and upon which he does act to his injury, will give a right of action." The damage or injury (in the present case alleged to have been to the personalty of the plaintiff) is certainly one of the elements of the right of action, and it is this element which determines what limitation shall control. While we have been unable to find any case in our reports in which was raised the point made in the present case, namely, that deceit is an "injury done to the person," and therefore barred in two years, there are several decisions in suits for damages on account of fraud and deceit which treat the period in which this form of action can be brought as being governed by the nature of the damages suffered. See Cade v. Burton, 35 Ga. 280; Knox v. Yow, 91 Ga. 367, 17 S. E. 654; Kirkley v. Sharp, 98 Ga. 484, 25 S. E. 562; Little v. Reynolds, 101 Ga. 594, 28 S. E. 919; American Nat. Bank v. Fidelity & D. Co. 129 Ga. 126, 58 S. E. 867, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 666. The headnote in the case of Cade v. Burton, supra, is as follows: "If one makes a sale of land by deed without warranty, but representing it to be his own, and afterwards convey the same land to a bona fide purchaser without notice, the period of limitations applicable to an action against him for the fraud is the same as that which would apply to an action for the land, to wit, seven years from the discovery of the fraud." We conclude that the plaintiff in the present case had a right to bring his action within four years from the time the statute commences to run against his alleged right of action, as the damages sued for resulted from an injury to the personal property of the plaintiff, and not from an injury to his person.

3. The defendant demurred to the petition on the ground that, if the plaintiff ever had any right of action, the same was barred by the statute of limitation, and contends that this demurrer should have been sustained. The plaintiff complains that the defendant, by falsely and fraudulently representing that his financial condition was such that he could not pay his debts, induced the plaintiff, who relied upon such representations, to accept property worth $3,500 (and 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) encumbered for $2,000) for a debt amounting to $5,000. The plaintiff alleged that these representations were false and were made for the purpose of deceiving, and did deceive, the plaintiff, and caused him the loss of the balance of his debt. This transaction occurred in 1896. The plaintiff alleges that he did not discover that the representations of the defendant were false, and that he was solvent and able to pay his debts in 1896 until seven years thereafter, in 1903. It is true that fraud by one, accompanied by damage to the party defrauded, gives a right of action; and it is generally true that, where the plaintiff has been deterred or debarred from his action by reason of fraud on the part of the other party, the statute of limitations does not run until the discovery of the fraud. However, fraud which tolls the statute of limitations must be such fraud as could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence, where there is no confidential or fiduciary relation existing between the parties, or other facts which will excuse the failure to act. As hereinabove stated, the allegations in the petition do not set forth facts showing a fiduciary or confidential relation existing between the parties to this case. The petition shows on its face that the plaintiff's right of action was barred, unless it was true that he could not have discovered the fraud by the exercise of reasonable diligence. The suit was brought ten years after the time the fraud was alleged to have been perpetrated upon the plaintiff. He alleges that he did not discover the fraud until seven years after the time of its perpetration. There is no allegation that he could not have discovered it sooner by the exercise of reasonable diligence. It was held in the case of Edwards v. Smith, 102 Ga. 19, 29 S. E. 129: "Where an action is brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted to the plaintiff in consequence of the perpetration of a fraud charged to have been practised upon him by the defendant, the cause of action, as stated in the declaration, being apparently barred by the statute of limitations, and it is sought to relieve such action of the bar of the statute by alleging that it was brought within the statutory period after the discovery of the fraud, a mere declaration that the plaintiff 'used all diligence he could' to discover the fraud, without alleging that he was in fact diligent, how and in what manner he was diligent, and the extent of the efforts made by him to discover the fraud alleged, is not sufficient to relieve the case from the bar of the statute of limitations; and the action was properly dismissed upon demurrer." See also Thornton v. Jackson, 129 Ga. 700, 59 S. E. 905; Sutton v. Dye, 60 Ga. 449;

9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 692; 13 Id. 245; 20 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 102. We think the court committed error in overruling the demurrer on the ground that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. As the court committed error in not sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition, everything occurring thereafter was nugatory; and the judgment in the cross bill of exceptions must be reversed, and the main bill, to the order of nonsuit, dismissed. There is no merit in the other grounds of demurrer, and the court committed no error in overruling them.

Judgment on cross bill of exceptions reversed. Main bill of exceptions dismissed.

All the Justices concur.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

HARRY G. CHENEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

WILLIS P. DICKINSON et al.

(96 C. C. A. 314, 172 Fed. 109.)

Corporation — false report — reliance upon — liability.

Officers of a corporation who issued a fraudulent prospectus to sell treasury stock are not liable in damages for the fraud to one who, in reliance upon it, purchases from an individual stock which is owned by him, and in which the corporation has no interest.

(April 13, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the issuing by defendants of a fraudulent prospectus. Affirmed.

Statement by Baker, Circuit Judge:

Plaintiff in error, who was plaintiff below, seeks the reversal of a judgment based on a directed verdict for the defendants. One Flagler was also named as a defendant in the declaration; but he was not served with process and did not appear, so the case was tried without him.

The declaration (in outline) charged that the defendants, including Flagler, organized a corporation with charter powers to manufacture and sell steel tubes and other steel and iron products; that they constituted themselves officers and directors; that they confederated and conspired to defraud the plaintiff and all others they could induce to purchase shares in said corporation, by making deceitful and fraudulent statements in prospectuses and otherwise; that to carry out their conspiracy they made certain statements and representations to the plaintiff which were material with respect to the value of the stock; that such statements were false and fraudulent, and were known at the time by the defendants to be false and fraudulent, and were made by the defendants for the express purpose of deceiving and defrauding the plaintiff; that the plaintiff believed said representations to be true; that, relying thereon, "he purchased from

Note. — Liability of officers or promoters of a corporation to one who purchases stock from an individual in reliance on a prospectus issued to induce purchase of treasury stock.

The conclusion reached in the above case, that officers of a corporation who issue a false prospectus to sell treasury stock are not liable therefor to one who, in reliance thereon, purchased from an individual stock which was owned by him, finds support in Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377, 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 527, in which it was held that the directors of an intended company, who, for the purpose of selling stock, issued to the public a prospectus containing misrepresentations of fact, were not liable to one who, after the original allotment of shares had been made, purchased shares from an individual owner thereof, in reliance upon the prospectus. Lord Chelmsford declared that a purchaser of shares in the market, upon the faith of a prospectus which he had not received from those answerable for it, could not, by action upon it, so connect himself with them as to render them liable to him 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) for the misrepresentations contained in it, as if it had been addressed personally to himself.

And the conclusion reached in Peek v. Gurney, supra, was approved by the court in Greene v. Mercantile Trust Co. 60 Misc. 189, 111 N. Y. Supp. 802 (affirmed without opinion in 128 App. Div. 914, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1131), in discussing the liability of the defendants for misrepresentations made in a prospectus issued and circulated by them for the purpose of inducing the public to purchase bonds, to one who, in reliance upon the statements contained in such prospectus, purchased stock in such corporation in the open market. It was declared to be the law that where a false prospectus was addressed to a limited class who only were the persons intended to be influenced, then, as a rule, persons outside that class, with whom those making the statements had no dealings, but who might have been injured by reliance thereon, could not maintain an action upon them for fraud and deceit. A demurrer, however, was overruled to a complaint which, in addition to the allegations of the issuing of the false pro-

the defendants 100 shares of the supposed treasury stock of the Flagler Iron & Steel Company, of the par value of $10,000, and paid therefor the sum of $10,000; that he now has in his possession certificates for said stock, ready to be produced in court, and surrendered to the defendants as the court may direct." The declaration also alleged that the entire issue of 30,000 shares of preferred stock and all of the 20,000 shares of common stock, except 10 shares, subscribed and paid for in money so as to qualify the subscribers to serve as directors, were issued by the present defendants, acting as a board of directors, to the aforesaid Flagler, as full-paid and nonassessable shares in payment for a worthless iron mine, and "that said stock was issued to Flagler, and divided between him and the other defendants; that the treasury of the company never did own the stock, and never received the money that was obtained from the sale of the stock, and none of the money paid by the plaintiff for his stock went into the treasury of the company;" and "that the stock was, at the time of the sale of the same to the plaintiff, absolutely worthless and of no value whatever."

The prospectus, after setting forth descriptions of the character and value of mineral lands and manufacturing plants (which the evidence tends to prove were false), proceeds: "The company has now in its treasury for sale stock (not taken) to the amount of 30,000 shares,—25,000 shares preferred, 5,000 shares common,—to be sold from time to time, as needed for construction purposes. For further information regarding terms of our securities and any other data, please address or call at the company's offices. Flagler Iron & Steel Company, Rooms 1322-23, First National Bank Building, Chicago, Illinois."

A letter from the plaintiff to the company reads as follows: "My attention has been called to your company as a good investment for funds, and I shall be glad if you will send me full particulars regarding terms of purchase of preferred stock and bonus of common stock, as well as price of common. I should like to know what would be the earliest date you expect to begin to pay dividends on the preferred. Please give me any other information I may require for proper consideration of purchase."

A long letter to the plaintiff signed by the company, "by W. P. Dickinson, V. P. & T.," contained the following: "Replying to your favor of December 19th, we regard the common and preferred stock a good investment. . . . Our mills Nos. 1 and 2 are built and we are now installing machinery. We shall sell about $500,000 more stock for equipment purposes and working capital. . . . The price of the stock is par, common or preferred. We have not sold a share of stock to anybody for less than its face, and we have authorized no one to sell any stock for less than its face, and we have given no bonus to anybody. We aim to make this a manufacturing proposition worth the money. We want you to pay for what you get, and we expect to keep it good. . . . We shall be glad to have you come out (from your home in Connecticut) and look the proposition over, and make any investigation that you feel like, and take some of our stock if you are satisfied that we are all right. We are sending you under separate cover a prospectus of our company, which we would like to have you take the time to read." The omitted parts of the letter relate to representations of the character and value of the company's assets.

Other matters of evidence, as well as of lack of evidence, so far as they are deemed pertinent to the decision, are stated in the opinion.

spectus and the purchase of stock by the complainant, alleged that the prospectus was prepared and issued "with intent that the statements contained in said prospectus should be believed and relied on by the public and by the plaintiff, and that the public and the plaintiff should be thereby induced to purchase the bonds and stocks of the . . . company."

In Andrews v. Mockford [1896] 1 Q. B. 372, it was held that the promoter of a company who issued a false prospectus, not merely to induce the application of an allotment of shares, but also to induce persons to purchase shares in the market, and who followed up such prospectus with published false representations to the same effect as those in the prospectus, with the direct intent of inducing persons to purchase the shares of the company, was li- 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

able to one to whom the prospectus was sent, and who, in reliance upon the prospectus and the subsequent publication, purchased shares in the open market after the allotment. Peek v. Gurney, supra, was relied upon by the defendants, but the court held it inapplicable to the facts of that case, though the correctness of its conclusion under the circumstances was not questioned. Lord Justice Rigby declared that it was undoubted that if a prospectus was issued for the sole purpose of obtaining subscriptions for the original capital of the company, or for any subsequent issue of shares, people who did not respond to that invitation, and did not act upon it in the way in which it was intended to be acted upon, but who afterwards bought shares in the open market, could not, in an action for fraud, rely on false statements in the prospectus.

Argued before Baker, Seaman, and Kohl-saat, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Almon W. Buckley for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John J. Herrick, Horace H. Martin, Charles L. Allen, Horace K. Tenney, and Frank E. Harkness, for defendants in error Head and Simpson:

A director of a corporation is not liable in an action for deceit for false representations made in a prospectus or other statement with reference to the affairs of the corporation, unless he actually participates in the fraud.

Representations, in order to create a legal liability for damages, must relate to a past or existing fact, and not to the effect of transactions or to results which may be expected, or to the cost or value of property.

Where the plaintiff does not rely solely upon the representations, but afterward investigates the matter, he is held to rely upon his investigations, and not upon the representations; and if he is not prevented by the defendant from making a full investigation, he cannot hold the latter liable for the falsity of the original statement.

Messrs. E. W. Froelich, Warren B. Wilson, and Samuel M. Sutloff for other defendants in error.

Baker, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

A person who finds that he has parted with his money through being fraudulently led into a purchase may pursue either one of two remedies at law. He may repudiate the purchase, surrender the property to the vendor, and recover the consideration. Such an action manifestly can be maintained only against the party from whom he purchased the property, and to whom (or to whose order) he paid the consideration. Or he may affirm and abide by the purchase, retain the property, and recover the difference between what he paid and the value of what he received and is retaining. Such an action can be maintained against anyone (vendor or third party, indifferently) who intentionally deceived the plaintiff into making the purchase. In such an action it is immaterial whether the defendant did or did not receive the consideration or other benefit, because the gravamen of the action is that the plaintiff has been deceived to his injury, not that the defendant has profited by the transaction. The difference between the two actions is not merely technical; in substance they are as far apart as affirmance and repudiation. Wilson v. New United States Cattle Ranch Co. 20 C. C. A. 244, 36 U. S. App. 634, 73 Fed. 994; Kingman & Co. v. Stoddard, 29 C. C. A. 413, 57 U. S. App. 379, 85 Fed. 740; Simon v. Goodyear Metallic Rubber Shoe Co. 52 L.R.A. 745, 44 C. C. A. 612, 105 Fed. 573; Westerfeld v. New York L. Ins. Co. 129 Cal. 68, 58 Pac. 92, 61 Pac. 667.

The declaration in this case bears some evidence that it is an attempted mixture of the two irreconcilable theories. The allegations that the defendants' fraud led the plaintiff to purchase the shares from the defendants, and that the plaintiff brings the certificate of shares into court for surrender to the defendants, point to an action to recover from the defendants the consideration paid to them on a sale which plaintiff repudiates on account of fraud. If these allegations are ignored, as being surplusage, there may remain enough in the declaration to state a good cause of action for deceit. And inasmuch as the declaration was not questioned by motion or otherwise, and the motions for directed verdict were based solely on the contention that the evidence failed to establish a cause of action (without regard to the theory of the declaration), we have examined the evidence to determine its sufficiency to make a prima facie case on either theory.

The undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff received the stock from and paid his money to one Costelo, a Boston broker of stocks and bonds; that Costelo was not the agent or representative of the company, or of any of the present defendants; that the stock sold through Costelo was the property of Flagler, and that Flagler received the consideration; that the defendants knew nothing of the sale from Flagler to the plaintiff, were not interested directly or indirectly in the shares that were so sold, and received no part of the consideration. In short, there was an utter failure of proof to sustain the first above stated theory of liability.

Evidence was introduced which tended to prove that a charter was legally obtained; that the defendants, as directors, carried through a bargain with Flagler by which all the stock (except 10 qualifying shares) was issued to Flagler as full paid and nonassessable, in consideration whereof Flagler turned into the company's treasury at least 15,000 of said shares, and agreed to convey to the company a certain so-called mine; that the company held options on certain grounds and buildings which the defendants hoped would be useful in creating the business for which the company was chartered; that, of the stock which Flagler retained, certain amounts were distributed among the defendants gratuitously; that the defendants intended that the stock in the treasury should be sold by the treasurer to the public for the purpose of raising money with which to try the experiment of making their otherwise worthless stock valuable; that the treasurer, in endeavoring to sell treasury stock, issued a prospectus which consisted mainly of false and misleading statements; that some of the defendants actually knew the statements were false, and others were conscious that they had no knowledge that the statements were true (Lehigh Zinc & I. Co. v. Bamford, 150 U. S. 665, 673, 37 L. ed. 1215, 1217, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 219); that the plaintiff, in buying, relied on the truthfulness of the statements in the prospectus and in the treasurer's letter; and that plaintiff was damaged to the extent of the purchase money because the stock was valueless.

As already stated, the plaintiff bought of a broker who was selling stock owned solely by Flagler. Not only was no purchase made by the plaintiff of treasury stock, or of stock in which the defendants were otherwise interested, but the record fails to show any legal ground for the plaintiff even to claim that he was buying treasury stock. On the contrary, the letter of the treasurer was explicit notice that the broker, in offering stock to the plaintiff at 50 cents on the dollar, must be dealing in stock that had already left the treasury.

Only one inference can be drawn from the prospectus. The defendants were inviting everyone into whose hands the prospectus should come to buy treasury stock. This was in aid of the conspiracy, and the only conspiracy, which the evidence tended to sustain. And to all persons who bought treasury stock,—who paid their money into the fund over which the defendants had a control and interest in common,—relying on 28 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the truth of the statements of fact in the prospectus, all of the defendants who were parties to the false statements might well be held answerable in damages. But the plaintiff, so far as the defendants were concerned, was a purchaser on the market. And while the sponsors for false prospectuses that are issued to bring in money to the common treasury are justly made to respond to all persons who take the invited action, yet the law recognizes no right of action in one who relies without invitation on a statement addressed to a particular class which he stays out of. Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 377; Wells v. Cook, 16 Ohio St. 67, 88 Am. Dec. 436; Hunnewell v. Duxbury, 154 Mass. 286, 13 L.R.A. 733, 28 N. E. 267; Hindman v. First Nat. Bank, 57 L.R.A. 108, 50 C. C. A. 623, 112 Fed. 931. "It has never been a ground of action that the defendant made a dishonest representation, and that the plaintiff had relied upon it and sustained injury. The moral obligation to speak the truth is not ground for a civil action unless the misrepresentation was intended to induce the very action by the plaintiff which has resulted in his damage." By the prospectus the defendants intended merely to induce the plaintiff or any other reader of it to pay his money into the treasury, and receive stock from the company as seller. And the letters between the plaintiff and the company do not change the situation in the slightest. The plaintiff did not frankly disclose what he was thinking of doing. On the contrary, he asked the company to name the price at which it would sell him stock,—just what the company would expect from anyone who had been attracted by seeing or being told of the prospectus. The company's letter in reply incloses another copy of the prospectus, repeats the representations thereof largely, and invites the plaintiff to buy some of the stock which the company is selling "for equipment purposes and working capital." Plaintiff's purchase of Flagler stock at 50 cents was not only outside of the action invited by the prospectus and letter, but was destructive of the defendants' endeavor to place treasury stock at 100 cents. So the case, on the evidence touching this branch of it, comes to this: While the defendants' deceit may afford a ground of action in favor of those who were misled into paying their money (or property) into the treasury for stock sold by the company, the deceit does not run with the stock into the hands of subsequent transferees.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE DRY GOODS COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

J. W. LANMAN et al.

(135 Ky. 163, 121 S. W. 1042.)

Sale — fraud of purchaser — remedy.

1. The purchase by an insolvent of goods on credit without disclosing the facts that he has given a mortgage upon his present and future property, to secure an existing indebtedness, is such fraud as to give the vendor a right to avoid the sale and sue to recover the property, or to recover the value of the goods from the purchaser in an action for fraud, with the remedies afforded by statute in such cases, or to proceed against him in bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy — discharge — effect on fraudulent debt.

2. A debtor who has secured goods with the fraudulent intention not to pay for them cannot avoid an action in the state court for fraud by securing a discharge in bank-

Note. — Is state court's jurisdiction of creditor's attack on preference ousted by bankruptcy proceedings commenced more than four months after preference.

The question as to the right of a creditor of a bankrupt to set aside a transfer in fraud of creditors is considered in the note to Ruhl-Koblegard Co. v. Gillespie, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 305. Attention should be called, in this connection, to the difference between preferences and fraudulent conveyances. This difference will become apparent when it is considered that, with respect to preferences, the bankruptcy act makes them voidable only, whereas, in the case of fraudulent transfers, the statute makes them absolutely void, and provides that the trustee shall, upon his appointment and qualification, be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt to all property transferred by him in fraud of creditors. See § 70a (4).

The word "preference," as used in the foregoing title, has reference to transactions which enable any one of the debtor's creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class, within § 60a of the bankruptcy statute, but which are not voidable by the trustee, for the reason that the preference is not given within four months before the bankruptcy. So, too, the word "preference" is so used as to apply to transactions denominated preferences by a state statute, which are likewise not voidable by a trustee in bankruptcy.

Now, so long as no bankruptcy proceedings are instituted, the creditor has the unquestioned right to pursue any remedy which a state statute defining a preference may grant him. But does he lose this right by virtue of the institution of bankruptcy proceedings, where the very transaction that he is attacking as a preference is not, under bankruptcy upon a voluntary petition presented by him.

Same — jurisdiction of state court.

3. Where bankruptcy proceedings are not begun within four months of the filing of a preferential mortgage, so that the Federal court has no jurisdiction thereof, the state court may, if the proceedings are begun within the prescribed time, act under a state statute which makes such mortgage, when properly attacked, operate as a voluntary assignment for the benefit of all creditors; and it is immaterial that the bankrupt has, in the meantime, secured a discharge from the bankruptcy court.

(October 26, 1909.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mercer County dismissing an action for fraud brought to recover the value of goods sold and delivered. Reversed.

the bankruptcy statute, a preference voidable by the trustee? This is the question which is indicated by the foregoing title.

It would seem at the first glance that if a creditor has the right to attack a preference in a state court, and by virtue of the provisions of a state statute, his right could not be affected by the institution of bankruptcy proceedings, where the bankruptcy act, by its very terms, excludes the transaction from attack by the trustee. But, upon the other hand, it might be contended by a preferred creditor whose preference has been attacked by another creditor in the state court, that the institution of bankruptcy proceedings operates to suspend state insolvency laws and all proceedings thereunder, and that therefore the rights of creditors are confined to such as are afforded them by the express provisions of the bankruptcy act.

Let it be supposed that there is some virtue in this contention. Is there any provision in the bankruptcy act expressly authorizing an action by a creditor in a state court? Section 60b, as amended, provides: "If a bankrupt shall have given a preference . . . it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value. . . . And for the purpose of such recovery, any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction." 32 Stat. at L. 799, chap. 487, § 13, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1909, p. 1313. Section 23b provides, among other things, that suits by the trustee shall be brought or prosecuted only in the courts where the bankrupt might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, except suits for the recovery of property under § 60b. It will be noted that § 60b authorizes the O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

J. W. Lanman was a merchant doing business at Cornishville, in Mercer county. The petition alleges: That the plaintiffs were wholesale merchants, and had sold him bills of merchandise from April to June, 1908, amounting to $473.82, and from June 23, 1908, to July 28, 1908, of $50.46; that on April 28, 1908, the defendant Lanman, being then insolvent, and with the design to prefer some of his creditors to the exclusion of the others, executed a mortgage to the Union Bank of Cornishville, Kentucky, upon a storehouse and lot situated in Cornishville, "and the stock of merchandise now within or to be within said storeroom, consisting of dry goods, boots, shoes, notions, and whatever articles there may be therein, including furniture and fixtures," to secure the bank in the sums of $1,495.75 on a note due March 8, 1908, $1,323 on a note due June 4, 1908, and $148.42 overdraft then due the bank; that these debts were in existence prior to the execution of the mortgage, and were secured by a prior pledge of thirty shares of the stock of the bank as collateral; that one S. P. De Baun had, since the filing of the suit, been subrogated to the rights of the bank by an assignment of the mortgage to him by the bank; and that the mortgage was fraudulent, and executed with the design to prefer the bank and De Baun. It is also alleged that De Baun was bound as surety on the original notes to the bank, and that the avoidance of a preference only by the trustee. Therefore the provision of § 23b can be construed to authorize an action in a state court to set aside the preference only when it is brought by the trustee. Therefore we have, by combining the two sections, the result that, as far as express authority is given, only the trustee may set aside the preference, and the only suit to set aside the preference of which the state court has jurisdiction is one instituted by the trustee.

It seems, then, that about the only question raised, if any real question can be raised, as to the right of a creditor to attack a preference which a trustee is not authorized to avoid, is this: Does the fact that the preference was given more than four months before the filing of the petition operate, upon the filing of the petition, to give the preferred creditor a vested right to the so-called preference, so as to preclude or oust an attack thereon by another creditor, upon the theory that the state insolvency laws and proceedings thereunder are superseded or suspended when the provisions of the bankruptcy act are invoked?

But one other case has been found in which this question has been considered,—Moore v. Green, 76 C. C. A. 242, 145 Fed. 472.

In this, as in LOUISVILLE DRY GOODS CO. v. LANMAN, the question was discussed in a general way, and the conclusion was not expressly made to depend upon such provisions of the statute as have been cited above. In the Moore Case there was a proceeding in the state court under the state statute which enabled a creditor to an insolvent debtor to apply to a court of equity to vacate a preference in favor of a particular creditor, and to have the conveyance declared to be for the benefit of all creditors properly joining in such suit. After the lapse of the four months' period, the debtor availed himself of the bankruptcy act. As a matter of fact, the debtor was "engaged chiefly in farming or tillage of the soil," within § 4b of an act which enumerates the persons who may become voluntary bankrupts, and the creditors were therefore without right to have them adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt, so their only recourse was to the state court, under the state statute. It was held that the creditor prosecuting such suit thereby acquired a statutory lien on the property covered by such deed, which was not affected by the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. This lien was held to exist under the provisions of § 64a (5), which gives priority to debts owed to any person who, by the laws of the state, is entitled to priority. The court said: "As to whether the relief to which the petitioner herein is entitled should have been afforded him by proceedings in the bankruptcy court, or that court should have suspended its administration so far as the portion of the assets of the bankruptcy is concerned, properly applicable to the lien of the deed, . . . is largely a matter of discretion, in the view we take. Either course could have been adopted. No question of jurisdiction was involved. The bankruptcy court clearly had jurisdiction to proceed, and, if needs be, to have stayed the prosecution of the suit in the state court for the time being; but the state court likewise, at the time of the institution of the suit therein and the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, had and still has jurisdiction, and we think, as a matter of convenience, aside from any question of comity, the better plan would have been and is to proceed with the litigation in the state court, to the end that all creditors who may desire to do so may appear therein, and assert their rights to such fund; and, in the meantime, the bankruptcy proceeding would, as to that portion of the estate, remain in abeyance: the bankruptcy court carrying out the judgment of the state court, when duly informed thereof, in said proceeding. No inconvenience would arise from this except as to this part of the fund. The bankrupt's discharge need not be withheld. Creditors have the right to assert their claim of lien irrespective of discharge; and but for the fact of its being optional with them to appear in said suit, it would really be better for the trustee in bankruptcy to interpose therein in their behalf."

mortgage covers all the property of the mortgagor. The mortgage was acknowledged on April 28, 1908, but was not recorded until July 28, 1908. This suit was begun by the filing of the petition and issual of summons on January 14, 1909. The summons was executed by personal service on Lanman, De Baun, and the Union Bank of Cornishville on January 16, 1909. On January 27, 1909, the day on which an appearance and answer were due, the defendants filed a joint answer which they term a "plea in bar," stating that on January 25, 1909, the defendant J. W. Lanman filed in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Kentucky his petition in bankruptcy; that said Lanman was thereupon on that day adjudged a bankrupt by said court, and that the affairs of the bankrupt had been referred by that court to its referee in bankruptcy. Upon that showing they prayed to be dismissed. A demurrer was filed to the answer by the plaintiffs. The circuit court overruled the demurrer. The plaintiffs declined to plead further, and their petition was dismissed. The plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal from that judgment.

We have concluded that the judgment is erroneous, when considered upon either of several grounds. The allegations of the petition in this case are not denied. They are confessed as true. It follows that J. W. Lanman was insolvent when he gave the mortgage, and inferentially, when he bought the goods for which he is sued in this case; that he designed by the mortgage to prefer the bank and De Baun to the exclusion in whole of his other creditors. What were the rights of the plaintiffs when they filed this suit? Depending upon the whereabouts of the goods, they had a choice of four courses open to them: (1) To avoid the sales to Lanman, on the ground of his actual fraud in buying the goods without intention or means of paying for them, but intending that they should, the moment they came into his possession, pass to his preferred creditor, the bank, or his favored surety at the bank, De Baun. This was such fraud as in law, at the election of the sellers, would have avoided the sale, and they could have regained their goods by detinue, or, what is the same practice under our Code, an action of claim and delivery; but perhaps the goods had been disposed of to innocent purchasers before the plaintiffs learned of the fraud. At any rate, it was at the election of the plaintiffs whether they pursued that remedy, or (2) to proceed in an action at law to recover the value of the goods from the fraudulent vendee,—not upon the contracts of sale, but upon the deceit practised upon them. And (3) the plaintiffs might pursue the additional remedy afforded by the laws of this state to sequester the debtor's property for the payment of his debts under the act of 1856 (Ky. Stat. §§ 1910-1917 [Russell's Stat. §§ 2104-2111]), or (4) proceed against him in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings in the United States district court. The last-named course would depend for its efficacy upon whether, at the time the plaintiffs learned of the deceit and of the debtor's transfer of his property, the United States court had the power, under the limitation of time prescribed by the act of Congress, to grant them full relief. These remedies are at the election of the creditors, the vendors. The plaintiffs elected to sue in the state court to pursue the second and third of the remedies outlined above. The question is: Does national bankruptcy act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418), give the United States courts exclusive jurisdiction of the affairs and property of a voluntary bankrupt under the circumstances recited above? It is remarked that the existing act defines more clearly the demarcation of the jurisdictions of the Federal and state courts, and shows more disposition to not interfere with the local jurisdiction of the latter than did act March 2, 1867, chap. 176, 14 Stat. at L. 517. Certain it is that Congress did not intend to aid fraud in any of the provisions of the act. In truth, the fraudulent were placed beyond its intended benefits, and held to the strictest accountability when their acts came within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

No debtor can be discharged in bankruptcy of a liability which grows out of his fraud. Section 17, act 1898. It was held in Classen v. Schoenemann, 80 Ill. 304, and Ames v. Moir, 130 Ill. 582, 22 N. E. 535, that if a debtor buys goods for cash on delivery, obtains possession of them without payment, and immediately ships them beyond reach of the seller, and then refuses to pay, his conduct is such as to make the debt a fraudulent one within the meaning of the bankrupt law. It is equally fraudulent, in law and morals, for one to buy goods with a positive intention not to pay for them; for if such intention were known to the vendor, he certainly would not sell. "Its suppression, therefore, is a legal fraud." Benjamin on Sales, 442, and cases collected by that author. The cases hold that such design may be inferred from the conduct and circumstances of the vendee. It is admitted here that he was insolvent, and intended to set over to certain favored persons the very goods he purchased from the plaintiffs on credit, leaving nothing with which he could pay for them, or out of which they could make their debt. That is very black fraud. As the United States district court could not have discharged Lanman from the plaintiffs' debts created by his fraud, they were at liberty to pursue him in the state courts, and obtain a personal judgment against him, even though he had been adjudged bankrupt, upon which, after the Federal court had exercised its jurisdiction, the writ of fieri facias might issue; but, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, the state court should have stayed its execution until the United States courts had finally adjudicated the bankrupt's case.

But there is still another branch of this case, of more importance than the one just discussed. That is the right of the state court to proceed to a judgment in rem, as against the property embraced in the mortgage, and as affecting the bank and De Baun. The determination of that question involves the nature of the mortgage, as it affected the debtor's property covered by it, and the rights of the plaintiffs created by that instrument in relation to that property. The statute of Kentucky (Ky. Stat. § 1910 [Russell's Stat. § 2104]), commonly known as the "act of 1856," concerning the conveyance by insolvents in contemplation of insolvency, is not a bankrupt or insolvency statute. Ebersole v. Adams, 10 Bush, 83; Downer v. Porter, 116 Ky. 423, 76 S. W. 135. It does not declare that the transaction shall be void. It operates independently of motives of fraud by the parties. It is voidable only for a specific purpose, at the instance only of creditors of the debtor making the mortgage or conveyance, and then only if they take action to that end in a court of equity within six months from the execution or recordation of the instrument. The effect of such mortgage or conveyance, if so attacked, is made by the statute to operate as voluntary assignment of all the debtor's property for the benefit of all his creditors. It is precisely as if he had executed voluntarily a deed of trust in behalf of all his creditors, conveying the title to all his property (except exemptions) to a trustee upon the express trust that the latter would sell it and pay the proceeds pro rata to his creditors. Linthicum v. Fenley, 11 Bush, 131.

It is true the act of Congress of 1898 makes both a preference by an insolvent debtor of some one or more creditors to the exclusion of others, and the execution of a voluntary deed of assignment, acts of bankruptcy; but, unless they are proceeded on as such within four months from the time when filed for record, they are not affected by the bankrupt statute. Sections 3 and 60, act Cong. 1898. But the Federal statute does not prohibit or invalidate either a preferential mortgage by an insolvent debtor, or his voluntary deed of assignment. If such mortgage is not attacked within the time which will give the bankrupt court jurisdiction of the matter, or if the assignor is not proceeded against by his creditors, or does not file his petition to be adjudged a bankrupt, within the four months allowed by the Federal statute, those instruments may be enforced, and the parties to them granted all appropriate relief by the state courts. Or, further, if the jurisdiction of the state court has been invoked, and the latter has taken jurisdiction and possession of the property, it may proceed to a final adjudication of the rights of the parties, although the United States district court may also have taken jurisdiction of the bankrupt and his affairs. Ibid.; Louisville Trust Co. v. Comingor, 184 U. S. 18, 46 L. ed. 413, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 293. It was held in Linthicum v. Fenley that the filing of the petition in the state court gave that court possession of the res, and entitled it to proceed with the case. However, there can scarcely be apprehended any conflict of jurisdiction in this matter, for, while the state court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and parties when the suit was begun down there, the Federal court did not have when the bankrupt filed his petition in that court January 25, 1909, more than four months after the mortgage had been recorded in the proper office of registry. While then the debtor may have been adjudged a bankrupt, and the United States district court had jurisdiction of his estate, it would have had to administer it, except as to conveyances and encumbrances executed or suffered within four months of the filing of the petition in that court, subject to existing liens and conveyances. Neither the act of Congress nor the statute of this state (the act of 1856) makes a preferential conveyance by an insolvent debtor void, or deems it a fraud. Each statute gives to it, if the remedy is invoked within the prescribed times, the effect of a voluntary assignment by the debtor for the benefit of all his creditors. The state statute allows two months more of time in which the conveyance may be attacked.

While this transaction was such that the bankrupt court might have acquired jurisdiction of it, and have administered the estate embraced as if the mortgage did not exist, yet it did not within the time when it might, consequently the trust created by our statute survives unaffected by the provisions of the act of Congress. The state court can and should proceed to execute the trust, by requiring the property to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment ratably of all the debts of Lanman then in existence. Property since acquired by him, and before his application in bankruptcy, will be subject alone to the bankrupt proceedings. And, in addition, the state court may adjudge a recovery by the plaintiffs against the defendant Lanman in personam, staying the execution till his application for discharge in bankruptcy has been acted on by the United States district court.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent herewith.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

MALISSA WAXHAM

v.

ROBERT O. FINK, Appt.

(86 Neb. 180, 125 N. W. 145.)

Appeal — error — assignments — sufficiency.

1. The purpose of the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, chap. 162) was to further simplify the practice in taking appeals to this court in civil actions at law. No assignment of errors in this court is necessary except in the printed brief; and ordinarily the court will not reverse the judgment of the district court for errors not so assigned. Plain errors not so assigned, especially if they involve jurisdictional questions, may, under some circumstances, be considered. Each error complained of must be assigned separately and "particularly."

Same — necessity for technical assignments.

2. The assignment in this court that "the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial," and similar technical assignments, are no longer required. If the particular ruling of the trial court which is complained of is separately assigned in the brief, and plainly and definitely stated, the statute is complied with. This court, however, will not ordinarily discuss in the opinion assignments that are not argued in the brief and supported by authorities.

Same — sufficiency.

3. When, at the close of the evidence, the defendant moves the court to instruct the jury to find a verdict in his favor, and the motion is overruled and an exception duly taken, the assignment in the brief that "the court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant, made at the close of the evidence, that the jury be directed to return a verdict for defendant," is sufficient.

28 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Same — motion for new trial — review.

4. The practice in the district court is unaffected by this statute. The motion for new trial must give the trial court an opportunity to correct all errors complained of. No alleged error can be considered in this court as ground for reversal unless so brought to the attention of the trial court.

New trial — grounds — assignment — sufficiency.

5. The assignment of error in the motion for new trial, that "the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence," or "the verdict is contrary to law," is sufficient to challenge the attention of the trial court to its ruling in refusing to direct a verdict for defendant, since there should be an instruction to find for defendant if the evidence is not sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff, and the same question is raised by either suggestion.

Appeal — error — assignments — sufficiency.

6. It is not necessary that the assignment in this court should be in precisely the same language used in the motion for new trial in the district court. If the ruling is identified and plainly defined, it is sufficient.

Trial — motion for directed verdict — sufficiency.

7. The suggestion in a motion to instruct the jury to find a verdict for defendant, that "the facts proven are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff, as matter of law, to recover," is equivalent to assigning that the evidence is insufficient to justify a verdict for plaintiff.

Fellow servants — who are.

8. If two servants of the same employer are associated together in the same service, and neither is in any manner under the control or direction of the other, they are fellow servants, and one of them cannot recover damages from the employer, caused solely by the negligence of his fellow servant.

Same — domestic servant and employer's child.

9. A woman of mature age was employed as housekeeper and in general charge of the housework, and was injured by an accident caused by the negligence of the son of her employer, a boy of fourteen years, who was also performing ordinary household service, in the absence of his father, but pursuant to the general directions of his father to perform such service. Held, that the woman and the boy were fellow servants, and that she could not recover from her employer damages so sustained.

Messrs. W. F. Wappich and Joel W. West for appellee.

Sedgwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff began this action in the district court of Douglas county to recover damages which she alleges she suffered because of the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff was employed as a domestic by the defendant. The defendant's family consisted of himself and his son, about fourteen years of age, and the plaintiff had general care of the house, and performed the ordinary duties of a housekeeper. At the time of the accident which caused the plaintiff's damage, the defendant was away from home, and the boy, in getting some coal from the cellar for the evening, left the small trap-door in the floor open, through which the plaintiff fell, causing her injuries. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals. The brief of the defendant in this court is devoted entirely to the proposition that the plaintiff and the boy were, in the absence of defendant, fellow servants, and that the defendant is not liable for the carelessness of the boy. This proposition is not discussed at all in the brief of the plaintiff. The argument on behalf of plaintiff is addressed entirely to reasons for supposing that the main question insisted upon by defendant cannot be considered by this court, and several reasons are urged for that conclusion.

The question presented by the plaintiff is wholly one of practice, and becomes of more than usual importance because of the change in the method of obtaining a review in this court of judgments and final orders of the district courts in civil actions at law. The act of 1905 (Laws 1905, chap. 174) was intended to provide a complete procedure in such cases. It was a radical departure from the procedure then provided, and under that act this court held that "it was the intention of the legislature to simplify the practice in bringing cases to this court," and the former rule, which had been universally enforced, that "an assignment of error directed against a group of instructions is insufficient, and will be considered no further than to ascertain that any one of such instructions was properly given," was abrogated. First Nat. Bank v. Adams, 82 Neb. 801, 118 N. W. 1055. It will be observed, further, that under the act of 1905 this court adopted the rule that upon docketing the appeal, a printed or typewritten brief of the errors relied upon must be filed in this court with the transcript. But the legislature, at its next session, amended the statute, repealing nine several sections of the Compiled Statutes then in force, and enacting five sections in their stead. Laws 1907, chap. 162. The title of the new act is: "To Provide for Appeals to the Supreme Court in All Cases except Criminal Cases," etc. The manifest purpose of the act is to further simplify the practice, and the result, we are satisfied, is to do away with many of the technical rules which have been supplied by the court. The fourth section of the act amends § 675c of the Code. That section was: "The supreme court shall by general rule provide for the filing of briefs in all causes appealed to said court. The brief of appellant shall set out particularly each error asserted and intended to be urged for the reversal, vacation, or modification of the judgment, decree, or final order alleged to be erroneous; but no petition in error or other assignment of errors shall be required. . . . The supreme court may, however, at its option, consider a plain error not specified in appellant's brief." The section was re-enacted, and to the clause, "but no petition in error or other assignment of errors shall be required," were added the words, "beyond or in addition to the foregoing requirements." We must give force to this amendment, and we can discover no other meaning than that only one brief, and that the printed brief which had always been required, was to be filed in the case, and the assignments of error in that brief were sufficient if they "set out particularly each error asserted and intended to be urged." Each error of the trial court relied upon must be assigned in the brief, and must be set out with particularity. The party complaining of the judgment will not be supposed to have any reason to ask for a reversal except the errors committed by the trial court which he specifies in his brief and so defines that this court may know from his brief the particular ruling of which he complains. If this is done, nothing further is required to obtain a review of the rulings so specified.

The brief of appellant in this case contained but one assignment of error. It is in these words: "The court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant, made at the close of the evidence, that the jury be directed to return a verdict for defendant." Under the statutes now in force and the rules of this court framed in compliance with the amendments above discussed, this assignment presents the only question for us to review. Under the former practice it was held, perhaps not necessarily, that the petition in error in this court must contain the assignment that "the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial." The rule so established appears to be inconsistent with the simplified practice introduced by the recent legislation above referred to. At the close of the evidence the defendant asked the court to direct a verdict in his favor. This the court refused to do, and the defendant excepted to the ruling. This is the specific error of the district court which is "asserted and intended to be urged for reversal," and it is "set out particularly" in the brief filed in this court. This is an exact compliance with the statute as to the assignment of errors in this court. The amendments of the statutes under consideration have nothing to do with the practice in the district courts, and, of course, the well-settled rules of those courts are in no way affected thereby. The motion for new trial filed in the district court is unaffected by these amendments. It must give the trial court an opportunity to correct all errors complained of, and no alleged error can be considered as ground for reversal that is not so brought to the attention of the trial court. It is contended by the plaintiff that the defendant's motion for new trial was insufficient to challenge the attention of the trial court to the error now relied upon. The motion for new trial contained the following assignments: "First. The verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence. Second. The verdict is contrary to law. Third. Errors of law occurring at the trial, duly excepted to." Then follow seven assignments, each assigning error in giving a specified instruction. Bearing in mind that the defendant's contention is that the whole evidence shows that the plaintiff and the son of defendant are fellow servants, and that upon this evidence the law is that the plaintiff cannot recover, it would seem that either the first or second assignment in the motion for new trial must bring the real matter in controversy to the attention of the court. Houston v. Omaha, 44 Neb. 63, 62 N. W. 251. If "the verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence," the court erred in not sustaining the defendant's motion to so instruct the jury.

In Albright v. Peters, 58 Neb. 534, 78 N. W. 1063, the court said: "At the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defendants asked the court below to instruct the jury to return a verdict in their favor, which request was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. The decision cannot be considered at this time for the reason the attention of the trial court was not called thereto in the motion for a new trial." The opinion does not set out the assignments in the motion for a new trial, but it appears that one of them was that "the verdict is contrary to the evidence." This assignment would be substantially equivalent to the one considered in this case,—"The verdict is not sustained by sufficient evidence." The opinion in the case referred to discusses the evidence, and concludes that it was sufficient to support the verdict. When the evidence was all in before the jury, the question of its sufficiency to support a verdict would be directly raised by a motion to instruct for the defendant; and so in the motion for a new trial, either assignment that the verdict was not supported by sufficient evidence, or that the court erred in not instructing for the defendant, would raise precisely the same question, and bring precisely the same matter to the attention of the trial court. The matter is not discussed at large in the opinion referred to, and the distinction, if in fact there is any distinction, is too technical to furnish a precedent.
